Ever since the Civil War, Mr. Speaker, when the little ironclad Monitor knocked out its apparently invincible assailant in the open sea, and thereby instantly revolutionized the naval science of the world, I have been an advocate of the smaller type of seagoing vessels for naval use. From the day of the Monitor's victory, the fleets of wooden vessels all over the world went rapidly out of commission and were replaced by ironclads, just as may soon be possible by a recently hinted-at invention to be perfected by the electric wizard, Edison, and destined to render useless the ironclads of to-day.

The vicious little submarine of this war, undreamed of in Civil War days, may well be called the successor of the Monitor, and by reason of its disappearing qualities, showing its possible efficiency against electrical discoveries, may be looked forward to as replacing present ironclad naval armaments, except for coast or harbor defenses. The dreadnaughts of Germany lay idle in the Kiel Canal, while hundreds of small craft of the submarine type were sent out to prey for a time ruthlessly upon American and allied commerce, which they did disastrously until the small craft destroyers, neglected in early naval programs, could be built and brought into defensive action. The huge dreadnaughts of our Navy were a negligible quantity when it came to pursuing and destroying submarines. Like fabled leviathans they wabbled in their movements.

Small defense vessels, submarine destroyers, became a necessity in our naval defenses, and a want of them showed the worst possible lack of preparedness on the part of the Government; it was inexcusable negligence. Hundreds of them, enough to have policed all German water connections and neutralized her submarines could have been built at comparatively small cost, and thus millions of destroyed property and many precious lives would have been saved. But naval experts, in preparation days, seem to have been too busy in constructing big dreadnaughts, palacelike and cumbersome, but luxuriously fitted up with up-to-date salons and fashionable society promenade decks.

It takes much space in inspired newspaper headlines to explain to the ordinary tax-paying citizen any practical usefulness of these huge sea monsters during the war. They persist in remembering, in their practical way of reasoning, that the British fleet, before our entrance into the war, kept the German Navy bottled up in the Kiel Canal, just the same and apparently just as easily as the combined fleets did afterwards. The massive floating palaces of both nations seem to have simply watched the open entrance to the canal where rode in safety the big German vessels, while German submarines played havoc in the open seas until checked by emergency built destroyers and other small craft.

And yet in this bill we are asked not only to complete the naval program of 1916, but to supplement it with another program carrying 10 new $21,000,000 first-class battleships and 8 scout cruisers of the $8,000,000 type, exclusive of armor and armament, and to be begun "as soon as practicable."

But at what cost? I hesitate to make any personal answer to my tax-paying constituents, whose backs must bend and bear their share of the burdens, and so I quote from a statement made on the floor in argument by a Member, with the expressed approval at the time of the chairman of the Naval Committee:

> Briefly stated, this naval bill seeks to appropriate $746,000,000 and to authorize over $415,000,000 additional, or over $1,160,000,000 in all, in times of peace.

A billion dollar Army bill also awaits action on the calendar. These are but samples of the huge demands being made from all sources upon this Government. Help, help, help, is the cry from all quarters of the globe, and the pity of it all is that an answering cry seems to have been started by high officials of give, give, give, in millions; and loan, loan, loan, in billions, until taxpayers in afright are helplessly asking Congress whither are we drifting? Washington's warning against foreign entanglements, sacred in America since his Farewell Address at the close of the Revolutionary War, has been literally torn in pieces as ruthless as the rape of the Belgian treaty.

The minority leader on the Ways and Means Committee, for whose judgment we all have great respect, has issued a warning in this tragic hour of financial intoxication, little less important in my judgment than that of Washington after the Revolutionary War.

It can not be quoted too often:

> The extraordinary appropriations of money that the Congress of the United States will be called upon to collect from the people in taxes in the next 12 months amount to $6,795,000,000. This does not include ordinary expenses of Government. * * * Let me call your attention to the fact that all the money there is in the United States is, in round numbers, about $6,000,000,000, and we are going to be called upon for $10,000,000,000, in round numbers, in the next 12 months. * * * I caution you who represent the people, we are going wild in Government expenditures.

Not only are we going wild in public expenditures, but the whole world seems to be in a turmoil and upheaval, socially, politically, economically, and in every other way tending to bring disaster and distress to the people, if not a return to prewar militaristic conditions.

Our plain duty, in my humble judgment, after the armistice was signed and victory with high honors had come to American armies in the field, was to get out of Europe as rapidly as possible with honor. The example set by Grant and Lee, at the close of the Civil War, in the prompt disbandment and return of their volunteer armies to civil pursuits was one entirely worthy of present-day imitation. It showed the inherent strength of American institutions.

And even when the assassination of President Lincoln and attempts upon the lives of individual members of his Cabinet had brought dismay and horror to the people, there was no demoralization or breaking up into fighting, fanatical, factional divisions, as in Russia, the Balkans, and certain small-fry countries overseas, never heard of by or at least little known to the American people.

I am old enough to remember that great crisis in our Nation's history, remember the blanched faces of the timid and the startling newspaper headlines on the day after the assassination telling of riots beginning in New York City and other congested centers, but above all the clamor and frenzy of the multitude there came in clear ringing tones, sinking deep into the hearts and minds of the people and expressive of the conservative common sense of the country, from one of Ohio's great statesmen, Gen. Garfield, afterwards President, then in New York City on a visit and attempting with other speakers to stem the rising tide of disorder, these noted words of heroic import:

> God reigns and the Government at Washington still lives.

They were effective in stilling the frenzied clamor of an incensed populace over the foul murder of a beloved President and tragic attempt to wreck the Government, and, now that peace is near in this greatest of all wars, I trust that some one of equal prominence at Washington, in this hour of world-encompassing history, may be able to send out to the country like satisfying assurances of speedy relief and a gradual reduction of the hideous burdens of taxation heaped upon a patient but patriotic people.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THETUS W. SIMS,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 20, 1919.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an address of Hon. C. A. Prouty on the railroad problem.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. C. A. PROUTY, DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC SERVICE AND ACCOUNTING, UNITED STATES RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION, AT THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE ATLANTA FREIGHT BUREAU, THE PIEDMONT HOTEL, ATLANTA, GA., JANUARY 17, 1919.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the freight bureau: I come from far-off New England. While the men of that frigid region have sometimes accomplished things, they have never been able to compete with you gentlemen of the South in the graces of oratory. I shall not upon this occasion attempt to reply to the things, gratifying if only true, which your chairman has so courteously vouchsafed in presenting me, but shall plunge in medias res.

For 22 years I have been associated with the Federal regulation of railroads, and never in all that time has the railroad problem been in such utter confusion as to-day. It is highly desirable and perhaps possible that out of the present uncertainty may come some permanent disposition of this question. To that end it is desirable that all phases of the subject shall be fairly presented and fairly considered.

I have never been an advocate of Government ownership or Government operation. I have, however, always realized that this was the only possible answer to many of the difficulties surrounding our so-called railroad problem. As I read the papers and observe what is transpiring before Congress, it rather seems to me that there is a disposition upon the part of unthinking persons, fostered with great skill by those interests which profit by private ownership, to eliminate the possibility of Government operation. It seems to be assumed that Government operation has been tried and failed and that no further consideration need be given to this subject.

A majority of the world's railways outside the United States of America are owned or operated, one or both, by the government. In recent years there has been a continual progress in favor of Government operation, and in no well-considered case has any nation ever gone from public to private ownership. England in the past has been unalterably opposed to every suggestion of public ownership, but I am told that, as a result of the war, public sentiment will insist upon the nationalization of railways. I feel that the question is one for serious consideration, and as an insignificant contribution to the discussion I desire to affirm three propositions:

1. Government operation in the United States under war conditions was not a failure, but a success.
2. There has been up to the present time no fair test of Government operation under peace conditions.
3. Advantage should be taken of the present situation to make such a test, and the public should suspend its judgment until the result of that test is known.

I.

The Government took over our railroads for two purposes. First, to stabilize the financial condition of the railroads.

The war produced a most serious and unfortunate effect upon all public utilities. As a rule, the rates of such utilities were fixed and could not be immediately increased. Their operating expenses enormously advanced. The result was to bring upon all financial disaster and to produce in many cases absolute bankruptcy. Electric lines, like the elevated in Massachusetts, performing the traction service for the city of Boston, the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Co., in New York, performing a like service for a large portion of that metropolis, have gone into the hands of receivers. Hundreds of other corporations have been brought to the verge of ruin, although they have not yet actually collapsed. The three great express companies which were not taken over by the Government all operated for the first six months of the year under a heavy deficit. The Adams Co. lost in that brief period $6,0000,000, more than one-half the value of all its operative property.

The railroads alone were taken care of. Their security holders are being paid a sum equal to the largest earnings ever known in the history of these properties. Broadly speaking, interest has been paid upon every security and a dividend declared upon every stock which had been regularly paid for the last three years. The first purpose of Government control has been abundantly accomplished, and yet these railroad gentlemen are virtually saying to the country that the Government which has protected them from bankruptcy in the hour of their financial stress and is to-day paying them a most liberal return upon the value of their property is no better than a ravening wolf which is seeking to mutilate and destroy those properties.

The second purpose was of a different character. This Government was engaged in a deadly war. It must act speedily. As a part of that action certain transportation by rail was imperatively needed. Food must be taken from the point of production to the port of embarkation with which to feed our starving allies and maintain our own troops. Raw materials must be carried to the munition factory and the completed product transported to the port. Supplies for the erection of cantonments, troops to those cantonments and from those cantonments to the port, must be handled. The railroads under private ownership had broken down. They were not rendering and they could not render this service. To obtain that service by rail which must be had, the Government was compelled to take over these agencies of transportation.

Now, the Government did those things which must be done. I spend no time in detail, but I simply say that the things were done—the food was carried, the munitions were produced, the troops were handled—and all this never could have been done by railroads operated through private ownership. This is a fact which can not be disputed. The second purpose of Government operation was therefore accomplished.

It is clear that my first proposition is established. Government operation under war conditions and to meet war emergencies was a complete success.

II.

You say that the methods of the Government were autocratic. Of course they were. War is not a pastime. Every military operation to be effective must be autocratic, and the operation of these railroads for the time being was part of a military scheme. What had to be done under war conditions is no indication of what might be done under peace conditions.

There never has been, up to the present time, any fair test of Government control in times of peace. Immediately after the signing of the armistice the director general resigned. With that, the enthusiasm of his administration vanished. The director of operation, next in importance to the director general, also resigned. The director of capital expenditures and the director of inland waterways followed suit. There was a letting go all along the line at the top, and this permeated the whole administration. Under these conditions it is impossible, as everyone must know, to maintain morale or discipline or to secure effective operation. You must agree with me, therefore, that up to the present time there has been no fair test of the ability of the Government to render a satisfactory and an efficient service in times of peace and that my second proposition is well taken.

III.

This brings me to my third proposition, which is that before the public passes judgment upon this railroad problem there ought to be an actual test of Government operation under peace conditions, for the reason that the doubtful questions connected with Government operation can only be answered by an actual test. To make this plain, I must say a word as to Government operation itself.

And first of all I desire to impress it upon you—and it should never be forgotten in all these discussions—that the thing itself about which we are talking, the rendering of a transportation service by rail, is in essence a function of the Government. This has been so declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the principle is accepted in all our present-day treatment of the railroads. For that reason we determine whether a particular railroad shall be built and how it shall be built; we regulate the issues of stocks and bonds with which that property shall be financed; we fix the rates of transportation which it may charge; we determine the schedules upon which it shall operate its trains. There is no attribute of ownership or of operation which the Government is not to-day exercising in reference to its railroads. The natural, the necessary question arises at the very first step of our discussion: Why, if this is a Government function and if the Government finds it necessary in case of private operation to exercise this measure of supervision and control, should not the Government discharge that function itself?

Years ago governments employed private individuals to collect their taxes, and it was thought that this was the most economical, if not the necessary, way. Later the Government employed private capital to provide its highways and its bridges, and it allowed that capital to make a charge for the use of the turnpike and of the toll bridge. All that, for the most part, has disappeared, and it is now recognized that the Government function of collecting taxes and of providing highways and bridges is best discharged by the Government itself. Asking you to bear carefully in mind the public character of the thing which we are discussing, let me now call your attention to some of the questions which are involved in a solution of this railroad problem.

At the basis of this whole subject lies the matter of revenues. Every suggestion from the carriers or those professing to represent the carriers gives prominence to the importance of providing adequate revenues. Let us consider for a moment, from the Government and the private standpoint, this matter of revenue.

And, first, the Government. It would not be possible to-day, under present world conditions immediately following the conclusion of the war, to finance the railroads of this country upon a 4 per cent basis; but if the past is to be taken as any guide to the future, if our experiences even of the present are at all convincing, it would be possible for the Government in the immediate future to convert the securities of our railroads into a 4 per cent Government bond or a 4 per cent railroad bond guaranteed by the Government. The net revenue, therefore, which the Government requires, and the only revenue which it requires, is a sufficient income to pay 4 per cent upon the value of these properties.

Turn, now, to the private side and listen, as I have listened for many days, to the pleas of these railroad gentlemen for additional revenues. They will assure you that it is not possible to maintain their credit, to provide for the development of their properties, which must be done if the public is adequately served, without a return of substantially 9 per cent; and I am bound to admit that what they say is not without force.

The railroad finances of this country are not in satisfactory shape and they have been continually growing worse in recent years. But little money has been raised by the issue of stock. New money has been provided mainly by mortgage security. The margin between value and the amount of the mortgage has been continually shrinking. The time has already come when many of our railroad companies can no longer borrow additional funds, and the time will come sooner or later when nearly every company will find itself in that condition. Additional railroad facilities must be provided, and if those facilities are to be furnished by the railroads themselves, they must, in my opinion, either receive direct assistance from the Government or be granted the right to impose rates which will yield an income beyond a fair return upon the value of their property and beyond what they have been receiving in the past.

If it be assumed that 9 per cent is the correct figure, you have the difference between 4 per cent, which the Government must pay, and 9 per cent, which must be paid to the private owner, or 5 per cent. The value of our railroads upon the basis of prewar prices is somewhere between $15,000,000,000 and $20,000,000,000. Five per cent means, therefore, between $1,000,000,000 and $750,000,000 annually. The people of this country start out, therefore, by paying the private owners of this property that sum to discharge for them this public function.

I do not say that this may not be best. On the contrary, it may even be a good investment, but I desire to call your attention clearly to the fact that the Government could save upon the face of things annually by operating these properties itself this enormous sum.

It is true that the effect of this might be somewhat ameliorated in various ways as I have myself elsewhere pointed out, but I know of no way which does not involve the handing over to the private owner of many millions each year which the Government itself might save.

Another question which must be solved if these railroads are to be passed back to their owners is that presented by the short line—the weak sister. All over this country, but perhaps especially in the Southeast, are railroads from 25 to 150 miles in length which are known ordinarily as short lines. They are independent properties, having no connection with any larger system. They connect with some trunk line, but there is no financial relation between the two.

In the past these lines have managed to eke out a precarious existence, but the recent increases in operating costs which they have shared along with larger systems have brought them to the pass where earnings are no longer sufficient to pay operating expenses. Almost every day there comes to my desk at Washington a suggestion that some one of these lines must go out of business. Its equipment is to be sold, its rails are to be taken up, for the reason that under the highest rates which can be applied revenues will not equal the cost of operation.

These lines are a vital part of the existence of the communities which they serve, and which can not normally exist without them. Some way must be devised by which their operation can be continued. I have always believed myself that the railroads of a given section, and perhaps of the entire country, must be considered as a whole. This little railroad transports the cotton grown along its line for but 50 miles, but that cotton is subsequently transported over other railroads 1,000 miles to the mill where it is consumed. The supplies which that mill uses, the cloths which it produces, are all the subject of transportation by rail. The articles which are consumed in the community served by this little railroad, the fertilizer, the boots and shoes, the groceries, everything, are only handled a few miles by that road, but they have all involved before they reach that road a great amount of transportation by rail. Now, it is not possible to shake this short line free from every other railroad in that section or in the country and say that the rates upon it should be sufficient to maintain the property. In essence your short line is a part of the railroad system of this Nation and must be taken care of as such.

What is true of the short line is true of many long lines in this sense, that owing to conditions of various kinds rates which are fair to one railroad system will bankrupt another and will yield an undue return to a third. There is no good reason why railroad A should make 20 per cent, railroad B 10 per cent, and railroad C nothing, as often happens, under a schedule of charges which must be the same for those three lines, since they are in essence competitive.

This question, which goes to the very heart of the railroad problem, which must be answered before you can properly serve the communities of this country, especially before you can provide for future railroad development, is susceptible of only one complete solution. The difficulty may be in a degree mitigated, but the only perfect answer which leaves nothing to be desired is that the Government operate these railroads as a whole, applying just and reasonable rates, and that every part of the transportation system of this country shall contribute properly to every other part.

Another matter which must be dealt with is this general question of unified operation. It has just dawned upon this country that competition is wasteful and ought to be restrained. People are beginning to realize that unnecessary trains have been operated, that freight has been carried by circuitous routes and in most extravagant ways without any real benefit to the public, and that for all this foolishness the public has been required to pay. It has become perfectly apparent both by reasoning and by actual demonstration that if the railroad facilities of this country could be used as a whole, if equipment and joint facilities could be employed to the best advantage, if all duplication of effort could be avoided, the same amount of transportation might be accomplished, the same service rendered to the public with a saving of millions of dollars annually. It is generally conceded, therefore, that when these roads go back the law ought in some way or other to permit of the restraint of competition.

While it has always been my own belief that competition between carriers might to some extent be eliminated without injury to the public, it is apparent that this can not be made effective to a high degree unless we are prepared not only to permit but to compel. This administration has provided in the city of Chicago an ideal joint ticket office. While our joint ticket offices are not in all cases perhaps satisfactory, that Chicago office is complete and meets the approval of everyone. I recently asked the traffic representative of one of the large lines using that facility whether it would be continued if Government control were to end. His reply was that the stronger lines would probably favor its continuance, but that the weaker lines would be likely to withdraw and establish offices for themselves and that this might lead to a disruption of the whole project. It has usually been the competition of the weak line which has disturbed the situation, and unless some way can be found to check that competition but little will be accomplished.

For my own part, I do not feel that it is at all certain that competition ought to be eliminated. The great objection in my mind to Government ownership has always been that competition would be and must be thereby destroyed. I have doubted whether the same service could be rendered without competition which was rendered under the competitive spur. If the Government can render a satisfactory service, then a great saving can be made by unified control and the only perfect unification is under the Government itself. Can the Government and will the Government render a satisfactory service?

I have already said to you that up to the present time there has been no trial of Government operation under peace conditions. Plainly stated the first purpose of the Railroad Administration hitherto has been to win the war, not to serve the public. As a result the service has not been satisfactory. The principal complaint of the public is that its wants are not properly respected and its complaints not properly heeded by the railroads. The off-line solicitor has been called in and there is no one to give the information and render the service which he formerly supplied. It is difficult to obtain information of any sort either as to the location of your freight or the movement of trains. Even the abounding time table of the past has largely disappeared and the public is left without means of self-information. These and many other things have created the impression in the minds of the public that the operators of these railroads who ought to be the servants of the public are entirely disregardful of the wishes of the public.

I can not deny that these allegations are true to an extent, but I do most earnestly insist that the conclusion ought not to be drawn that a proper and satisfactory service can not be rendered by the Government. That question can only be answered by an actual test. What the conditions of that test ought to be to make a satisfactory one will be considered later; what I desire to emphasize now is that this question—Can the Government render a service satisfactory to the public?—can not be answered except by actual experience. The public should suspend its judgment until the result of an actual test under fair, normal working conditions is known.

The most important factor in this whole discussion remains to be noticed, namely, labor. The total number of persons engaged in the operation of steam railroads reporting to the Interstate Commerce Commission was during the year 1917 approximately 1,750,000. During the year 1918 the director general has himself expended in the operation of the railroads under his control something in excess of $4,000,000,000. Of that enormous sum approximately 62 per cent was paid to labor.

The majority of these employees are voters to-day and the proportion will undoubtedly grow larger in the future. Railroad employees acting together can exercise a profound influence upon any political issue. Under all these circumstances, can the Government deal with labor?

There are two phases of this question: First, the fixing of the wages which shall be paid to the employee; second, the securing from that employee a proper return in service for the wage which he receives. These two things are entirely distinct and proceed upon different considerations.

The determination of the rate of compensation which the railroad employee shall receive is profoundly affected by the circumstance that this railroad is a public servant. This will readily appear from a comparison of the elements which control the wages of an industry served by the railroad as compared with the railroad itself.

Consider the cotton mill which the railroad serves. The owner of this mill buys his cotton and his other supplies at the market price. He hires his labor. He pays all the expenses of producing a finished product and he sells that product at the market price in the open market. So long as there is a margin of profit between the cost of producing the thing which he sells and the price which he can obtain for it, his business continues, but if the cost of production exceeds the selling price his business stops and he shuts down the mill. Ultimately, therefore, labor must accept from the proprietor of the cotton mill that figure which he can afford to pay and still produce his article at a profit. It may have been that in the past the manufacturer of cotton cloth has made an undue profit himself, that he has not given to labor a fair share of this profit, and labor may be able by various devices to extort from him a greater share, but it can never obtain what does not exist, and therefore there is of necessity an automatic regulation of wages.

With the railroad it is entirely different. The railroad has no commodity for sale. It used to be said a quarter of a century ago, when I first began to discuss these questions, that transportation was a commodity to be sold to the highest bidder, just as cotton cloth is a commodity, but that idea has long since disappeared. It is admitted on all hands to-day that transportation is a service the price of which may be fixed and must be regulated by the Government. The cotton mill can shut down, but the railroad must keep going. Its continued performance is necessary to the very existence of the public which it serves. It therefore follows that there is no automatic regulator of railroad wages. And it further follows, I think, that just as the Government determines the rate which the carrier shall charge for its transportation, so it must finally determine in some way the wages which it shall pay for its labor.

There will undoubtedly come to be a certain relation between the wages paid in the field and the factory and the counting house along the railroad and those paid to the railroad employee, but that relation is largely sentimental. The history of recent years shows that the private corporation is unable to deal with railroad labor. All thinking men have come to realize that laws of some sort must be devised to protect the public from the consequences of these disputes between the private operator of a public utility and his employee. The public can not permit a suspension of those services which are essential to its very existence, while railroad managers and railroad workers are debating railroad wages.

Looking therefore to the first phase of the wage question, the Government not only can deal with labor but it must deal with labor whether the railroad is under private or public operation.

The second phase presents an entirely different question. When once the wage at which the railroad employee is to render his service has been fixed, can the Government obtain from that employee a proper amount of service? Every employer of labor understands the importance of obtaining from his employee a proper amount of the proper kind of service. Every employer realizes that upon the attention and earnestness of the employee depends the quality and amount of the service rendered. It is earnestly insisted by the opponents of Government operation that the employee of the Government is indifferent and inefficient and will not render in the same number of hours the same amount or the same quality of service which would be rendered for the private operator, and in support of this much may be said.

Many years ago I had occasion to go frequently from my home in northern Vermont to Chicago, and usually made the trip by the way of Montreal, and over the Grand Trunk between Montreal and Chicago. In those days the Grand Trunk was not an up-to-date property. Its stations were ill kept, its cars were dirty, its conductors slouchy, its trains generally behind time. There came a day, however, when a change was noticeable. The stations were swept, the cars were cleaned, the employees held up their heads and moved with more alacrity, the trains were on time. We had not progressed a hundred miles before I felt that something had happened to the Grand Trunk, and I said to the brakeman, whom I happened to know, "Jim, you Canucks are beginning to know how to operate a railroad. What has happened to the Grand Trunk?" He answered, "We have a new manager." And that was exactly what had happened. There had come onto the Grand Trunk as its chief operating official a great railroad executive, Mr. Charles M. Hays, and the presence of Mr. Hays, although he had only been there a single month, was already felt in every operation of that extensive railroad system.

Somebody has said that the quality in which the American soldier excelled the German was the will to win. The will to accomplish at the top of a railroad system or of an operating division or of an individual office will pervade the entire organization beneath and may transform it from inefficiency to efficiency. Now, while it may happen that men will be found in the Government service possessing themselves the necessary enthusiasm and capable of inspiring their subordinates with the same spirit, still it has always been my own thought that this valuable quality was more likely to be recognized and retained under private than under Government ownership.

While, however, it has been my belief that Government operation would find it extremely difficult to secure the proper efficiency of labor, I have always realized that this conclusion was doubtful. My actual experience for the past few years has tended to increase this doubt. As the director of valuation I have had charge of some 1,500 Government employees. These men have all been hired through the civil service and have been employed under Government regulations. They have worked side by side and in direct comparison with railroad employees under private control. I am certain that my men have done more work, better work, and for less money than the corresponding railroad employees.

This, however, may have been due to the peculiar character of the employment. I was able to create in the prosecution of this work competitive conditions which do not and perhaps could not ordinarily exist. Certainly I feel that no body of men could be more loyal to any private employer than the members of the valuation force have been to its director.

Let it be distinctly understood, however, that I am not to-day advocating Government ownership or Government operation. I have been all my life a believer in private ownership. What a man does is usually the best evidence of his belief. What I recommended in case of the express companies shows best my own conviction.

Soon after coming onto the staff of the director general I was requested by him to give consideration to the express situation and make a recommendation. The natural thing to do was simply to take over the property of the express companies and operate the express business in exactly the way that the property of the railroads had been taken over. The express companies themselves desired that this course be pursued. After careful consideration, however, it seemed to me that there was no emergency which required the operation of the express service by the Government and that, on the whole, another plan ought to be adopted. I recommended the adoption of that plan, and this recommendation was accepted by the director general.

What was done with the express companies was this: A new company was organized, which took over the property of the old companies. The capital stock of the new company represents the depreciated value of the property of the old companies plus the amount of actual cash paid in by the new company. The total amount was $33,000,000.

It was agreed that this new company should transact the express business as the agent of the director general, and that it should receive as compensation for this service a certain per cent of the gross express revenue.

Out of this it was to pay the expenses of operation, including taxes and depreciation, as provided by the rules of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The remaining sum was to be disposed of as follows:

First should come a dividend upon this capital stock not exceeding 5 per cent. Any sum remaining over and above this dividend should be put into a guaranty fund for the payment of future dividends, which fund should not exceed 10 per cent upon the capital stock or a dividend for two years. After the payment of the dividend and the providing of the guaranty fund the next 2 per cent should be divided equally between the Government and the express company; the next 3 per cent should go 1 per cent to the company and 2 per cent to the Government; any additional earnings should be divided one-quarter to the express company and three-quarters to the Government.

This represents my idea of the proper basis on which a public service of this kind might well be performed by private capital:

First. The capital stock upon which dividends are to be paid represents actual money.

Second. The dividend payable by the corporation, while reasonably certain, never can be very excessive. The rate-making body would probably aim to establish rates which would permit the payment of a dividend of approximately 6 per cent, which at the present time is not an undue return upon actual investment; but if net earnings exceeded this amount for a time the sum going to the company would not be excessive.

Third. The guaranty fund secures the payment of dividends over periods of small or even of no net earnings, thus giving to the rate-making body opportunity for intelligent observation and action.

A contract of this kind holds out to the private capital an inducement to efficient operation. If you provide that the corporation may earn 6 per cent upon its capital stock or the value of its property, and no more, there is no incentive to go beyond the 6 per cent, but here there is a certain reward for all economical and efficient management. You have, therefore, all the advantages of private ownership while at the same time the public is adequately protected.

If it were possible, I would prefer to apply this same idea to the railroad operations of this country, and I have given a great deal of thought to the working out of some plan by which these principles might be applied. I am saying all this at undue length to give you a picture of my own mental state. After being with this problem for 22 years, I feel that whether Government ownership should be tried in this country of ours can only be determined by actual experiment. In the absence of that experiment, I would myself vote against it, but I do think that advantage should be taken of the present opportunity to make the test.

To-day the United States Government is in the operation of these railroads. Under the Federal-control act two courses were open to the director general. He might leave the operation of the properties largely in the hands of the owners under his control. That plan would not have involved in any proper sense Government operation. The railroad official would have continued to direct the operations of his road acting under the direction of the Government and accounting to the Government for the result.

Or the director general could affirmatively take over the operation of the properties and appoint his men, responsible to him alone and acting for him alone, to perform that operation. The latter course was adopted. It was, in my opinion, necessary to adopt it. So far as I can see, it would be impossible for the Government to more completely take over the operation of these properties than it has done.

Many things necessary to a unified control have been accomplished, often at considerable expense. Joint ticket offices have been established. In some cases freight offices have been consolidated. Methods of unified operation have been put into effect. From my viewpoint most of those which must be done in order to give Government operation a fair test have been done.

This being so, what additional is necessary to give Government operation a working test?

First, and principally, it is necessary to know the period during which these properties are to be retained by the Government. To-day it is uncertain whether this period is to be 6 months or 21 months or 5 years, and this uncertainty permeates and paralyzes the whole railroad operating force from top to bottom. The first thing which should be done in any view of the situation is to definitely fix the term of Government control.

Mr. McAdoo has stated that five years were needed for this purpose, and I understand that Mr. Hines will take the same position. I do not in anywise desire to set my own opinion up against theirs, but before Mr. McAdoo testified I had already expressed an opinion that three years would be about the proper time. The matter rested in my mind as follows:

It will take six months for the director general to formulate his plans and reorganize his forces. The point of view has entirely changed. In the past we have been operating these railroads to win the war, and public convenience has been largely sacrificed to that end. In the future they are to be operated to serve the public. This change in the point of view requires many operating changes. Trains must be restored, schedules must be revised, rules for the receipt, routing, and transportation of freight and passengers must be recast.

One of the most important things, from my viewpoint, is the working out of some cooperative arrangement with the State commissions. Many of my railroad friends have insisted that the State commission should be eliminated, but this opinion I have never shared. Assuming that it would be possible to establish any system of operation or control which ignored the State commission, it would be, in my opinion, most unwise. The local commission has a kind of knowledge and experience which can not be supplied by any Federal tribunal and which should be recognized and perpetuated in any solution of this railroad problem. It has been my belief, and still is, that it ought to be possible to work out under Government control some plan of cooperation which should demonstrate the possibility of obtaining results from proper collaboration between the Federal and the State authorities.

But all this takes time, and I have felt that it would be at least six months before the new director general could be fairly ready for action, before he could formulate his plans, organize his forces, and get his machine into working shape under peace conditions. The ensuing year should show whether the Government can render a service with which the people of this country will be satisfied and at a cost which they can afford to pay. This would bring us to July 1, 1920. By that time Congress would have accumulated and digested the necessary information from which to formulate legislation. If, as seems probable to-day, Government operation was not satisfactory, then a plan for private ownership could be worked out; but if by chance the experiment should disappoint the common expectation, Government operation might be continued under some proper plan. It will require from a year to a year and a half to get these properties back into the hands of their owners and properly arrange for the termination of Government control.

I also call your attention to the fact that by the 1st of July, 1920, the valuation work of the Interstate Commerce Commission will have gone far enough so that a definite idea of the general result can be had. No proper disposition of this railroad problem can be effected until we know what these properties are worth.

Who, then, opposes this suggestion for a test? Who is so fearful of Government operation as to be unwilling to even know what the facts are?

First and foremost stands Wall Street, the railroad financiers, those gentlemen who have accumulated enormous fortunes in the past from the manipulation of railroad securities and who hope to repeat, even though in lesser degree, that performance in the future.

The operations of these men in connection with railroad securities and railroad transactions are partly legitimate and partly illegitimate. To the extent that they are legitimate they are unproductive. Government ownership and operation entirely stops the performances of these people. They naturally oppose it, and their opposition will be exerted, as it always has been in the railroad world, with great skill, persistence, and energy. The influence of these interests upon railroad legislation is the most dangerous because most difficult to identify and combat.

Among the most active opponents of Government control are the group of men designated in the press as "railroad executives." These are the men who were operating the railroads when they were taken over by the Government and who hope and expect to operate them if they are given back. They are earnestly acclaiming against the efficiency of Government operation and are vigorously insisting that private operation should be resumed. While forced to admit that they were powerless when the emergency came and could not perform the task required of them, either physical or financial, they gravely assert that now, when the Government has weathered the storm and brought the ship once more into calm waters, they only are fit to hold the helm. They were powerless in the face of difficulty, but are alone capable when the difficulty has disappeared. It is somewhat doubtful whether this logic, however persuasive in certain quarters, will appeal to the general public which pays the rate and, incidentally, the enormous salaries which these gentlemen have received in the past and hope to again receive in the future.

The large shipper is against Government ownership. Competition is wasteful, but it gives frequently a superior service. It is almost always discriminatory, and that discrimination is usually in favor of the big man and against the little one. While in recent years the great industry, with its highly paid traffic men, has not been able to obtain the preferences which it enjoyed years ago, there never was a time under private ownership when those interests did not enjoy important advantages over the smaller shipper. Generally speaking, those preferences have disappeared under Government operation. There is no discrimination in the use of the post office; there ought to be none in the use of the railroads.

There is also an organization of security holders which professes to represent a great part of the bonds and perhaps some of the stocks of these railroad companies which is vociferously demanding that these properties be returned. It is easy to understand the attitude of Wall Street. We can see why the railroad executive wants back his $100,000 job; it is possible to appreciate the motive of the traffic representative who desires to bid off one railroad against another, but the attitude of these security holders passes comprehension. I have said to you that one purpose of taking over these railroads was to stabilize their securities and that this purpose had been fully accomplished. While every other public utility has seen its surplus melt away, its dividends disappear, the interest on its bonds in default, the bondholders and stockholders of the railroads of this country are to-day receiving more for the use of their properties than ever before in the history of this country, and yet these same gentlemen assert that the roads should be taken out of Government control to save their securities. My friends, the only thing which can save many of these railroad securities is Government ownership or Government operation. One great objection to taking over these railroads is that the Government would almost inevitably pay an extravagant price for many of them. The security holders of this country, instead of demanding the precipitate return of their properties, should rather demand that the Government give careful attention to the financial situation before the properties are surrendered.

Let me illustrate my meaning by a practical example chosen from my own section, New England. The New Haven Railroad is one of the great railroad properties of this country. It operates through one of the most densely populated and wealthy sections of this whole land, and it carries an enormous traffic, both of passengers and freight. A year ago the traffic on that system was very much congested and was handled under great difficulties; to-day those difficulties have for the most part disappeared. Unless you have actually stood and observed it you can have little conception of the rivers of humanity which flow through the Grand Central Terminal in New York City, especially at about the end of the year. For 22 years I have made the trip from Washington to Vermont at this season. Never have I seen so many people on the rail. While the service between Washington and New York was poor, never in my experience were the crowds upon the New Haven so well accommodated as this year, and yet for the month of December that magnificent property showed in round numbers earnings of $8,373,000, the largest December in its history, and operating expenses of $7,998,000. This did not include taxes nor its payment to the New York Central for the use of the Grand Central Terminal, which are really an operating charge. Adjusting taxes and joint facility rents there was an absolute deficit of $325,000. The owners of that magnificent property for the month of December would be obliged to put their hands into their pockets to the extent of $325,000 for the privilege of having operated it.

The showing of the Boston & Maine is even worse. As you know, the Interstate Commerce Commission is making a valuation of the railroads of this country, of which I have charge for the commission. It so happens that I have just received the reports from our engineering and land sections showing the cost of reproducing that property and the value of its lands. These reports show that the cost of reproducing these properties, less depreciation but including lands, would exceed their capitalization. The lands of the Boston & Maine system which are used for transportation purposes alone aggregate more than $45,000,000, and this value is not the result of some process of multiplication; it contains no severance damages; it is simply the acreage value of the lands used by that system as compared with similar adjoining or adjacent lands.

Now, this system during the month of December showed an income of $5,441,000 and an operating expense of $7,520,000. The actual disbursements in money for the operation of that property during the month of December were $2,000,000 in excess of its receipts, and in addition to that its taxes were estimated at $250,000.

I happened to be in Boston the day after this estimate had been telegraphed to me at Washington, and I conferred with our auditor in reference to it. He stated to me that operating expenses for the month of December contained $700,000 of back pay, but that there were also certain wage advances which did not appear and which, in his opinion, would nearly equal the back pay included. There is no theory upon which the absolute deficit of this company did not exceed $1,500,000 for this month.

It sometimes happens that weather conditions in that country almost paralyze operations during portions of the winter. That was true of December, 1917, but for this December operating conditions were ideal; not a snow plow left a shed, not an engine was frozen up; nothing can be charged against the weather.

The United States Government took the Boston & Maine Railroad. It has made large advances in the wages of its employees. It has advanced its rates of transportation also. It has to some extent changed its methods of operation and the flow of its traffic. Now, I insist, as a resident of New England, as the president of a savings bank in New England, that the Government has no right to pass this railroad back until it has investigated and amended that situation. The interest of the security holder and the interest of the community both demand this. The figures which I have given you are to some extent estimates, but they are substantially correct. It may be that the indications of this single month are entirely misleading, and that the results of a six months' period may be satisfactory. What I insist upon is that before these properties go back to private ownership the results of this war shall be known and adjusted. All this can hardly be done in less than a period of three years.

In conclusion permit me to vouchsafe a word of personal explanation. Under the Federal-control act the Director General of Railroads was authorized to appropriate the services, or a portion of the services, of any employee of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but without the payment of additional compensation. Under this provision I was drafted and have served as the director of public service and accounting for nearly a year, discharging at the same time my duties as director of valuation. While the war lasted, and under its inspiration, this double burden was not unbearable, but with the return of peace this load, together with the load of increasing years, seemed greater than I ought to undertake to carry. I concluded that I must lay down one work or the other. The commission felt that I ought to continue with my valuation work, and in this I concurred. I shall therefore give up in the near future my work as director of public service and accounting. If I remain with the Railroad Administration at all it will be merely in charge of its accounts. What I wish to do now is to make it perfectly plain that this action upon my part is not prompted by any feeling of dissatisfaction with the present administration. Upon the contrary, were it my privilege, as it is my inclination, to continue in the position which I have occupied, where it was my duty to demand for the public a just rate and an adequate service, I should expect to receive from the entire Railroad Administration, certainly from its head, sympathetic and earnest support. I believe that my successor will receive such support and that the public will be satisfied with its treatment. I bespeak for the administration your good wishes and cooperation.

These railroads, my friends, are your servants. You should insist that they render you a proper service and in a proper manner. But you must remember that the ability of the servant to serve depends upon his treatment by the master. Just in proportion as you mete out to these servants of the public fair and sympathetic treatment, to that extent should they have the disposition and the ability to render to you an adequate service. Cooperation should be the watchword upon both sides. If at the end of a long acquaintance with this subject I could address but one single sentence to the public and railroad, it would be "Get together."

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. MASON,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 20, 1919.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit the following:

AN OPEN LETTER.

To the CHICAGO ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE:

The visit of your committee has awakened an interest in the minds of some who did not seem to realize the importance of employment of labor, if necessary, by public improvements until the emergency of reconstruction is passed and normal conditions are reached. Will you pardon me if I presume to offer some suggestions to you, hoping through you to reach the people of Illinois, and through them my associates in Congress?

Added to the other embarrassments comes the embargo by Great Britain on American products, which affects every industry and every man, woman, and child in Illinois. Embargoes for and against the United States are as old as American history, and to handle the present situation intelligently we should know the cause and effect of that operation in the past. Partisanship in the past had much to do with the opinions expressed on both sides on the different occasions when the embargo question presented itself to the American people, and the opinions of historians as to the effect are not free from that bias. In the present threatened condition let us try, in the interest of our country, to free ourselves from partisanship. If I display any party spirit in this open letter it is because I verily believe true history compels it. Commercial retaliation under varying names has been approved and used by most of the Presidents from Washington to McKinley. Adams in 1828; Jackson in 1829, 1830, 1835, and 1836; Polk in 1847; Fillmore in 1858—all before the Republican Party was in power; and Lincoln in 1863; Johnson in 1866 and 1867; Grant in 1869, 1871, and 1872; Hayes in 1880; and Harrison under section 3 of the McKinley bill, called reciprocity, have all recommended, used, and approved this general plan to protect American commerce, manufactures, and farmers.

I deal now with one embargo laid by Great Britain. I am not complaining of Great Britain. She is exporting less than she is importing and buying more than she sells, and is facing the same question faced by all belligerents in the war. The question is whether we who are suffering must suffer more for fear some one will say we are not kind to our allies. Commercial protection does not mean war, but the use of common sense in our competition with the world for trade. Let me call your attention to the sweeping embargo that Great Britain puts on all manufactured goods, which includes American products. They will take our hides but not boots and shoes, the products of American labor.

Commodities which may not be imported into Great Britain after March 1 without special licenses range all the way from essentials to luxuries and include machine tools and machinery for working in both metal and wood, stoves, manufactures of aluminum, wearing apparel not waterproofed, baskets and basket ware, metal baths, cartridges, cement, fat, acids, fire extinguishers, guns, carbines and rifles, hats and bonnets, lawn mowers, linen yarns and manufactures thereof, mats, matting, mops, oilcloth, perfumery and toilet preparations, photographic apparatus, pictures, prints, engravings and photographs, plated and gilt wares, revolvers and pistols, salt, sewing machines, manufactures of skins and furs, soap, spectacles and eyeglasses not containing gold, time-recording instruments of all kinds and movements and parts thereof, wringers and mangles, weighing machines, scales and balances of all descriptions, and vacuum cleaners.

The fact that they exclude the same products from other nations removes any suspicion of unfriendliness toward us, but it hurts to the quick, and we should protect ourselves in the same spirit of friendliness to our competitor, and with due interest in labor and capital in our own country. Other friendly associates in the war will do the same, and if we are deadlocked between the Congress and the President for two years, we will be in a sorry and almost hopeless situation. A Washington newspaper announces that—

After thinking the thing over carefully, Republican leaders * * * conceded the right of England to make any regulations respecting imports she deems wise, so long as they apply impartially to all commercial nations.

Although this article is not written by Northcliff or other English writer, it suggests we get "busy" and we might pass a protective tariff law. The good faith is so apparent when we consider the strong protective (?) principles of the Executive, and the simple mathematics of making a majority of one in the Senate equal to two-thirds of 96, which would pass a bill over his veto. When we consider that the Executive has refused to increase the income from tariff even on luxuries, and hundreds of millions of dollars are being waived to aid foreign manufacturers, and direct taxes are levied on the people instead, we stand no possible chance for protection for two years more.

Some of your Members may remember our prosperity under the McKinley bill during the Harrison administration. Section 3 of that bill simply directed the President to lay an additional tax on tea, coffee, sugars, and hides on countries imposing "exactions" on products of American farms or shops. By reason of that section we made reciprocal treaties with 14 countries, which was worth hundreds of millions of dollars in trade to the United States.

Do you think we can pass any part of the McKinley bill in the next Congress? If we do, will the President sign it? Why not pass an old-fashioned American act, not in anger, but in earnest defense of America, which shall direct the President to order a tariff tax of 100 per cent ad valorem on every article exported to the United States from every country that imposes a prohibitive duty or "other exactions" on American products and direct him to withdraw that extra tariff when the nation discriminating against us removes its "exactions" as to our products?

The ultraconservatives will say, "That would be a delegation of legislative power to the President." The Supreme Court of the United States says no, it would be a direction to the President to do certain things on the happening of certain conditions. In 1809 Congress forbade the importation of goods from Great Britain and France and provided when those countries changed their policy on American goods the President should open the door by proclamation. In 1810 President Adams proclaimed that France had "modified her edicts," and trade was resumed.

Some may say this is radical. Something radical must be done. The workman will struggle to maintain his wage. Even when living comes down he wants a margin for the rainy day. Put yourselves in his place. The manufacturer, being deprived of any outlet for overproduction or normal production, can not live. The farmer's market is ruined. Labor and capital both staggering. If we submit to go on under our present low tariff and the embargoes laid upon our people by Great Britain, to be followed by others, idleness and starvation face us, and we will have the Congress, the President, and the business man to thank for our condition. You are business men. Look at the millions we have lost in six years of low tariff, and are still losing. Consider how the manufacturer had to fight to live before the war, and will have to now go back to the same conditions or worse. Consider that the broken manufacturer pauperizes the farmer, starves labor, and bankrupts the merchant. Consider that business men are being crippled by the present high taxes. Consider that we are appropriating billions more than the estimates. Remember, though the war is over the day of service and sacrifice is not passed, and if anyone can tell me how we can increase our revenue and employ our labor any better than by treating our commercial rivals no better than they treat us I shall be pleased to hear from him.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. E. MASON.

The Naval Appropriation Bill.

OF
HON. BURTON L. FRENCH, OF IDAHO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 11, 1919.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of deep regret to me that I can not support the entire program recommended by the Naval Committee to the House and provided for in the Navy appropriation bill. I have consistently opposed a large standing Army for our country in time of peace, and, on the other hand, have felt that in a strong Navy was greatest wisdom. In fact, I was voting for what we then called a large Navy at a time when a good many here, and especially on the other side, were opposing such a program, men who to-day are contending for the pending measure.

Now, what are the facts as to the need for the present program?

The pending bill calls for an appropriation of $746,000,000 for the coming fiscal year to meet the expenses of the Navy, and in addition an authorization of a building program in the amount of $415,000,000, or a total authorized expenditure of $1,160,000,000. In the item of $746,000,000 is included $179,000,000 that is to be applied to the building program authorized in 1916.

Do we need to include the item of $415,000,000?

Let us see. What is the relative strength of the navies of the world? From the figures of the Navy Department for 1917 the relative strength was as follows:

	Navy craft (all kinds) in service.		Building and projected.
	Number.	Tons.	Number.	Tons.
Great Britain	680	2,375,564	75	161,850
Germany	262	1,058,240	(1)	(1)
United States	153	860,017	82	500,058
France	270	642,386	41	248,450
Japan	127	550,756	22	157,437
Russia	192	462,351	16	185,270
Italy	168	396,738	65	168,051
Austria-Hungary	132	225,697	(1)	(1)

NOTE.—The building and projected program columns are not definite.

From the foregoing, measured by tonnage and omitting Germany from the calculations, which we could not do in 1916, the United States is an easy second in rank among the world powers. More than that, when the building program I have indicated shall have been completed, the United States will be a strong second and the difference vast between her Navy and the navy of France or Japan or Italy.

While the armistice has been signed, technically we are still at war, and I shall say nothing as to any part of the bill except the part which provides an additional expenditure of money in the amount of $415,000,000 for a new building program to begin in June, 1920.

I am opposed to this program for the following reasons:

First. Our Navy is now larger than any other in the world except Great Britain's, and will be vastly larger than any other except Great Britain's when the present building program shall have been completed. It must be remembered that Germany's Navy has been taken from her.

Second. I am opposed to this program because the great powers of the world are staggering under enormous debts, have lost tremendously in man power, and by comparison with the United States are vastly weaker than they were five years ago.

Third. I am opposed to this program because our present program is not completed. We are in this bill appropriating $179,000,000 to carry it forward, and it can not be completed for several years. Numerous ships have not even been begun.

Fourth. I am opposed to this program because, if any reason shall develop why we need it, we can adopt it in the next Congress. This program is not to begin until June 1, 1920.

Fifth. I am opposed to this program because I hope that one of the by-products of the war will be an arrangement among nations for the reduction of armaments. Let us wait and see.

Sixth. I am opposed to this program because our people are under an enormous burden of taxation, and it is our solemn duty not to increase that burden if it can be avoided. Do you realize that to keep up the Navy alone, if this program shall be carried out, will cost the American people $550,000,000 every year? Mind you, this is just the upkeep.

I shall not trespass further except to include in my remarks a short editorial from the Moscow (Idaho) Daily Star-Mirror of February 6, 1919, that bears upon the matter of expenditures of public moneys:

GETTING WILDLY EXTRAVAGANT.

The American people are becoming wildly extravagant. They are "running amuck" in the matter of "frenzied finance," and it is time to call a halt. The war has awakened new ideals, and we have ceased to think or talk in terms of millions and use billions instead. If this continues, we will soon be using trillions as our measure of finances. No nation, even the United States, the richest on earth, can stand this pace.

OF

HON. JAMES A. FREAR,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 18, 1919.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, we have reached the close of this $1,117,000,000 Army bill that is ten times as large as any of its predecessors in times of peace, and our country is now at peace.

We have just passed a gigantic naval bill five or six times the size of similar bills before the war, notwithstanding we have a Navy larger than any three world-power nations combined, outside of Great Britain, and these two war bills in time of peace levy an average tax of $20 on every man, woman, and child in the United States, in addition to our enormous $18,000,000,000 debt obligations, which are rapidly increasing.

This military bill has been shown to be wasteful in form and in fact, because lump-sum appropriations reaching hundreds of millions of dollars in one case are items in this bill covering different estimates and are a continual invitation to bureau chiefs to spend every dollar in some one of the different activities covered by the item. The temptation is too strong to resist, and Congress is a party to the waste when it approves this bill.

No Member will hamper the War Department in times of war, but in times of peace and enormous debt and tremendous tax levies it is legislative folly to blindly grant power and unlimited public funds which bureau chiefs in every department of Government are vociferously demanding.

Chairman DENT, of the Military Committee, has said in discussion that the estimates of committee allowances found in this bill are frequently "a matter of guess." This is certainly so, but let me illustrate how wild a guess becomes when bureau chiefs are allowed to make them without restriction. Last Saturday I moved to reduce an item for the construction of reclamation plants and other matters which carried $4,000,000. It was reduced on motion to $2,000,000. Committee members valiantly defended the item until my colleague Mr. STAFFORD read from the hearings that $300,000 would cover all necessary work in sight, and only $400,000 had been given for this item prior to the war. The amendment prevailed. Possibly the reduction ought to have been greater.

A few moments later I arose for recognition to move to cut an item for reserve officers of $3,000,000 down to $500,000, but Chairman DENT, of this Military Committee, was recognized, under the rule, and offered an amendment not clearly understood, and the colloquy in the RECORD is illuminating:

Mr. FREAR. What does that amendment carry?
Mr. DENT. That means that instead of $3,000,000 it is cut to $100. I hope that satisfies the gentleman.

It certainly did, and other reductions were made in the bill, but many others were refused. The illustrations offered show loose methods of appropriation in this $1,117,000,000 bill, for which the different bureaus and not the committee are directly responsible.

A far more important vice affecting the future of this Government was contained in the bill in its attempt to foist a standing Army of a half million men on this country in times of peace. That is what the Army staff wants, whether the committee admits it or not, and every thinking man knows that it would be impossible to secure a half million men by volunteering. One of two alternatives then remained, either to enforce conscription in times of peace to make up this large army or keep in the service those who are clamoring for their discharges and have a right to them, and we were asked to break faith with the citizen soldier. Under the rule brought into the House we have just reduced the 500,000-man Army contained in the bill to 179,000 men, the same sized Army we had before the war.

Congress determines our future policy. I do not believe our people want a military autocracy continued like that evidenced by 22,000 tragic courts-martial proceedings that have revealed a Prussianized system as bad as anything reported from Germany. The people know what happened to Germany and to the German system. They know what invites revolutions and wars, and after spending $30,000,000,000 and many thousands of lives to bring a lasting peace, they want that peace and a demobilized army. The Army has been reduced to reasonable size on paper, but we want over 2,000,000 men now in the Army demobilized, in fact, and brought home. I had amendments I intended to offer, but can not do so on this bill under the rule which has been adopted. They provided that all soldiers drafted or enlisted for the war emergency should be demobilized within 60 days in this country after the passage of this act, and within four months when abroad with full pay until they reached the post nearest place of enlistment, and no pay or allowances would be given any officer in charge of men who failed to put such order into effect within the time fixed by law.

In justification for offering these amendments Chairman DENT has advised the committee that it took three months to demobilize 175,000 men abroad, and at that rate it will take over two years more to demobilize the remaining 1,600,000 men in the expeditionary force. My amendment insisted on getting all men back in four months more; and if we could get them over at the rate of 250,000 men a month when the sea was infested with submarines, we can now commandeer every vessel in the country if need be, including 39 battleships and 41 cruisers, that are on the seas in service, and which can be put to no better use than getting our boys home. Even if crowded two in a hammock, it would be preferable to the horrors of Brest or the dreary monotony of camp life, and hundreds of thousands of dependents are equally concerned in the return of these soldiers. They were promised quick return home after the war, and Congress should insist that that promise be kept, sustained, as it is, by the news that the new armistice signed yesterday amounts to a peace agreement.

According to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], the General Staff says it put forth a special effort in this country to get 194,000 men home the week before Christmas, but only 30,000 a week were sent in February, and it will take six months more at that rate, while some commanders are reported to have declared they will not demobilize until they get ready, and any soldier asking to go home will be "sent to the guardhouse." Responsibility for early demobilization rests with the administration, but if we cut off the pay of the officers who refuse to discharge the law it would be salutary in effect.

Any soldier writing to a Congressman is summarily dealt with by these martinets, we are informed, and the same petty officers who received their first appointments to West Point from Congressmen, whose interference is now challenged, although 2,000,000 men remain in service and have no one else to whom they can and do freely state their claims.

I know the Navy League and the Security League and their Wall Street backers, who were exposed in the recent congressional investigation, want the biggest Navy in the world and a great standing Army, but the people who write us by the hundreds do not want that, and these same people are the producers and consumers, who furnish the fighting men and who eventually pay the tax, and the Security League and other leagues do little more than lip service.

To show the soundness of my amendments to reduce items appearing in this bill, the estimates were made for an Army of 500,000 men, as amended by the General Staff, that wants a large standing Army. I questioned the committee whether the House would agree to an Army of that size, and now, at the conclusion of the bill, we have reduced the proposed Army to 179,000 officers and men, as it was before the war. We could not raise or maintain an Army of 500,000 men without conscription, and we will not adopt Germany's methods without inviting her defeat and the revolution that was sure to follow.

But this bill of $1,117,000,000 provided for an Army three times as large as we have agreed to, and while the Army now under arms must be cared for, this bill, which has been cut less than $50,000,000 on points of order and amendments, should have been cut hundreds of millions to meet the expenses of an Army only one-third the size of that first proposed in the bill. Army officers and bureau chiefs in every department ask for all they can get, but this bill should have been cut far deeper, and it would then have met every necessity and saved the people back home from unnecessary burdens of millions of dollars.

OF

HON. HENRY Z. OSBORNE,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 21, 1919.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a speech delivered by the Hon. CHARLES H. SLOAN, of Nebraska, at the First Congregational Church of Washington, D. C., on February 12, 1919, before the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of the Potomac, and associated patriotic orders of that jurisdiction.

Mr. SLOAN said, in part, as follows:

"Mr. Chairman, it is good to meet here in this House of worship to-night, serving as a forum of citizenship, adorned with the stars of glory and the stripes of union; in this capital city which has become the world's cynosure. It is the capital of a nation most commanding and potent in commerce, finance, and martial power; yet, withal, passing through a crisis the outcome of which gives thoughtful Americans deep concern.

"The mariner emerging from a storm and anxious for his bearings, lest rock or shoal his craft would smash, looks not to floating wreckage, drifting iceberg, or shifting waves. He has recourse to sounding depths, the magnet, and the sun. Those are the guides that through the ages have never failed, while icebergs have melted, wreckage washed upon distant shores, and recurring waves left no trace. These are days when we should look to the ancient landmarks—Washington and Hamilton, Jefferson and Jackson, Lincoln and Cleveland, McKinley and Roosevelt. [Applause.]

"As a new Congressman, coming here eight years ago, one of the first objects to attract my attention was the mighty obelisk off toward the Potomac, the Washington Monument. I recognized the propriety of its existence, but Washington never seemed to so thoroughly deserve that lofty recognition as he does now. Money measures commercial value. It often measures sentiment. I read recently of a Gilbert Stuart Washington picture selling for $21,000 which three years ago had sold for $3,500. There is instinctively a groping and grasping mid rocking revolutions for that which has been tried, found good, strong, and enduring.

"So down nearer the Potomac is being finished a monument to Lincoln. While I voted with pride for its establishment, never did I deem it so nobly deserved by the martyr as now, when people freed from the frenzy of actual war look about, note the course we have followed, the waste of war, the entangled web in which we find the Republic, the problems we must solve, the heroic stands we must take, that the Republic, entangled in any embarrassing alliance, will assert its independence, present to other nations the highest example of free government for emulation and advancement, but not through our descent toward their present level. [Applause.]

"So it is fitting and proper that on this day, a century and decade removed from his nativity, there should be more speeches delivered with Lincoln as the theme than on any other day in that period of time.

"It is peculiarly fitting that Lincoln's Birthday should be celebrated under the auspices of the Grand Army of the Republic—that mighty Army with no predecessor, to have no successor and no recruit, now gallantly standing against the charge of the pale horse cavalry and battling without reserves.

"I can not hope to bring a new message of Lincoln to a Washington audience. [Applause.]

"It is to the credit of American intelligence that few men can say anything new of Lincoln. Young and old know the essential facts of his life, the qualities of his character, and the tragic details of his untimely taking off.

"When Lincoln was born our Constitution was only 20 years old. Fulton that year claimed his patent which freed water navigation from the slavery of the wind, and 35 years before Morse eliminated distance by the electric spark.

"On that day Darwin was born. In that year Mendelssohn saw the light.

"It was the natal year of Lord Alfred Tennyson, who wrote 'Better 50 years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay.' Had he lived till now he might revise his inspiring estimate. That year Gladstone, the greatest British statesman between William Pitt and Lloyd George, had his birth. Massachusetts produced Oliver Wendell Holmes and Virginia Edgar Allen Poe, the poets of sunshine and shadow. That year witnessed the birth of Cyrus McCormick, the American wizard of the harvest, whose improved mechanism in the crush of war enabled America to feed the world.

"Thomas Jefferson was closing his second administration.

"Napoleon had but recently weakened Europe and strengthened America by the sale of the Louisiana Territory. He was then walking upon the writhing forms of European kings. The sun of Austerlitz had risen, Jena and Friedland had been won, and Europe rocked at his feet while he stood at the zenith of his power, while kings became his subjects and emperors to no purpose were combining against him. There were yet to be the conflagration of Moscow, the snows of the north, Waterloo, St. Helena, and a rocky tomb.

"Such was the world setting of Lincoln's nativity. But the setting would not be complete were it not said that within a year, within a hundred miles in the same dark and bloody ground, Jefferson Davis first saw the light. Two companion snow drops, pure, clear, and crystalline, as they fall touch the loftiest peak of the mountain chain. They freeze into a mighty mass which yields to nothing but the wooing of the summer sun; and while they lie but a few inches apart, in their melting mass each moves down a different slope; each finds its river to the sea. One reaches the turbulent Atlantic, the other the peaceful Pacific. Davis moved southwestwardly to Mississippi, the then great cotton State, where slavery thrived. Lincoln found his way through Indiana to the prairies of Illinois, where labor was free.

"Lincoln believed in the Nation. In the matter of finance, commerce, and slavery he was a nationalist. He favored a national monetary system. He was a strong protectionist. He planned in good time to free the American slaves. As he favored American commerce above the interests of any other nation, so he spent no time or energy freeing slaves abroad while chains clanked at home. He saw American needs first, and was for America first concerned. [Applause.]

"In this he furnished a mighty example for the statesmanship of to-day.

"Estimates of Lincoln's greatness depend upon the standpoint from which they are viewed. Illinois was the great antebellum western State and Lincoln its primal character. It is wonderful how many people throughout the various communities of the great Northwest who sometime during Lincoln's career lived in Illinois and came in contact with Lincoln. If you were to ask an old resident of Illinois what was the great feature of his career he would say 'his debate with Douglas.' When we come to think about it, sweeping over the whole period of recorded history, no discussion was ever conducted by two greater characters, or has commanded anything like as much interest, as the Lincoln and Douglas debate. Douglas was known to be a profound lawyer, subtle logician, experienced statesman, and brilliant debater. Many of Lincoln's friends urged him to avoid the debate. But there we look through the modesty of the man to a recognition of conscious power. Then, as in after time, Lincoln, although never self-asserting, knew and trusted his own strength.

"An egotist is not unbearable if he does not too much advertise, and few men without a modicum of egotism become in the world's contest prize winners. While the immediate prize was the senatorship, both knew the ultimate prize was that seat higher than the throne of kingcraft and mightier than the seat of emperors—the American presidential chair. [Applause.]

"It was a titanic battle; a mental struggle of intellectual athletes. There was the keen thrust of wit, the studied stroke of reason, the ponderous blow of logic, the storm of invective, the persuasive and overcoming effect of inspired eloquence, man to man, brain to brain, each commended or criticized by friend or foe.

"I spoke some time ago to an old Member of the House of Representatives, now gone to his reward, who obtained the eastern view of Lincoln in his Cooper Institute speech. His friends had said, 'Do not go to New York. It is the home of Seward. That speech made at Cooper Institute will defeat you.' Again he had confidence in himself and his cause. He went. He made that memorable speech. That speech made him the presidential nominee. He revealed new and strange powers of oratory to the East. It was not the florid, ornate utterance of the South. It was not the keen, classic analysis of the East. It was that direct and convincing expression proceeding from a clear brain prompted by a good heart that swayed the judgment and clinched conviction.

"Again, and multitudes there are who insist that Lincoln's position of supreme exaltation was upon the platform of glorious Gettysburg, where he worded a national epic in two paragraphs of prose and concentrated the philosophy of his country within a few sentences. Daniel Webster, who divides with Edmund Burke the oratorical honors of the English tongue, says true eloquence rests in the occasion, in the theme, and in the man. The occasion was the gathering of the Nation's greatest to commemorate the mightiest battle and victory of the great war. It was on that field of fearful carnage. The speech was by the central figure of the triumphant North. He stood the test. He spoke as man had not spoken since Paul addressed the Athenians on Mars Hill. Lincoln spoke with the boldness of Paul and the authority of the Nazarene. It was the third in point of time of the three great short speeches of earth—Hebrew, Greek, American—at Mount of Beatitudes, Mars Hill, and Gettysburg. The Nazarene spoke as man had never spoken, not as the scribe; Paul surpassed the oratorical conception of cultured Greek; and Lincoln eclipsed the effort of the classic Everett. [Applause.]

"I have read and heard the speeches of other orators who could gather and sway great multitudes. They leave you hating your neighbor and with class arrayed against class. Lincoln's speeches breathed charity and tolerance and steadily developed national sentiment. His listeners' thoughts were directed to unionism and not to sectionalism on the one hand, and country rather than world on the other. Under the witchery of his words our country looked larger; its mountain chains higher; its waters purer; its valleys greener; its Constitution stronger; and its flag fairer, until it developed all the beauties of God's arched promise painted on the cloud. [Applause.]

"Many there are watching the current of modern events and studying the life and career of this marvelous man; see as the chief evidence of his ability, tact, power, and courage in the selection of his great Cabinet. Places of responsibility were not filled by henchmen practically unknown to the country who had brought their quota of delegates to his support at convention.

"Nor yet was any commanding figure rewarded for defection of his friend and his coming over to Lincoln. But Lincoln, great lawyer that he was, great debater that he was, had that manly and profound respect for great and powerful adversary which could not be given to weak and fawning friend. So from the ranks of the mighty who opposed him in the great national convention he selected the learned, tactful, politic Seward; the profound, though ambitious, Chase, and the mighty Cameron. Lincoln knew that these men would not bow and scrape, 'that thrift might follow fawning,' but believed in their loyalty, knew of their ability, and feared not their ambitions. In form, his Cabinet seemed to dominate him. In fact, as history now settles, the Cabinet as a whole, as well as its individual members, bent and were guided by his will so that throughout the great struggle a superlative President was supported by a premier Cabinet. [Applause.]

"To my mind, however, the supreme evidence of Lincoln's greatness was his devotion to the great constitutional purpose of his office and the clear recognition of the three great departments of Government and their independence. Obedience to that oath requiring him to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution, which meant preservation of the Union, he kept as the pole star of his course, though the slave power threatened, though abolitionists demanded emancipation, and though his own conscience bespoke his breaking the chains. He was a minority President. The people of the United States had not voted for emancipation, and Lincoln, true to his obligations to the situation and the people, refused to make a divided opposition the means of carrying out a doctrine favored by him but for the enforcement of which only a minority of the American people had apparently voted. So, above the curse of the slave power, the impatient demand of the abolitionist, and the pleading of our conscience, which for years has bidden him strike slavery a great blow, he kept the one purpose of union to the fore and never resorted to a blow against slavery until that blow appeared to be the one which while incidentally destroying slavery would serve the purpose of saving the Union.

"In a western city some years ago a Cabinet officer, speaking of his chief, the then President of the United States, said that the President had an absolute master, and that master was his conscience. The American people do not object to conscience activity of any man to whom they have given the highest grant of power, but a great many do object to the undue emphasis of that personal element over the constitutional one. Conscience represents that which is best in man, but the Constitution of the United States represents the composite, crystallized conscience of the fathers, approved and supported in all its pristine purity, strength, and force through 140 years of all the people. The founders of the Republic and the builders of the Constitution gave a rule and guide for their executive officers. The people's choice was not asked if he would be ruled by his individual conscience. He was required to submit to the collective will of the people as laid down in the Constitution and developed from time to time in the laws of the land. No man would say conscience might not counsel, but the Constitution commands, and the duly enacted, unrepealed law of the land directs the way. [Applause.]

"From the proclamation, to peace; from Antietam to Appomattox, down a path of gore and glory, the Union soldiery grandly moved, and American statecraft at Washington met the trials and perplexities of that momentous period. With each diplomatic contest, Lincoln broadened and strengthened. With each new victory in the field he endeared himself to the Army. Mothers were comforted at home and mercy prevailed in camp and Cabinet as had never been experienced in the riot of war. Soldiers on bed of pain died blessing him, or, inspired with his hopeful spirit, early convalesced, to return to their posts. [Applause.] The grave problems of finance were met with a genius that startled and astounded the financiers of Europe. And while Jefferson Davis was handicapping and removing his ablest generals to replace them with doubtful experiments, Lincoln was selecting his ablest leaders and aiding them to accomplish their well-planned victories.

"And so after the grim concord of Appomattox, Lincoln stood upon a pedestal above and beyond where statesman ever stood—the incarnation of Americanism—not only the leader of his country back to what it was, but he had led it further to what it should always have been and, please God, ever may be—a constitutional, perpetual Union, with every statement of the Declaration of Independence made a living, pregnant truth. [Applause.]

"Had the Civil War been planned as a great drama, there could have been selected no more fitting tragedy for its finale than the sad and awful ending of Lincoln's life. It shocked the moral sensibility of the world and filled many million hearts with hate for the assassin. But, after all, if we regard as the chief earthly end of man to be a commanding place in history, it may have been better for the historical Lincoln that at the zenith of his renown, standing on the Nebo of his national unification, he was not permitted to partake of the milk and honey of the promised land beyond. He was saved the unpleasant political conditions that followed the close of the war. He died at the summit of the world's good opinion, and upon that summit, among the primates of history, the ages can gaze and fairly judge. [Applause.]

"Booth's bullet had done its fatal work. The kindly eye had closed to look upon a fairer world than ours. The last slow pulsation of life had ceased. The great heart was forever stilled. The mighty form had taken on the final rigor of dissolution, when flashed the genius of Stanton, the great war secretary, who long had yielded a complaining though zealous and faithful obedience to his chief while living, inspired as philosopher and prophet, paid the never surpassed tribute to the dead, 'Now he belongs to the ages.' [Applause.]

"He is with us now. His great memory is pleading for Americanism. His mighty example is conjuring us to stand by the Constitution of the fathers as against a confederation of those whose republicanism has never been tried, or, if tried, might not exhibit devotion to American interests. [Applause.]

"We are closing up, I hope, the greatest war of all time. I would it might be the last. We who gave of our substance and that richer contribution of our sons are becoming impatient that three months have elapsed in debate which seems to show as its most striking result an impudent defiance in a February foe who in November knelt in supplication. I hope our wise commissioners will settle the grim terms of victory with our enemy before we convert our friends into active disputants.

"We ought soon to bring the living soldiers now over there home to waiting families and employment. They were raised to be American soldiers, but not policemen of Continental Europe. [Applause.]

"Our first-born man child lies in the last long sleep over yonder. I want all that remains of him brought to America, to rest under the flag of his country, which he loved and served. He was an American. He believed in protecting all American rights on land and sea. He believed in avenging American wrongs with all our power. But, like his father, he believed in America fighting our own battles and dictating our own terms of settlement, without involving this country in the perplexing problems of the Old World. [Applause.] I do not know what you think of it, but I do not believe in exchanging a controlling interest in a sound, solvent, vigorous Monroe doctrine for a minority interest in a league of nations, whose available assets were insufficient for charter fees and expense of organization, while the liabilities would be measured by the number of our sons and the amount of our national wealth. [Applause.]

"Monuments of marble, shafts of granite, and statues of bronze are and will be raised throughout the land to commemorate Lincoln's name and secure his fame. On these will be traced and carved purest sentiment of poet and the profoundest thought of the sage. But marble will wear and waste under the 'fretting tooth of time.' An earthquake may rend granite shaft and changing seasons may rust and obliterate the statue of bronze. To see Lincoln's final monument you must look past marble wall, granite shaft, and statue of bronze to the temple of our country's wealth, valor, and honor firmly set upon the eternal base of perpetual union and unqualified independence. [Applause.]"

Deficiency Appropriations for Transportation Systems.

OF

HON. RICHARD WAYNE PARKER,

OF NEW JERSEY.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Friday, February 21, 1919.

On the bill (H. R. 16020) to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for carrying out the act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, this bill appropriates $750,000,000 in addition to the revolving fund of $500,000,000 provided by the act, altogether $1,250,000,000.

It is estimated that this appropriation will take care of the transportation systems until the end of this calendar year, December 31, 1919. During the year 1918 nearly $200,000,000 ($196,000,000) was spent in dividends that were not earned, but paid over to the railroads as part of the standard return. Nearly $100,000,000 ($91,952,135) is in the hands of various agents for carrying on the operation of the roads. Nearly $350,000,000 has been advanced to various railroads or invested in various equipment—loaned New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. $51,475,000; inland waterways, $4,361,486; additions and betterments $290,918,283—and at the end of the year there was nearly $250,000,000 ($247,100,000) cash on hand.

This sum is less than the ordinary cash payments of a single month, and it is thought necessary that it should be increased by about $100,000,000, and there are about $650,000,000 ($659,840,000) of necessary improvements and equipment which are expected to be spent during the year 1919.

The $750,000,000 appropriated is expected to be for this equipment and these improvements and to add $100,000,000 to the operating fund of cash.

The sum is stupendous but does not seem to be too large for the necessities of the case. High prices and wages have made railroad business cost so much that it is not sure that it can be done at a profit even with the present increase in rates, especially as the business has fallen off for a time after the stoppage of war activities and during the uncertainty which attends everything during an armistice.

I have voted for this bill. Under the railroad-administration act the railroads can be returned to their owners, as they should be so returned at the earliest possible moment. There is no insurmountable difficulty in doing so, so far as past advances are concerned, as immediate payment would not be required, and the United States under the law and the contracts has a lien for the amounts advanced. The case is different as to the necessary equipment and betterments which have already been ordered and which will be delivered during the year 1919, as well as the other large expenses on capital account expected to be made during that year. The railroads could not finance the payment of this $650,000,000. They have been given no notice so to do, and they must certainly be carried until the Government has issued what will be the last liberty loan in May next. It would break the market for our bonds if we did not do so. This appropriation will carry them to the end of December.

I am one of those who think that that date should terminate railroad operation by the United States. It is said that Congress ought first to pass proper legislation, but it is plain that no such legislation will be passed until the time for the return of the railroads has been definitely fixed. When that is done all parties—the railroads, the administration, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Congress—will be eager to settle all matters and adjust them on a proper basis.

This settlement is not so mysterious or difficult as many people would have us believe.

First. The advances which shall have been made for the United States to or for the account of any of the railroads will have to be ascertained and funded, and if no other security can be given the United States can retain the right to retake possession if interest and proper installments of principal are not paid. The whole equipment question will be settled through the medium of equipment trusts. Legislation seems to be already sufficient, as very large powers of adjusting claims are given in the railroad bill. If any other powers are necessary to be given to settle and adjust liens of the Government with the railroads, it can be done by a single clause.

Second. Rates will have to be raised above those which existed before the war, unless prices and wages shall fall to their former level, which is not likely at present. These rates can be and will have to be adjusted by the Interstate Commerce Commission. That commission was shy of any rash haste in raising rates, but now that the increase has been made and tried out by the Government administration of the railroads the commission will have no hesitation in doing what is right to secure proper income to the railroads, more especially as this is necessary for the protection of the Government itself and the return of its advances.

Even with the increased rates our freight business is the cheapest in the whole world.

Third. Water transportation should be allied with the railroads; it never can rival them, because points reached by navigation are not usually the terminal of travel, which must be taken to the door of the manufacturers by railroads. Our present statute which prevents railroads from operating boats is absurd. It might almost be added that the present unit of transportation is the carload. It is admitted that the only style of water navigation which has increased during the last 10 years by leaps and bounds is the car float and the lighter. It may be possible that we shall see whole fleets of car floats plying on the Mississippi and avoiding all cost of maintenance of way, while the cars can be delivered all along the river to the various railroads that wish them. The Cleary bill would provide for all this and is included in the pending river and harbor bill.

Fourth. All railroad terminals should be at the service of each and every railroad on proper tolls and under proper regulations. These can not be prescribed by statute but can be settled without difficulty by the Interstate Commerce Commission in such manner as that no injustice shall be done to the owners of the terminals if power to do so be granted.

Fifth. There is a strong outcry in some quarters for the abolishing of the Sherman Antitrust Law and the establishing of pools in railroad business. If any such measure is to be attempted it should be with deliberation and under the strictest regulations and can well be postponed until after the roads are returned.

Sixth. Federal incorporation of all railroads and Federal regulation not only of interstate commerce but that within the State has been greatly urged, but this also need hardly be made a condition of return of the railroads.

The Congress and the Nation feel that $1,250,000,000 is enough to advance in the experiment of railroad operation. The advance was necessary from causes which were possibly not the fault of railroad management, although much could have been saved for these necessary appropriations to freight service and terminals if there had not been so much lavish expenditure upon passenger service and terminals as well as in the recent wasteful process of scrapping all their old equipment and replacing it by cars which were so heavy as to require new roadbed and bridges and a maintenance which is much more costly than formerly. Men of experience in railroads have for years doubted the expediency of this wholesale change in the operation of the roads.

These changes have, however, now been made, with the aid of the General Government, and in the exigencies of the war they have been paid for. The Government will be a lenient creditor, though it has not been a good railroad manager or economist, and it is to the advantage of the whole people that a date should be named when the roads shall go back into private hands. The date of peace is in the future, and 21 months after that peace is too far away and too uncertain. The amount that we have appropriated carries us only to December of this year. To wait even six months after that means more appropriations and fixing the time in the middle of a presidential campaign. Any untangling must be done after this Gordian knot has been cut by fixing the date at which the railroads shall be returned at the close of this calendar year, as proposed by an amendment to this bill, which ought to be adopted.

OF
HON. JOHN M. C. SMITH,
OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 24, 1919.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me by the House I desire to extend my remarks by submitting for printing in the RECORD a speech delivered by Hon. J. W. FORDNEY before the Michigan Society of New York City at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel on Friday evening, February 21, 1919:

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY.

I feel highly honored to be invited to speak on this occasion. I am always pleased to meet a gathering of Michigan people. I love my home State and I love her people.

The subject on which I wish to address you, "After the war legislation," permits a wide range and involves many important questions of vital interest to our people at this particular time, among the most important of which are Government finances, the railroad problem, the merchant marine, Government control over many industries, and the Army and Navy.

Generally I believe in "Government hands off of business." Government control means political interference and political pull; control, not by the great captains of industry, but by the policical office seeker—which does not spell industrial success.

When I speak of politicians I do not mean a man holding an elective office. I mean those seeking political appointment—soft snaps and good pay. On the contrary, I find men in Congress to be generally of the highest type of intelligence and character—honorable men.

Imagine a politician of the former type, selected by the President of the United States, directing the management of the United States Steel Co., or the Bethlehem Steel Co., or any other of the large and varied industries. Why, during the war the politicians failed and the President was forced to call upon experienced men to direct large affairs at a salary of $1 a year. The aircraft construction was a scandal until a practical business man was called to the helm. Ship construction lagged and bade fair to be a failure until a man of business experience was put in control.

Our merchant marine under Government control must and will prove a financial failure; it can not be otherwise, operated under existing marine laws.

The best evidence of this assertain may be proven by an examination of the recent Government control of the railroads and steamship transportation lines—a glaring and signal failure.

Government control threatens us with dangerous political machinery which would endanger the very foundation of our governmental institutions. Weak politicians would yield to the demands of socialism and anarchy, with the hope of gaining that vote. Already too much catering to those elements by office seekers has created a situation in our midst that is deplorable. The time has arrived when the strong and firm hand of the Government must be felt by the classes I. W. W. and anarchy.

The most gratifying news to the law-abiding citizens of the United States flashed over the wires for many weeks was that of recent date to the effect that 51 I. W. W.'s had arrived at Ellis Island from Seattle, Wash., for deportation. Let the good work go on, and we will soon have peace and happiness in our land. The English-speaking nations will not tolerate such unlawful organizations, and the red flag must have no place in this law-abiding Republic.

These are times when words from the wisest among us are needed; the careless word should not be spoken. More than ever before in my life I long for the power to speak words of wisdom.

The people throughout the entire world are giving more sober thought and consideration to the duties of citizenship than perhaps at any other period of the world's history. They are studying conditions in local, State, and National Government. Uppermost in their minds is the desire to better conditions throughout the world.

What can we do to better conditions? The power and the responsibility rest with the people. Their duty they should know; and knowing, they should act.

Public opinion creates free government and upholds it for good or for bad.

Public opinion, no matter how good, if indifferent, has but little force.

Public opinion, to obtain real reforms and maintain them, must not be spasmodic; it must be vigilant, vigorous, and constant—as sleepless in its activities as the enemy of justice and right is always known to be.

Execution of public affairs will generally follow public judgment. The public should select men of ability and character to public office; they are the people's servants, not dictators. They must obey the people's commands.

Lincoln, on his journey to Washington in 1861, speaking at Indianapolis, Ind., said:

> In all the trying places in which I may be placed—and doubtless I will be placed in many such—my reliance will be upon you, the people of the United States. I wish you to remember now and forever that it is your business, not mine alone.

As a public servant, did any man ever more clearly speak the truth?

Interest in public affairs, State and National, should ever be present in the minds of the people. It is their duty; it is honorable. No citizen is too great and none too humble to be exempt from such duties.

You can not hope to improve public affairs by withholding your own good offices. If you would purify our political atmosphere and political life, you must lend your own energy, virtue, intelligence, and honesty to do it.

The business men of this country have a great responsibility devolving upon them. It is no easy task at this time to keep the wheels of industry moving. Idle mills mean idle capital, and idle capital means idle men, and the poorest asset of a nation is an idle man.

In the whole world the thought that the employer is the enemy of the laborer has become too common. The agitator who would have the laborer believe his employer is his enemy is the friend of neither, but, on the contrary, is the enemy of both and deserves suppression.

One of the greatest favors that one man can extend to another is to furnish him with employment at remunerative wages that he may provide for himself and his dear ones a comfortable home.

Factories are always anxious to run. To close down means loss of money, depreciation of machinery and all property connected with the institution, followed by impoverishment to the owner, loss to the community in which the factory is located, and destitution to those who were employed. The owner is anxious to have the factory run; he wants his investment to earn him something. If he can not run at a profit, he is bound to close down.

Production means consumption. The capacity for consumption of an idle man is not so great as that of the man who is employed.

Consumption of American-made products means employment for American laboring men. The best market in the world for the products of the United States is with our own people.

Our annual sales abroad, during normal times, are less than 10 per cent of our total production. Therefore to throw down the bars and invite in the products of the cheap labor of the world, while we chase rainbows around the globe to find a dumping ground for a small percentage of our output, and at the same time neglect our best market, is, in my opinion, poor business judgment. We want a foreign market for our surplus, but we do not want it at the cost of the loss of our home market.

Think of the vast amount of capital invested in this country and the effort necessary to keep it going. Capital is entitled to fair treatment; when unfairly treated labor suffers most. When capital is idle, both capital and labor draw upon their own resources—each is unprofitable when the other is unemployed.

I am sure the people are surprised when they learn that our manufactured products exceed annually $20,000,000,000 in value and our agricultural products $12,000,000,000—I speak of normal times and normal prices. In 1910 the wealth of this country was estimated to be $187,500,000,000, and it is estimated to be at the present time $265,000,000,000—equal to the combined wealth of Great Britain, Germany, France, and Russia.

If you will divide by 24 our population as shown by the census of 1910, you will have the population of 120 years prior to that time or that as shown by the census of 1790. If our population continues to increase at the rate it has in the last 120 years, 100 years hence we will have over 2,000,000,000 people. You may ask, Where will we put them? My answer is that we will not then have as dense population as did Belgium in 1915, prior to the war—652 persons per square mile. Our population now is about 30 people per square mile.

The matter of Government finances at present is one of much concern. Our expenditures for the past three years have been equal to our total expenditures from the establishment of the United States down to three years ago.

Our outstanding Government obligations—bonds, certificates of indebtedness, and war savings stamps—on January 1 were $21,000,000,000, and we are adding to that sum daily through our bonds authorized but not yet disposed of, of which there are over $5,000,000,000. The administration is asked for an additional authorization of $2,000,000,000 certificates of indebtedness and $7,000,000,000 noncirculatting Treasury notes, to run from one to five years. This request astounds the people.

If these bonds are disposed of our annual interest account will exceed $1,500,000,000.

The rate of interest future bonds are to bear demands the careful consideration of our wisest statesmen. To sell Government bonds now, bearing a higher rate of interest, would undoubtedly greatly depreciate the value of outstanding bonds and would be unjust to the present holders of bonds.

I believe a tax-free bond, bearing interest at 3½ per cent, would sell at par, while a taxable bond, bearing interest at 4¼ per cent, would not find ready purchasers. It appears to me it would be wise to give future purchasers the option as to a tax-free bond at a low rate of interest or a taxable bond at a higher rate. Of course, the small purchaser will choose the high-rate bonds, as holders of bonds to an amount not exceeding $5,000 are not taxed on their interest income.

There is one matter on which we are all agreed: We must not allow our credit to become tarnished.

The outflow of gold will not disturb us if the inflow is great enough. The outgo is not serious if the income exceeds it. We must preserve a balance of trade in our favor to insure an inflow of gold.

False theories can not long blind the eyes of the people in the face of cold facts.

Business experience is the best light to guide us in the future pathway of progress and prosperity.

We can not profit by quarreling over the past; we must look to the future. Whatever differences we may have had we must now agree that the situation is such as to require the highest sagacity in statesmanship. We must not permit the credit and the honesty of our Government to be questioned. We must and will provide, somehow, in some sensible way, the collection by taxation of a sum of money to meet the needs of the Government to pay our annual expenditures—that being done, we have done well.

Our Army and our Navy command our wisest counsels. I do not favor a large standing army. The expense would be very great on the taxpayers.

To demand the largest navy in the world, while in the same breath shouting for a league of nations solely for the purpose of the prevention of wars, is, in my judgment, the rankest inconsistency. It seems to me that we can not need both for the security of the Nation.

The demand for Government ownership of railroads comes from the thoughtless, the reckless, and the selfish classes of people. No effort of that kind has ever met with financial success by the people of any country in the world; on the contrary it has always proven to be a financial loss. I challenge successful contradiction.

Our freight rates per ton mile, prior to the war, were one-half those of any other nation in the world (Japan excepted), while our railroad wage scale was double that of any other nation in the world (Canada excepted), and Canada's railroad wage scale was below, and Japan's freight rates 25 per cent above ours. The taxpayers are now called upon to pay a loss for last year of over $755,000,000 for the folly of the Government of taking over the railroads, while, at the same time, they were compelled to pay extra passenger fare and extra freight to an amount exceeding that sum.

Does the wildest imagination of any reckless brain believe that one man, a director general, seated at Washington, D. C., inexperienced in railroading, no matter how competent he may be in other things, can as efficiently and economically manage the 750 railway systems in the United States as can the 750 well-trained, thoroughly experienced railroad managers who are quite familiar with all the needs of the people in their particular vicinities? I believe not.

Two million railroad employees under Government control. Oh, what a political machine! Unscrupulous politicians would try to organize, under Government ownership or Government control.

I appeal to you, gentlemen, to use your influence and exert your energy against such tendencies in our legislative bodies.

The present Congress has accomplished much in the past two years—most important matters have occupied its attention. A vast amount of war measures has been enacted, both political parties acting as one, no political lines being drawn in all war legislation. The United States Treasury has been provided with almost countless billions, the taxpayers making but little complaint. The people as a whole have come forward and purchased Government bonds with such freedom and patriotism that the like was never exhibited before by any people on earth.

In this war $180,000,000,000 of the world's wealth has been blown away. Suffering and bloodshed have been beyond comprehension, and more than 10,000,000 souls have perished. Oh, what a sacrifice and what a crime! God grant we do not lose by negotiation what we have won on the battle field.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALLEN T. TREADWAY,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 24, 1919.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address delivered by my colleague the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] in Boston on Saturday, February 22, before the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Massachusetts.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF MR. TILSON.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Toastmaster, your excellency Gov. Coolidge, and members of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company, every truly resourceful speaker, whether of the platform or after-dinner variety, ought to be able to connect himself either by affinity or consanguinity with the locality in which he speaks. I can only approximate it in this instance. Some 8 or 10 generations back one of my paternal ancestors lived down Cape Cod way, at a little place called Plympton. Two or three generations later my branch of the family wandered off south and, when I was born, lived in Tennessee. I started back toward Massachusetts, got as far as Connecticut, and stopped. This is as close as I can come to making a connection.

It has long been one of the ambitions of my life to attend a gala occasion of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Boston. That ambition has been whetted rather than dulled as I have observed through so many years how you have been "advertised by your loving friends," the funny papers, and the New York Sun. When I saw the country headed for prohibition and a perpetual drought decreed both by presidential order and constitutional amendment I had almost given up hope, when out of a clear sky came the invitation to be with you to-day. Imagine my appreciation. The very last chance before July 1. By reason of a four months' sojourn in Arizona—of course, the selection of the place was not voluntary; I was in the Army—I discovered that the rarest plants do not always thrive in arid soil. However, you are of hardy growth, and I hope to see you survive the drought of the coming years just as you have so staunchly withstood the flood of the years that are past.

In visiting you I confess to one surprise, and it was a pleasant one. I did not anticipate seeing a lot of immature boys, but you are an aggregation of even more mature young men than I had expected to find. It is delightful to see so fine a group of men carrying the exuberance of youth almost to middle life.

As an organization, continuous and self-perpetuating, you are older than the Nation itself. You were present at its birth, did notable service in bringing it into existence, attended it through its perilous youth, assisted manfully in bringing it through the period of adolescence, and through its entire life of almost a century and a half up to the present hour, in peace and in war, have played a worthy part in its proud history. I feel, therefore, that I can speak to you as the present embodiment of all the best traditions of your honored past. You stand buttressed by the accomplishments of the days that are gone, but with eyes straight ahead, ready, I fancy, to move forward to the attack of the serious problems just ahead of you. One of those problems is a permanent, adequate plan of national defense, that will not crush us by its own weight in peace time and yet reasonably insure us against being crushed in time of war. It is not an easy problem, but is one of the most important that must be met and solved by free peoples.

Just at present the topic uppermost in most minds is a "league of nations," although talk about it has been more or less restrained, because the teacher has stamped his pedagogic foot and said, "Silence." At the risk of being kept after school for talking out loud, I say that I am very much in favor of a league, or society, or whatever you may call it, of nations; in fact, of any sensible arrangement among nations that will cause them to pause long enough to visualize the consequences before plunging the world into the horrors of war. I say "a" league of nations, rather than "the" league of nations, for, until the President returns to interpret it, and take the padlock off our lips so that it may be discussed, we shall not know what "the" league is.

Of course, it must be understood that any league that we may enter will not and can not take away any of the attributes of our sovereignty as a Nation or confer upon any council the power to declare war for us, which by our Constitution is lodged in the Representatives of the people in Congress.

I confidently believe that some such league, possibly the very league now proposed, may become an instrument of great good. At any rate we shall be blameworthy if we do not avail ourselves of every means that will tend to lessen the danger of the recurrence of war. Instead of becoming an entangling alliance, such as Washington advised against, it should aid in preventing the necessity for such entanglement.

In spite, however, of any league that may be formed or any engagements that may be entered into, unless we would disregard the most obvious lessons of all human history, we must continue to face the problem of national defense. National defense is like individual self-defense. It is the plain duty and necessity of nations, as it is of individuals from the lowest to the highest order of creation. In the case of individuals it transforms what would otherwise be the darkest of crimes, murder, into a sacred duty. In the case of nations it makes even human slaughter righteous.

No nation is worthy the name that is not willing to defend itself against an aggressor, and no nation is wise that is not reasonably ready to defend itself. Belgium was ground under the heel of a military giant, but Belgium emerges with self-respect and the respect of the world, because she was willing to fight to the bitter end. Belgium was only partly prepared and suffered accordingly. Great Britain had neglected this primary duty as applied to her land forces, and in consequence sacrificed her so-called "contemptible army" of 160,000 men and almost lost the war.

In our country we have always been inadequately prepared. In the war just passing we have paid dearly in lives and treasure for our lack of reasonable foresight. No one will ever know how much unnecessary suffering was endured or how many unnecessary lives were lost in our first regular divisions to go overseas, and in our own Yankee division, the Twenty-sixth, and in other units, by reason of lack of preparation. I hope you will agree with me that never again in the annals of our Nation's history shall it be permitted to come to pass that our property, our lives, our liberty, and our very existence as a Nation shall be dependent upon the naval force of another nation for protection.

The fact can not be successfully denied that when we went into this war our condition was such that if the navies and merchant marine of Great Britain and France had been by the fortunes of war suddenly placed at the disposal of Germany, and the armies of those countries out of the way, Germany could have landed an army on American soil and marched it to Chicago without serious opposition. Untrained men without arms can not stand before an army properly armed and disciplined, nor can brave and well-disciplined men not adequately armed prevail against such an army. We have never had sufficient rifles, machine guns, cannon, and ammunition, nor the facilities for quickly providing them, to say nothing of the newer weapons of warfare, to repel an invasion by any power controlling the seas. I hope that never again will we lull ourselves to sleep in the false security provided by mere agreements, however binding in form, or under the protecting care of a foreign though friendly navy. Nothing short of reasonably adequate preparation to defend ourselves at all times should ever again be permitted.

Prophets and dreamers of all ages have foretold the time when war shall cease. Perhaps no passage in the entire Bible is better known than that in Isaiah, repeated in Micah, foretelling a day when men "shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks." Everybody remembers and quotes this beautiful Scripture.

Not so many recall that the Prophet Joel, whose commission as prophet is just as regular and signed by the same authority as that of Isaiah and Micah, brought in a minority report on the subject in which he says: "Prepare war. Wake up the mighty men. Beat your plowshares into swords and your pruning hooks into spears." I have never been able to understand why Isaiah's prophecy should pass at its face value, while Joel's words are scarcely remembered, unless it is because Isaiah's rank was a major of prophecy while Joel was probably only a lieutenant.

I shall leave the subject of prophecy with this one additional observation: If I remember my Bible history aright, Isaiah and Micah both lived in the time of Hezekiah, King of Judah. Their prophetic dream unfortunately became in effect the governmental policy of Judah. Captivity in Babylon was the result. Joel lived after the exile. Those who returned from the captivity were a sadder but wiser people. They were subjects of the Persian Empire and paid tribute to a foreign master. Gone was the glory of Israel; gone her name and place among the nations; gone the liberties of her people. In the light of all that had transpired, if Joel had preached the pacifist doctrine of Isaiah and Micah he would have been as popular in Judea as William Hohenzollern now is in the entente countries.

If I understand correctly the message of Joel, it should read something like this: "Fellow Israelites, you have seen what comes of having all plowshares and pruning hooks and no swords and spears. If Israel would become and remain an independent, self-reliant nation she must have more swords and spears, even if we have to go shy on agricultural implements."

You do well to celebrate the birthday of the immortal Washington. It is well for us to turn occasionally to the teachings of that staunch patriot for advice. The essence of the problem in Washington's day was much the same as it had been in the history of all preceding nations from the earliest recorded time, and his advice, so sound at the time it was given, is just as good to-day. In that remarkable document known as the Farewell Address he admonishes us to "take care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture." In another connection he says, "avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it." Prophetic words! In a speech to Congress on January 8, 1790, he said:

> A free people not only ought to be armed but disciplined, and their safety and interests require that they should promote such manufactories as tend to render them independent of others for essential, especially military, supplies.

The central thought running through much of his advice is that peace is the best time to make preparations for war.

Unfortunately, we did not follow Washington's advice. No war that has occurred in our entire history has found us "in a reasonably defensive posture," and the unnecessary sacrifices in all these wars have been due to our lack of wisdom in not following his sage advice.

It is too well known that we were sadly lacking in preparation for our part in the great world conflict which, we hope, has ended. At first attention was directed almost exclusively to the question of training our man power. Under the wise provisions of the selective-service act it soon became apparent that there would be no difficulty in securing the necessary men. The training of the men was found to be a less difficult job than had been anticipated. By intensive training, three months were found to be sufficient to make creditable soldiers, and certainly six months would suffice to make excellent soldiers.

I believe that the lesson of this war, so far as man power is concerned, is that it is not wise to train only a few men as professional soldiers and leave all the remaining man power of the country entirely untrained. In my opinion the most obvious lesson to be drawn from the war as related to man power is that our entire young manhood ought to be trained in the rudiments of military discipline, and that this should be done under a system of universal military training. Such a system will be highly beneficial physically, mentally, and morally, will teach a much-needed lesson of discipline and proper regard for authority, and tend to impress our young manhood with the proper sense of the obligations of citizenship.

The one thing that caused us the greatest trouble throughout the war was not the personnel of an army, but the matériel with which an army must fight. Our lack in this respect was a startling revelation. Few people knew how short we were of arms, ammunition, and military supplies generally until we were actually involved in the war. Scarcely anyone seemed to realize the difficulties in the way or the time required for producing these things. It was along this particular line that my principal work during the war lay.

Living in the midst of an industrial beehive, representing in Congress an industrial people, it was my duty, as it was my pleasure, to know something about production as applied to manufacturing. Being a practical student of military affairs, I applied myself long before we entered the war to a study of the problems of producing war materials. I perceived what would be our situation in case we ever became involved in war. I thought I saw the remedy and believed that it would meet the situation if vigorously applied in time of peace. I stood upon the housetop and proclaimed my message. Few heard it, and very little was done. The war came to us; we were not ready, and we have paid the price, at least we have paid in part and owe a huge balance.

I do not say it by way of criticizing anybody and do not intend to infer that anyone else could have done the job better, but the truth must be told, so that in future years we may not be misled and may not then act upon misinformation.

It is well known that we did not get a single American-made pursuit airplane to the fighting front. A few hundred De Haviland 4 day-bombing planes reached the war zone, and some of them actually went over the German lines. Our brave flyers fought in such French airplanes as we could get.

Our artillery ordnance program had scarcely begun to materialize when the war ended. We had almost none of our own heavy guns and only a few kinds of our own ammunition. We were practically without tanks, except as we procured them from our friends. Our machine gunners mostly used the French Hotchkiss and Chaucat guns, with French ammunition, until within two months of the end, and some of the divisions used them to the day of the armistice.

Our infantry carried rifles made in the United States of America, but more than half of them were the British Enfield modified and made with the tools, dies, gauges, and fixtures ordered by and made for the British Government.

In a nutshell, this is what the greatest manufacturing Nation on earth did toward military preparation during 19 months of actual war at an expense that is staggering, and will continue to stagger our children's children. This is what we were able to do to back up our brave men. No praise is too high for their heroic deeds done under the most discouraging conditions, but we should not forget the lessons their sacrifices have taught.

The fact that we played an honorable, even a decisive, part in ending victoriously the great struggle may serve to blind the unthinking or undiscriminating. I fear that we are in danger of permitting ourselves to return to the same old fool's paradise in which we have lived so long.

A man who permits himself to reason that because we went into a war unprepared and came out victorious, therefore we can safely dispense with all preparation, is on a par with that loyal Democrat whom we last heard of in 1908. He said he was going to vote for Mr. Bryan because on both the other occasions when he had voted for him the country had good times afterwards.

I appeal to you as patriotic Americans to help keep us from making the mistake of suffering a relapse. If we do, even the blood-washed stones of France will cry out against us.

I envy the man who through the next 10 years has the power and privilege of advising and directing the military program of this country. Such a man will have the opportunity to earn a place for himself in the list of those who have done useful things for his country. He must not be a rubber stamp for a narrow military caste, nor must he be susceptible to the influence of those who would throw off all military restraint and discipline. If he is able and is permitted to rise to his opportunity, he will strive to train our young manhood to be ready to do their part in maintaining and defending, with their blood if need be, the rights and institutions of their country. He will plan scientifically and on a broad scale during the years of peace to quickly mobilize and utilize, in case of need, the great industrial resources of the Nation.

With such a plan of national defense worked out in concrete and practical form, we can face the future unafraid, self-reliant, independent as the men of '76 fought that we might be. In such a posture I can see the long years stretching ahead of us filled with the happy results of a peace that is worthy of a truly great people.

The deeds of the men of 1776, of 1812, of 1861, of 1898, and of 1918 made such a peace possible. Let us not betray the trust or misuse the heritage they have left us.

A Visit to the Fronts.

OF

HON. JAMES H. MAYS.

OF UTAH,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 25, 1919.

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Speaker, after considering war measures for 18 months it was natural that one should want to study war conditions at close range. Personally it had been my desire to go over the scenes of conflict and observe the extent of our preparations. Therefore when Congress recessed early in August a party of Members were advised by the Secretary of War that the authorities would be pleased to have us visit the war zone at the instance and under the authority of the department.

We took personal letters from the Secretary of War to Gen. Pershing and others, from the Secretary of the Navy to Admirals Sims and Wilson, from the Secretary of State to Ambassadors Page in London, Sharp in Paris, Page in Rome, and other diplomatic representatives of the United States.

We left New York on one of the fastest ships. The vessel carried 7,000 troops, several hundred officers, over 200 professional nurses, and a crew of 1,000 men. I shall always have in mind the picture of the vast throng of troops as they danced and sang when certain that the great ship was off. These boys had chafed and fretted from long, tedious delay; they were glad at last to get at their country's business. They realized that a great, heroic task awaited them; that their brothers in arms who had gone before them needed their assistance.

As the ship with the convoy of destroyers, airplanes, and dirigible balloons swept down the harbor many thousands of people on shore and in crowded ferryboats cheered and waved good-byes, military bands played, and the boys sang, "Send the word over there, the Yanks are coming."

I had especially wanted to see the actual process of transporting our troops across such a wide expanse of water. We mingled with the soldiers and observed the marvelous spirit which prevailed. If any were reluctant to go, they did not show it.

It was interesting to observe the care exercised by the Navy Department to prevent loss by submarine attack. Great airplanes, armed with depth bombs and machine guns, searched the waters ahead; American destroyers, fully equipped with guns and depth bombs, patrolled the surface of the sea at great speed. We were told that this ship on a recent trip had encountered two submarines at daybreak, had rammed one, cutting it in two, and destroyed the other with gunfire, taking 31 prisoners.

The first day out was quiet and beautiful; the next day was stormy. It had been very hot in New York before we left, but as we approached the banks of Newfoundland and the icebergs farther north it grew very cold. We were advised that this ship took the most northerly course because of reports that submarines were in waiting.

Sunday was beautiful; services were held on board, Army chaplains discoursing to the troops.

The ship was extremely fast and no longer seemed to need any convoy protection, except its own guns, of which there were six, four forward and two aft. There was constant watch for submarines from crow's nest and towers. At dusk all hands were sent to staterooms and bunks, no lights were permitted, not even the smoking of a cigar or cigarette. Disobedience of this rule resulted in imprisonment.

On Monday in mid-ocean occurred an interesting target practice, with all six guns in action, trained upon objects thrown from the ship while vessels circled at a distance of 1,000 yards.

Tuesday the way was rough in response to a northeast gale; even some of the Congressmen violated the injunction, "Don't waste food." Soldiers generally were seasick. The regulation drills necessary to preserve an orderly abandonment of the ship in case of accident were held, nevertheless; there were several of these each day and night. Everyone knew his place and how to get there, and it was remarkable with what speed the large body of troops, crew, and passengers were handled. Fire drills were also held; alarms were given and no one knew whether or not there was real trouble. One sick soldier on being told that the ship was on fire and he must hurry to his place, said, "Let me burn with the ship." Even the nurses, who had all sorts of antidotes for seasickness, could only muster 30 per cent strong at their meals during two stormy days and nights.

On Wednesday, however, we had a very calm and beautiful day and everything was changed. Soldier bands played, the troops and nurses sang their war songs, and officers and nurses danced on the upper decks. One member of the ship's crew told me that it was interesting to note the difference in the character of the songs sung by the nurses on this ship and those on the trip before. Then they were singing, "Nearer, My God, to Thee"; "Lead Kindly Light"; "Throw Out the Life Line." Now they sang, "If you can fight like you can love, what a soldier you will be." The ship's crew were English.

We were now approaching the European danger zone and expected soon to see the convoy of American destroyers. The captain told us that these swift, efficient vessels were the terror of the submarines and had rendered remarkable service.

My colleague and I mingled with the troops and ran onto 15 Utah boys. We asked them to come to our stateroom and we talked to them, getting the names of their folks, to whom we sent letters telling them we had seen the boys.

The ship pursued a zigzag course in order to frustrate the aim of the U-boats. Reports were received that submarines had been advised of our general course and were lurking in our pathway. These reports came to us by wireless and caused a digression in our course. An unusual alarm occurred late at night, accompanied by shooting and bursting of depth bombs. We were hoping that a submarine had been destroyed, and some reports to this effect were circulated, which we could not confirm. There was but little confusion, even in the darkened ship; everbody moved as he had been drilled.

An Army officer aboard was making his third effort to get over, his ship having been torpedoed twice upon former journeys.

Great credit is due to our Navy for its wonderful work in transporting troops abroad. In cooperation with the British fleet they were able to send the first million troops across 3,000 miles of ocean, infested with the ruthless submarine, with a loss of less than 200 men. The second million had gone forward without the loss of a single soul. This, in spite of the positive announcement of the Imperial German Government that no transport of soldiers or supplies would be permitted to land in France. Not only has this enormous number of troops been transported, but every item of supply, from socks to helmet, and every portion of the food, and all guns and ammunition have also gone forward in such quantities that no army in the world's history has been so well fed and clothed and so completely supplied.

We can get some idea of the enormous task when we know that for every soldier in France there must go forward each day 50 pounds per man of supplies; and we saw no troops that had ever missed a meal, except some of those who were so rapidly chasing the Germans that the supplies could not catch up with them in time. Everyone in Europe, including Army officers, prime ministers, and kings, marveled at these tremendous accomplishments.

Thirty hours out from port we were awakened at early morning by stewards announcing that four American destroyers were alongside; so far since the first day out we had depended upon our speed and guns.

The sight of those four well-equipped destroyers floating the Star-Spangled Banner was certainly an inspiration. We were impressed by the fact that in spite of our war activities the sea was not congested with traffic; we saw only two or three ships during the entire voyage till we reached the danger zone; we then passed a fleet of some 20 American ships carrying 60,000 men; these were accompanied all the way across by a dozen American destroyers, and through the danger zone were several hydroplanes, dirigibles, and large sausage balloons used for observation purposes. It would have been a venturesome submarine, indeed, to show even the top of a periscope under such circumstances. We passed near the spot where the Lusitania was sunk, and not far from the place where the Justitia went down.

At this point reports came that a submarine had been sighted. Several destroyers rushed forward dropping depth bombs, which blew great volumes of water high in the air. We did not know whether a submarine was destroyed, but had hopes.

Under these happy circumstances we landed at 11.15 a. m. at Southampton, England. The next day we called at the American Embassy in London to plan our program in that country, intending to spend three days studying war conditions and then going on to France. Our ambassador and military authorities, however, urged us to spend at least a week in England. We therefore concluded to visit first the soldiers' rest camps, where our boys were stationed for a few days before being taken to the front; second, the German prison camp; third, rehabilitation camps; fourth, our own fleet and the grand fleet of England, also the aviation fields and factories; fifth, Parliament and some English statesmen.

We called upon Admiral Sims in London, delivering to him the personal letters from Secretary Daniels. He made a profound impression upon our committee, and we spent a most profitable and instructive half hour with him. The admiral discussed the campaign against the submarine. He told us there were 40,000 allied craft of various kinds engaged in war work, all protected by the American and British fleets. He spoke of the fatal calamity which would promptly befall the allied cause in case of the fleets' destruction. He said that German cruisers would promptly clear the sea of all transports, destroying everything afloat, and starve the men we already had in France. The admiral gave us a summary of the American naval operations. He said that through the use of the wireless they kept track of the movements of every submarine; surprised us by saying, "We know just now how many German submarines are operating and approximately where they are." He said our destroyers were most efficient, but more should be hurried to him. He told us that Germany was winning the war when we came into it through use of the submarines and operations of its army. He said they were destroying 1,000,000 tons of shipping per month, while only 300,000 tons were being constructed. At this rate, from a total of 16,000,000 tons, it was easy to calculate the end of the war in Germany's favor. That Government was therefore holding the Hindenburg line with complacency, awaiting the starvation and finish of the allies. We had so pursued the submarine and so increased our ship production that the monthly average loss had been reduced to 200,000 tons and the monthly production increased to 500,000. He could now announce, therefore, that Germany's ruthless submarine campaign was a failure. He said, realizing this, the Germans had launched their great army upon the March and succeeding offensives, determined to win upon the land the victory so narrowly lost upon the sea; and the admiral remarked, "They came perilously near succeeding."

He advised us, by all means, to see the grand fleet and give three days to the task; also stated we should see the great aircraft factories and fields.

At the risk of being tedious I shall discuss these war activities in the proper sequence, as we inspected them.

After calling upon the ambassador and naval authorities we were, by the help of our military department, able to visit various soldier rest camps, where the troops were given a few days recreation both before and after going to the trenches. We watched them play and drill, and were impressed by their clean, healthful appearance. They all appeared to be gentlemen as well as soldiers, and have won the hearts of the cold British people.

We next visited the German prison camp. These various trips gave us interesting rides through rural England. The British are keeping the German prisoners in a series of camps of which we visited the parent camp. The officer in charge had been informed of our visit and showed us every courtesy. He had under his jurisdiction 146 camps located in various parts of the country, convenient to labor at which the prisoners were employed. They were hired out to all sorts of occupations, principally farming. Prisoners were well treated and paid for their time. They seemed to have no desire to leave, and no single prisoner from the thousands has ever escaped. It was common to see a boy of 12 or an old man bringing in from their work in the fields a group of a dozen husky prisoners. We were permitted to talk with some of the prisoners who could speak English. First, we interviewed a bright university student of 22, who had been four years an aviator; said he learned English at the university. He wore numerous medals, including the iron cross, conferred, he said, by the Emperor for bringing down 15 allied planes. He had been shot down behind the English lines; had been well treated since. He thought Germany would win in a year more; said he had read of the arrival of vast numbers of American troops; said that Germany by great industry and economy would hold out to the end; that the Russian breakdown favored Germany, but expected no more fighting on either side from the Russians; said he read the London Times and one German paper.

Another with whom we talked was a young man of 18, who had volunteered at 14; was wounded in battle and captured; had been a machine-gun operator covering advances and retreats of armies till killed or captured; was able to kill many allies before surrendering and felt proud of the fact; had no complaint except the lack of football field at the camp.

Another had been a student of dentistry when war began; was captured at the great British drive at Cambrai; was giving his services to fellow prisoners; had no complaints.

We talked to others with the same general results. The interpreter told us the late prisoners were not so sure of victory as those captured earlier in the war, generally believing now that it would be peace by compromise agreement. They said it was absurd to think that Germany could be made to pay damages, but might be persuaded to waive claim for indemnities of allies. Many thought, however, that America would be made to pay very heavily.

We devoted odd times between these trips visiting parts of historic England, such as Parliament, Tower of London, Westminster Abbey, and the like; but of these things I will not have time to speak, as we must be confined to war activities and conditions.

On Monday we visited the rehabilitation hospitals and camps. They have these for the blind and others for those crippled. Their work is most wonderful in its results. Blind soldiers are taught useful, profitable employment. It was a great surprise to see soldiers with a leg gone walking, running, and working so naturally that you could hardly observe their crippled condition. With artificial hands they were doing many useful things. One young man wrote his name and address for me with his artificial hand with a better style than I can employ, which is not saying much for his penmanship.

Our Government has enacted legislation providing for the best of such training, and I was especially interested in this activity.

Monday we left, at 10.15 p. m., for north of Scotland for a visit to the grand fleet. We were met at the boat by the admiral's yacht and taken to the flagship of our own squadron. Our warships were lined up with the British fleet in battle array under Admiral Rodman. We inspected our flagship, then went onto the flagship of the English fleet, then traversed the entire line of battle, which was the most imposing spectacle of sea power ever assembled in the world's history. It would be impossible to overstate the significance of the naval supremacy in this world war. We asked the admirals of both fleets if a battle were expected; were told that there were as yet no military reasons for such a battle, but at any time there might develop dynastic reasons, and they believed before the Hohenzollern family gave up their hold on the German people a great naval battle would have to be fought. Every officer and man stood on his toes hoping for a battle. Some 30 days before the German fleet had ventured far out on the North Sea and the British and American fleets were at once after them; so sure were they that the Germans were caught that congratulations were passed from ship to ship that the day had at last arrived. However, through fog and smoke the Germans retreated behind the guns of Heliogoland and into the Kiel Canal.

In returning, the battle line of the two fleets, with ships 500 yards apart, extended over a distance of 76 miles, with 240 fighting craft in line. We saw the ships wounded in the great battle off the Jutlands; the crew were saving the armor-piercing shells which came through the ships as relics.

On this trip we saw many other things of interest, but this statement must be confined to matters of military interest.

Our inspection of England's activities was over, except to visit the great aviation fields and factories. We saw aerodromes where machines were being manufactured and tried out, of all sizes and types from the pursuit machine, the combat plane, to the great bombing machines of the Handley-Paige type. Each member of our party was first given a ride over the country and some 8,000 feet over London in a combat plane equipped with a Liberty motor and then taken along for a ride in the Handley-Paige. The specific dimensions of these colossal planes were kept secret from the enemy, but, unfortunately, one of them was brought down within the German lines. These machines weigh when loaded 32,000 pounds—16 tons—carrying one-half that weight of 8 tons of net load, including 6,000 pounds of explosives, and can travel with such load with full equipment for 1,500 miles without a stop, at the rate of 125 miles per hour. The wings extend with a sweep of 130 feet. Each machine is equipped with four 390-horsepower Liberty motors, making an aggregate horsepower for each machine of over 1,500. Rather heavy artillery is carried both in front and rear. These planes, Handley-Paige himself told us, will be able to bomb Berlin and return and even to cross the Atlantic within a very few months.

It was an indescribable sensation to fly so high over the city. We all voted the day the most unique of our experience so far, though we were to have even more exciting and thrilling experiences on the battle fronts.

We were now most anxious to get to France. I was personally especially anxious, as two of my boys, and possibly three, were over there somewhere.

We landed at Paris Saturday, the 24th. I went to military headquarters and ascertained the location of one of my boys and spent Sunday with him; he had been in France over a year and was able to secure leave to accompany our party on the trip to the various fronts as a sort of guide and interpreter.

On Monday, the 26th, we visited Gen. Pershing's headquarters. We carried a letter to him from the Secretary of War. We learned of our organization and systems of supply. We took dinner at the general's chateau, kindly furnished him by a wealthy Frenchman, and heard many interesting stories of the conflict.

The next day we visited schools for various activities, including the gas school, the development of gas masks, rifle shooting, machine-gun practice, and the like. Many experts in the allied armies told us that our superiority in rifle shooting was a wonderfully important factor in our recent victories, such as Chateau-Thierry.

An interesting thing to see were the pigeon farms. At one of these they produced 10,000 pigeons per month, all of which were used to carry messages from the front lines to the headquarters in the rear.

We visited great supply bases, saw the immenseness of the tasks accomplished, saw whole trains speeding on railroads we had built, carrying supplies from the ports of entry to the front; saw thousands of motor trucks from America in full speed, carrying troops in preparation for the great St. Mihiel drive. We saw guns of the very largest type en route for positions from which they could bombard the German defenses at Metz; saw miles of warehouses, hundreds of miles of railroad yards, great docks at the ports of entry, all of which had been constructed by us. We saw one factory now constructing six locomotives per day of the larger type and placing them in operation; inspected one great bakery nearing completion with a capacity of 900,000 pounds of bread per day, feeding from this one bakery 800,000 men three times per day. We observed that the construction work at this bakery was being done largely by German prisoners captured at Chateau-Thierry. We were told that these prisoners were almost famished when brought in, carrying in many cases only a little parched corn for food. At this bakery they were using wheat flour, 60 per cent hard and 40 per cent soft, with no substitutes.

Friday, the 30th, will always be remembered by us as a red-letter day, as it was our first visit to the fighting fronts. While other members of the party completed the inspection of supply bases my son and I went with an American officer to the Chateau-Thierry front. We traversed the front for 50 miles from the extreme point of contact when our troops were thrown into the breach to the present lines of battle. It will be remembered that after three years of comparative deadlock on the western front the Germans began the great drive which pushed the British Army out of their defenses and back toward Amiens for a distance of over 30 miles along a 60-mile front. The success of this effort was a great surprise and had a decidedly discouraging effect upon the allied morale. Another such a drive and the great British Army would be destroyed and driven into the sea, and the channel ports would fall into German hands. It was a supreme effort to crush the armies of England and France before America's strength could be applied. In one respect it was a confession of the failure of the submarine campaign. The drive stopped only 8 miles out of the important junction city of Amiens, which was the objective. The Germans proceeded to bring up guns and supplies for another drive, in the meantime massing vast numbers of troops and materials for the drive against Paris. This drive in May was also astoundingly successful, pushing forward some 30 miles in a salient extending from Rheims to Soissons, along a circular front of 100 miles, the point of which reached the town of Chateau-Thierry when stopped by American marines. It was evident that a similar advance in this region would put the Germans at the gates of Paris and permit its total destruction. The citizens left by the million, and the heroic French Army was badly demoralized. The immense stores and great guns were brought up in preparation for another such advance. We saw the emplacements of these enormous guns, most generally located in forests. They had been bombarding the city at a distance of 75 miles; even stronger guns were now being placed at one-half that distance from the capital city. After such elaborate preparations and with great confidence the Germans renewed the drive upon Paris on the 15th of July and tore their way through the French front. The left wing of the German Army crossed the Marne at Dormans and continued to advance until the American troops were encountered. The center was endeavoring to cross at Chateau-Thierry; the left wing extended far to the northwest through the Belleau Woods and was rapidly advancing. A breach of several miles in the French lines occurred. At this juncture the Second Division, including the famous marines, were thrown into the breach, and the heroic manner in which they performed was the wonder of the campaign. They declined to retreat, although advised by French officers to do so; instead they met the Prussian Guards in the open, as they advanced with bands playing, in regular column formation, goose stepping toward the city.

An officer who was through the battle showed us the point of first contact. It was a wheat field, without trenches or defenses; the whole countryside from that point extending along a front of 100 miles is lined with German graves. We were told that the Americans drove the left wing of the Germans back over the Marne, with a loss of over 50,000 men. We had in this fight five divisions—something over 125,000 men. The famous Prussian Guards gave way; following this French and Americans attacked the sides of the salient, and the Germans have been gradually retreating ever since, leaving the vast accumulated stores of guns and ammunition and their unburied dead. We went through Belleau Woods, where the marines and other divisions fought for three weeks hand to hand with bayonets. Artillery, and especially machine guns, were used with great effect against our soldiers, and our losses were very heavy. The timber is shattered and splintered. When you go through the remains of these great forests the wonder is that a human being could survive. German bodies were still there unburied, thousands had been cared for by our own soldiers, and they were being buried as fast as possible. A marker indicated their nationality. Guns, helmets, ammunition, shells, hand grenades, and every description of equipment were still strewn all about the woods and fields. When a soldier is wounded he immediately drops everything, with an effort to stop the blood and save his life. We each picked up a German gun with bayonet attached; some of these latter weapons are interesting, showing the barbarism of the German Army. They are provided with saw-tooth edges that will rend and tear the flesh beyond repair. Still they were protesting against the cruelty of our troops in charging machine-gun nests, the statement being made that our men do not wait to take the operators of these guns prisoners. Reason for so doing.

We saw many machine-gun nests, and there was generally a group of German graves around them. One of these guns will shoot 500 shots per minute, and are fearfully effective. They use these guns largely to cover retreats of main bodies.

We followed this devastated country through towns and cities absolutely demolished and leveled by gunfire till we came up with our advance posts, who were still pursuing the gradually retreating Germans. It was pathetic to see the refugees returning to their houses. We would observe them viewing the ruins with tears in their eyes and a most pathetically discouraged expression on their faces. In this advance we first came to the greater guns bombarding the German lines, and then to the light artillery, and next to the men in line, waiting orders to charge after the artillery had paved the way. It was interesting to see the airplanes busy directing the fire of guns. The air on this front seemed to be in our control, although we would see an occasional German plane boldly flying over the field. We talked with our artillerymen and were surprised to see them so cool under fire. Shells were bursting from German guns at various distances away. We observed that at regular intervals of four times per minute a shell was bursting in the road 200 yards from the batteries, who were laughing at the poor markmanship. A large limb had been knocked off the tree under which we stood, but they said it must have been a stray shot. An American truck bringing up shells had to pass in the road being so regularly shelled. We watched the driver turn out, drive around the danger area, and deliver his load with perfect composure.

The spirit of our soldiers is the wonder of all the allies. They inspired every allied army with confident determination. The results are apparent all along the line, and the Americans are given the full credit. It was amusing to see the artillerymen insisting on having wound stripes painted on two of their big guns struck by German shells.

Returning from this front, we visited the grave of ex-President Roosevelt's son Quentin. He had fallen inside German lines in a fight with several airplanes, shot through the head by machine-gun fire. They had buried him and marked his grave with a German inscription and placed an inclosure of birch wood.

We visited many towns along this front, including the city of Cheirry, then being gassed by Germans, and were required to wear gas masks. We were advised to hurry along, which we did. Also a number of towns more recently evacuated by the Germans, including that of Vesle, where Ludendorf established his headquarters for the final drive upon Paris. He was quartered in a great circular rock tower; his headquarters had been hit several times with shells, but remained standing. Evidently Ludendorf had left rather suddenly, as many important papers still remained in his headquarters. These disclosed his plans for a grand entry into Paris; special divisions had been set apart to lead the way.

The Germans had evidently intended to stay permanently in these towns, as they had renamed and renumbered the streets. We observed that one important public square in a larger place was renamed "Kaiser's Square." As they left the cities they destroyed them. Arrangements were about concluded to serve official notice upon Germany that city for city would be destroyed when German territory was reached unless such useless destruction immediately ceased.

We joined other members of our party and took the train for Rome in order to visit the Italian front, while necessary arrangements were being made to visit the Belgian, British, and French fronts after our return from Italy.

En route to Rome we stopped at several points and heard reports from Red Cross workers as to labors performed. At Tourraine Maj. Taylor, in charge of Red Cross work in northern Italy, told us of the homeless children his organization is looking after—some 2,000 lost from parents in the great offensive last October. In this way we spent two days on the way to Rome, finally arriving on September 4. We were met by representatives of our embassy, and arrangements had been made for a visit to the government and military authorities. All were agreeably surprised at Rome. We expected to see a very ancient place, with narrow, crooked streets and tumbled-down ruins; instead we saw a very modern city. You needed a guide to see any ruins. Of course we saw the Forum, Coliseum, the bridge on which stood Horatius, the Tiber, where Cæsar and Cassius had their swimming contests; the seven hills from which Rome ruled the world; the Apian Way, and other places of interest too tedious to mention, including the Great St. Peter's Cathedral.

We were invited to dinner at the ancient home of Augustus Cæsar, though none of Cæsar's immediate family seemed to be there to welcome us. We were shown where Cæsar and Pompeii played when boys, before they engaged in more serious affairs. We were shown the spot where Christ met St. Paul when the latter was leaving the city and told him to return to his work, and the place where St. Paul was slain and is now buried; were told an interesting story regarding the later life of Pontius Pilate, which story had recently appeared in a historical volume.

We called and paid our respects to Secretary of Foreign Affairs Sonino, one of the great statesmen of his day, and Prime Minister Orlando; both impressed us as men of very great ability; both spoke to us of the great inspiration and material aid America is furnishing in the mighty conflict. The prime minister in his speech emphasized, first, the great advantage of application of the American business principles to the war work and dwelt upon the amazing things accomplished in such an incredibly short time; second, the great moral inspiration to the Italians to have the Americans decide that the allies' cause was just after such mature, disinterested deliberation; and, third, the impressive fact that America wants no selfish gain, but is actuated by love of liberty and righteousness.

We took luncheon at a magnificent castle on one of the seven hills commanding a view of the city. Col. Perkins, a wealthy citizen of New York, is maintaining the home at his own expense as general Red Cross headquarters in Italy. Great work is being accomplished by this organization in giving relief to a stricken people. All Italian officers expressed unanimous appreciation of the unselfish and efficient service.

In the afternoon we attended a special session of the Parliament; speeches were made. We were shown the new chamber which is to be dedicated when news of victorious peace is received.

The morning of the 6th we arrived at the headquarters of the Italian armies and at once went to the front on the Piave River, visiting "the Montello" and other scenes of the great offensive in June, which resulted in such disaster to the Austrians. The Italians knew the very hour it was to begin and were ready for it. Italian machine-gun corps were called upon to cover the Austrians' approach. It meant certain death, but the machines poured an incessant fire into the advancing hosts, thinning their ranks until the operators were killed. Then the countercharge came which threw the Austrians back upon the river, which had risen during the battle to a torrent. They were much delayed in recrossing; they could not advance, and 230,000 Austrians were lost. We approached the Austrian lines and heard the shots going over our heads. The Italians gave each of us as a souvenir a shell we had seen fired into the Austrian trenches. Our officer guides were noticeably nervous for fear some accident might befall us, which would delay our arrival at the King's headquarters, as he had commanded us to dinner with him at 7.30 sharp. Any delay would have been considered a tragedy.

It was rather an interesting event. The King talked to us with reference to our visit to the front; told us he was very much pleased to have us make a thorough inspection. Upon being told that it was interesting to hear the great shells bursting, he remarked that it was so unless some one is hurt. He commented upon the excellent marksmanship of the Americans and said if they had 25 or 30 divisions of our troops in addition to his troops he would be able to go to Vienna. He desired that we should recommend the shipment of such troops to Italy. He explained why his soldiers were not such good shots as ours, saying there were no bears left in Italy at which to shoot; he apparently thought every American was a professional bear hunter. (Catching Fritz in bear traps.) One of the members thought it was important to take details of conversation, the menu, and so forth. I observed there was no milk, butter, or sugar upon the King's table. He explained they had no milk even for the babies, saying it was necessary to kill all the cows to furnish meat for the soldiers. He hoped we would examine the front carefully, and especially go to the Alps region, including Montegrappa, to see actual mountain fighting. We informed him we started for those regions the next morning. He mentioned, modestly, some of the distinguished actions of Italian soldiers, referring especially to the work of Rittza, who had recently sunk three Austrian dreadnaughts with an ordinary motor boat armed with torpedoes; and the work of Maj. D'Annunzio, who had just returned from a trip to Vienna by airplane distributing literature, including one of President Wilson's speeches.

The King remains at the front with his soldiers, by whom he seems to be very much beloved.

I wish I could adequately describe the trip to the Alps and the character of the military operations there. Montegrappa is in many respects the most wonderful thing we saw. The engineering skill in constructing mountain roads and defenses was evident upon every hand. We drove by a circular winding route to the very tops of the mountains. At a rest station halfway up we had refreshments and witnessed a spectacular battle in the air at an elevation of over 15,000 feet. We were shown the intricate tunnel system through the top of the mountain, designed for defense and attack; were led through 4 miles of tunnel through solid rock, branches of which came to the surface occasionally, looking down upon the Austrian lines. We could easily see the busy Austrians preparing their trenches and manning their guns. Shells were constantly bursting, but luckily not in our immediate vicinity. From the portals of these tunnels great guns were pointed at the Austrians and more were being installed. Aerial tramways, similar to our own in the mining districts, were bringing up ammunition and taking back the wounded.

As we returned to headquarters an Italian officer met us, saying Gen. Diaz wanted to see us at his camp. The general spoke at some length in Italian, which, being interpreted, informed us of his great pleasure in seeing us at the Italian front; spoke of the difficulties Italy had encountered, and how very greatly she had been aided and encouraged by America. He voiced the determination of the Italian Army and people to carry the war through to final and absolute victory. He emphasized the necessity of having some of our troops to assist and encourage his own. This, he said, would enable Italy to make a successful drive against the Austrians; said Austria had a preponderance of troops and advantage in position. The general said he had profound respect for the Americans and for our President, regarding the President as the leading and most powerful citizen in the world. This sentiment was voiced by men of every country we visited. The general had just that day returned from a conference with allied generals in Paris, and had learned of the great valor of our soldiers.

We were most favorably impressed with the general, as we had been with the Italian statesmen and soldiers. We have some troops in Italy training for active work at the front. These since took part in the final assault upon the Austrians.

The most cordial relations obtain between all men and officers. They jokingly introduced to us an American aviator named Wanger as the great "Austrian ace," because he had wrecked five Italian planes in training.

After visiting the mountain front we went to Venice. In these trips through various parts of Italy to and from the fronts we were impressed by the beauty and fertility of the country. Women were doing the farm work, as they were all over Europe generally. Young girls were placing barb-wire entanglement along the roads to hinder invasion. The crops were abundant for the harvest.

Papers were found, after the great victory in June, issued by the Germans, giving instructions from headquarters as to the details of pillaging crops these women had worked so hard to produce, evidence that the Germans are "gallant supermen"; that they should wait until the women had finished the crops before robbing them.

We found beautiful Venice largely deserted. The royal yacht met us at the depot for the trip down the grand canal and the city officials tendered us a welcome to their city. They showed us over the town in yachts and gondolas, pointing to the results of Austrian air raids. No guns had yet been trained on Venice, the air raids being frequent and serious, so much so that 120,000 of its people had fled and many had been killed and drowned during the panic following the raids.

We visited war activities along the lower Piave; saw the Italian fleet in control of the Adriatic, and the great aerodromes furnishing battle planes which control the air. The work of Italian aviators has been remarkable. We saw many evidences of their skill in driving away the Austrian planes.

A Capt. Leo had just returned from a flight along the Austrian lines on the lower Piave, taking a complete series of photographs, and was now arranging them in proper sequence. He was under constant fire by antiaircraft, his machine being hit 47 times and his mechanic badly wounded. By use of magnifying glasses details of the entire defenses could be disclosed.

On the 10th of September we had finished the Italian front and were en route to Paris. We met a partial shipload of the "irredenta," Italian soldiers belonging to the unredeemed portions of Italy, long in control of Austria, who had escaped from the Austrian Army and gone around the world, returning via America, enlisting there to fight the Austrians. We were impressed with the fact that it would be a very difficult thing to conquer men with such a spirit.

In every way our visit to Italy had been pleasant and instructive. Our committee was profoundly impressed with the Italian people and soldiers; it was our opinion that America and Italy are destined to benefit mutually by closer associations.

Early on the morning of the 11th we were again in Paris, ready to go to the Belgian-British fronts. Calling upon Ambassador Sharp, we were told that it would be especially desirable for us to call upon the King of Belgium, because another delegation of Congressmen had arranged an appointment and failed to appear. The King, although he had no chewing tobacco, was proud of his dignity, and had made some complaint to Washington of the disrespect shown him, and the ambassador had heard from the incident. We were unanimous in our decision to lend ourselves toward smoothing out this international tangle.

After calling upon French Premier Clemenceau and attending a session of Parliament, in which services in commemoration of the lives of certain members recently killed in battle were being held, we were ready for another battle front.

It might be said that the premier, though approaching 80, impressed us as being a man of great vigor of body and intellect. He expressed his appreciation of America's decisive assistance and of France's determination, and told us that we would hear great news from the American front within a day or so. We had heard persistent rumors of a great American drive, and hoped that we could stay until it occurred, but this was the first official information.

During the morning of the 12th the Belgian embassy arranged for our visit, and we arrived at Calais next morning. We were met by a commandant with the rank of major in the Belgian Army and driven to the army headquarters. We met the generals in charge of Belgian forces and were welcomed to the Belgian front. We examined their great aviation fields, noting developments in aerial photography and expert machine-gun fighting. Here we met an American officer, who is chief of an American military mission in Belgium, Capt. W. P. Cresson, who, in company with Belgian officers, would show us the front.

We imagined we had seen desolation along American and French fronts, but in comparison with Belgian cities, forests, and countryside, we had not. We visited towns and cities where not a wall of a building remained intact; stately and valuable forests with not a tree remaining alive as far as the eye could reach. We were later to see similar desolation in France, but so far we had beheld nothing comparable with the tragic spectacle of German depredation against the Belgians, against whom they could have no grievance. As you viewed once prosperous towns and cities wantonly laid waste without military reason a great wrath against the barbarians who wrought such ruin surged through your heart and soul and strengthened your determination to continue the war till full and complete justice shall be done.

We did not undertake to make note of the towns and cities we visited; they presented a monotonous sameness of appearance; each had a church, which was evidently the center of attack. I remember at Furnes, a once prosperous town of 7,000, now almost completely destroyed, without even a military excuse, we were examining the ruins when we saw a little, curly-haired Belgian girl of about 7 years peek curiously out of her home through shell holes. We found a little family of a mother and three children still staying in their wrecked home, in spite of the fact that shells were still falling and bursting about them. We asked why they remained, and were answered that they would leave when a place could be secured for them. We observed that both Belgian and French people are extremely loth to leave their homes. It is often all they have, and they are naturally more strongly attached than we are in America. The wanton destruction of the homes of such is one of the most tragical things of all the war.

We proceeded to the trenches under as much cover as possible, as we were under observation from German airplanes. Along this front the air seemed to be in decided dispute; anti-aircraft were busy as well as heavy artillery; shells were moaning over our heads like the wail of lost spirits, and for the first time it began to occur to us that we were doing an extremely foolhardy thing. Still we wanted to see the front-line trenches and how the men were faring there. While we got behind cover when shells were coming and machine guns were busy from airplanes, we worked our way through the devious system of trenches to the front. The country of Flanders has been inundated by lifting great gates at high tide and through diversion of water from canals; while this added to the defensive strength of the country, it makes life in the muddy trenches rather disagreeable and also renders aggressive action against the enemy very difficult.

We followed the front through Belgium, visiting many points of interest, including the city of Ypres, once a flourishing community of 17,000, now totally destroyed. Some of the hardest fighting of the war has occurred here. The Germans were not able in all their drives to take this city from the British. Many hundreds of thousands of men were slain here and new overcrowded cemeteries appear along the roadside. The city and roads were still being shelled. Some British soldiers stopped me and asked the news. I told them of that day's work by the Americans at St. Mihiel, and their faces brightened through the powder smoke, and with grim smiles they said, "Hurrah for the Yanks."

We observed that the square where we stood had been renamed by the Tommies as "Suicide Corner" and we moved along. On the road to Ypres a bursting shell threw fragments against our automobile, and another, lighting in the water, splashed muddy water against the windows. This was the most warlike of our experiences so far.

We saw Mount Kemmel, learning that it had recently been taken from the Germans by a Tennessee division brigaded with the British.

The next day we worked into the very front line at Dixmude. The town was still held by the Germans, the front lines facing each other along the Yser Canal. These trenches are constructed to about the depth of an average man's length, built in zigzag style to prevent their being enfiladed lengthwise by gunfire. Occasionally we would go through tunnels; everywhere we encountered mud and water. The soldiers were in little "fox holes" dug into the side of trenches and would peer out at us as we passed, each grasping his rifle ready to repel the Germans or go over the top after him when so commanded. We followed the front-line trench for a half mile or more, only 25 yards from the Germans just across the canal. We were constantly warned to keep our heads down for fear of sharpshooters and hand grenades and only ventured to inspect the Germans through the periscope. From what we saw of them we were not impressed with their beauty. Returning to headquarters we were driven to towns nearer the coast more recently destroyed by shell fire. Nieuport, one of these places, formerly having 10,000 people, now not a civilian remains. The Germans were shooting directly over the town at some Belgian batteries playing upon their lines. The large shells go through the air singing a most doleful tune, which, I imagine, would grow very monotonous after the novelty wears away.

At 5.30 we called upon the King, who spoke in slow, deliberate English of the debt of everlasting gratitude Belgium felt, always would feel, toward the great Republic. He knew that whatever might come we were the sincere friends of the Belgian people. He mentioned the relief we furnished in their distress; also the great and efficient army we had put into the field; said the accomplishment had no parallel in history. Referred to the great victory of the day before at St. Mihiel. Told us that he had been to America when a lad, and said that he would enjoy another trip when his people had been restored to their homes and happiness.

The next day we followed the desolated area, partly by machine and partly by train, along the front through Amiens to Paris. The city of Amiens was the largest of those we had visited which had been destroyed. It might be considered a total wreck; possibly one house out of ten had escaped, which was rather a large average. We had seen the type of guns which destroyed this city; in fact, the very gun which was chiefly responsible for its destruction had been captured by the British when the Germans retreated, and we examined the same. They were trying to remove the immense gun mounted on trucks, attended by a train of cars carrying officers and ammunition, when a British aviator bombarded the track, stopping the retreat, and the cavalry then captured the huge cannon and took it to Paris for the people to see.

Along the British front it was evident that the Germans were overpowered in the air. We would occasionally see a squadron of German planes approaching, but invariably they were driven away by the British; they would not risk an encounter at close range.

They told us the Liberty motor was the strongest, swiftest, and most reliable of all, and only wished for plenty of them.

We arrived at Paris on a bright moonlight night, and my son remarked that "we would probably have a German air raid tonight." We needed a good night's sleep and had to leave at 6.30 a. m. for further and final examination of the French front; therefore hoped there would be no disturbance, but at 1.30 a. m. the air bombardment began. It was certainly a noisy occasion; high-power shells bursting, sirens screaming a warning and antiaircraft bombing away. The fragments of shells killed many people, including some prominent men, but mostly women and children who had no way to escape. The airplanes had come in great squadrons from German lines down the Marne River, and went back and forth over the city dropping bombs. Fortunately two of these planes were brought down by the antiaircraft fire. Another bombing expedition had passed over us in Belgium, and alarms had been given, but they were on the way to Dunkirk, which they bombed, kindly allowing our town to escape.

At 6.30 a. m. next morning we were up and off for the final visit to the French front, taking a train for Epernay, one of the objectives of the last great German drive. In this city we went over a plateau to Rheims, a once beautiful city of 150,000 people, now totally destroyed by shell fire. En route we called upon the French major general in charge of the French armies in that sector, who told us that some 6,000 gas shells had been fired into the city during the night and morning, but he thought we could hurry through and overlook the German lines and get away without trouble, if we were lucky. The general said it was not warfare to needlessly destroy cities when compelled to leave them as the Germans were doing, but pure vandalism, for which they should be made to pay. He said: "We regard these ancient works of art, such as that beautiful cathedral, as belonging to the world, and not to France alone; they can never be replaced." We pointed to a beautiful new church just destroyed; the officer replied: "That does not matter, we can rebuild the new, but never the ancient."

At Rheims we worked our way through circular concrete passageways far beneath the earth's surface to an observation point where the German activities could be seen; they were shelling the city, and it appeared foolhardy to linger. At this point we examined a champagne cellar containing 18,000,000 bottles of the liquid joy, evidently one of the objectives of the Germany army, but defended by the French with great vigor.

Returning to Epernay at night, we planned to get an early start for the trip along the front to Fismes, Soissons, and along the general course of the late allied advances in this sector. Thousands of American troops were being pushed through in the early morning on motor trucks for a drive to be made to the northwest of Verdun. One major told us he had several million dollars' worth of immense guns on the way to the front, which he invited us to inspect. We saw them cleverly hidden from view in the daytime and being moved forward at night.

Very shortly we heard of the great advance which tore immense gaps in the famous Hindenburg line. We traversed the battle field from Epernay through the various towns destroyed; past Dormans, where the Germans effected a crossing of the Marne, only to be driven back with great loss by the Americans. Remnants of several of the pontoon bridges on which the Germans had crossed were in evidence, and the graves of Germans everywhere dotted the landscape. Outside of Fismes we were informed the Germans were actively shelling the city, having recently withdrawn to the highland across the Vesle River; they evidently feared that some home might remain standing. We took a circuitous route, and from a high position watched the shells bursting within the city. A large observation balloon was seen going up near our position, and Capt. Joubert, in charge of our party, said we would probably see a boche airplane after it presently and should get under cover, as the fragments of shells from machine guns or machine-gun bullets might do some damage to perfectly good helmets.

Sure enough, in a little while a German airplane appeared and the antiaircraft guns proceeded to practice on it. The two observers in the balloon could apparently leave in parachutes, but fortunately the plane was brought down.

We had our luncheon with us, but went into a camp of the Fourteenth United States Engineers and used their tables and chairs. Through all of this country thousands of German and American rifles and other details of soldiers' equipment strew the ground. These Engineers were engaged at the time in salvaging the material. One lieutenant told me that he and his crew of eight had gathered over $10,000 worth that morning. We observed that the French captain with us would always salute as a private salutes his superior every time we passed a graveyard.

As we proceeded south we noticed that companies were collecting and reburying the American dead and, so far as possible, marking and identifying their graves.

The French officer expressed the sentiment to us that any compromise would be false to these heroic dead whose bodies were mingling with the soil they fought to free forever from the tread of a barbarian's foot. With this sentiment and the resolution following it we thoroughly agreed. It must have been that Lincoln was inspired by that same impulse when he said at Gettysburg that "we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain," meaning, I believe, that the living are under the most solemn obligation to the dead; that the victory which they died to achieve shall be complete and lasting.

We finished the fronts and took the train at Chateau-Thierry to Paris, returning to leave for home, and the boy left for his post of duty. Another son who was in the aviation camp Pauillac was disappointed at not being able to see us. I sent his commander a telegram asking for two days' leave for him, if not inconsistent with the public service, in order that the boy might visit a day with us. He granted five days, and the lad met us at the port of entry. Together we visited the great rest camps at Brest where our soldiers have a few days after the sea voyage.

One of these camps was being made ready for use of 150,000 men. Our Army was constructing a city water system for Brest, in order to supply our soldiers' needs. We called on Admiral Wilson, who explained naval operations to us; and visited that portion of our fleet in those waters, kindly given the use of Admiral Wilson's yacht for the purpose. We inspected the beautiful ship Mount Vernon, recently torpedoed 250 miles offshore, en route home with several hundred sick and wounded. The Germans seem to take delight in torturing those already distressed. A hole 10 by 14 feet, with branches running in every direction, was torn through the solid steel plate with such force that the keel of the ship was broken. Thirty-six out of 43 men in the boiler room, where the torpedo struck, were killed; by a miracle seven escaped; one of these was blown by the force of the explosion through an air chute for 30 feet. By cutting through the steel chute he was rescued before the water reached him. He was badly burned, but recovered.

Senator LEWIS, of Illinois, and Mr. SCHALL, the blind Congressman, and wife, were on board this ship and assisted in comforting the shell-shock victims, who were much disturbed by the noise and confusion.

The captain prizes very highly an eloquent word of commendation of his conduct written in his record book by the Congressman's wife. He, in spite of the apparently fatal injury, had managed to escape another shot and get back to harbor. His great ship will soon be mended and returned to the service of transporting troops. He believed the destroyers paralyzed the submarines by use of depth bombs.

We witnessed the approach of a fleet of nine large troop ships bringing 45,000 men. We were to embark for home upon one of these ships, and therefore went aboard before the troops disembarked. It was interesting to mingle with the troops and note their eagerness for the latest news from the front. Several Utah boys were aboard, among them two high-school chums of my son. We had a nice visit in our stateroom. We told them the news and conditions at the front and that the Germans were breaking the speed limits before our advance. Their eyes glowed as they said, "We must have a hand in helping to finish this business." Leland, the boy, left with the last lighter load of troops, and we pulled away toward the west in a fleet of seven ships and an equal number of destroyers.

We had an occasional report of submarines sighted, and a few times depth bombs and guns were fired, but with no definite results. It would add immensely to this story to relate the destruction of one or more of these dreaded monsters, but the narrative would be of no interest if untruthful, if, indeed, of any interest at all.

We were convoyed for a couple of days through the danger zone, so called, and then the much-loved destroyers drew away to the northwest to meet an incoming fleet loaded with soldiers, while our ships were carrying only wounded back to their homes.

Many rumors came and went; one was that two German cruisers were at large on the high seas trying to sell themselves as dearly as possible.

A fleet of troopships passed us to the north, accompanied by a battleship and a battle cruiser, giving some strength to this rumor. We were ordered to sleep with clothes on and life preserver at hand, and were called several times each day, beginning at early dawn, to our posts for sudden abandonment of the ship. We watched each day with interest the daily wireless from the front, giving details of our great advance with the result and capture of many thousand prisoners. We were favored with one real storm at sea. There was consolation during the progress of this hurricane in the thought that a submarine lurking in our path would not get us if the storm king was to claim us for his own.

The last day after the storm the sun shone and the sea was beautiful and the news that Bulgaria cried "enough," and Turkey was asking for terms, and German soldiers to the number of 248,000 had recently surrendered, brought a degree of enthusiasm and confidence to those aboard.

Twelve days of circling and zigzagging brought us to the sky line of old New York, and five hours more to our work in Washington, thus ending our most strenuous and valuable experience.

The personal observations of war at close range deepened and intensified our prejudice. We had ventured to the battle fronts to gain a fleeting glance of the actual conflict. We had visited hospitals where the wounded, the blinded, the permanently crippled had just awakened to their condition. We had noted the remorse upon the faces of men; we had seen the pathetic expression of the blinded, vainly pleading to see again the beauties of the world.

We learned that in this war, waged with relentless fury for 50 months, there had been destroyed 1,500 towns, 450,000 houses, leaving millions of people "without roof against the rain and snow." We learned the cost to be $196,000,000,000, and, further, that the material damages had been assessed at $150,000,000,000, that the financial loss in men slaughtered and crippled and hopelessly diseased amounted to over $300,000,000,000 more.

Great Britain told us they had buried 1,000,000 men and had permanently crippled 1,500,000 more. France had counted 1,300,000 dead, 2,000,000 crippled, and 1,500,000 consumptives, the disease contracted from exposure. Italy's loss 1,000,000 dead and crippled. Austria reports 4,000,000 casualties; Russia, 7,000,000, with 2,000,000 dead upon the field, 3,000,000 lost through disease; Germany's man power was exhausted with 6,500,000 casualties.

Of our own heroic boys we had lost over 70,000 dead and 200,000 maimed and crippled. Our men had been slain by machinery, poisoned by gas, and tortured by every cruel ingenuity. We asked, Is it necessary? Is it to occur again? Has not mankind emerged far enough out of the shadows of savagery to find a better way? Can not there be tribunals of reason instituted among men? What will it profit the world if no permanent peace is secured?

Our President is arriving to-day with a sublime instrument unanimously adopted by 14 nations, representing a vast majority of all the people of the globe. Shall the labors of these earnest men, expressing the opinions of people everywhere, be nullified by the special pleadings of envious partisans?

I submit, with my approval, as the answer to this momentous question an editorial from the Deseret Evening News of my city:

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

The poorest argument against American participation in the league of nations is that which rests upon the objection to American intermingling in European affairs or becoming involved in what are called "entangling alliances." That stock phrase fitted a situation which was all right in its time, but which has long since passed away. This is the age of steamships and railways, electric telegraphs and cables, submarines, airplanes, and wireles communication with the ends of the earth; it is the age not of "splendid isolation" but of world community of interest; not of placid self-sufficiency but of magnificent interdependence. As to European affairs, it is too late now to talk about our keeping out of them. We are involved, and inextricably involved in them; we are just now bringing home some of the 2,000,000 young Americans who have been most vitally and valiantly participating in them. And as to entangling alliances, the league of nations idea proposes not to multiply but to simplify them—to make them, in a word, nonentangling.

The good ship George Washington is bearing homeward the Nation's President, prepared to give to his countrymen an account of his stewardship in presenting their ideals and maintaining their policies as to the sort of alliances that shall henceforth be contracted between nations. Whatever the world's verdict upon the plan which he is to submit for America's approval, his share in formulating it can not be denied. It may be attacked furiously by some—it may suffer that even more injurious enmity which is represented by lukewarm support. Congress will have its fling at it, probably without waiting for its champion to be on hand for its defense. The hostile press and platform will try to make capital out of it and will searchingly probe and magnify its weaknesses, and their criticism will be unsparing. It is not a perfect scheme—its warmest advocates do not claim so much. Doubtless it can be and should be amended and improved by discussion. But those who have set or shall set themselves against it because of some minor imperfection, disregarding the while the fundamental principles of human righteousness, justice, progress, and peace upon which it rests, thereby proclaim themselves backward scholars in the lessons of modern advancement and thought, blind adherents of the traditions of a long-past day, incompetent judges of the resolute new spirit of a war-weary world.

For the league of nations is coming, as surely as the dawning follows the darkness. It is coming, whether the United States joins in and becomes a leader or stays out and is left in what some canting critics persist in calling isolation, though such a thing can no longer be. It is coming, because there has been no other way proposed whereby nations can preserve their necessary relationship one toward another without recurrence of such cataclysms as that which has just shaken the earth to its foundations. And America is going to assist in, insist upon, and hasten its coming, because she, too, must maintain a relationship with the rest of the world, and does not intend to be forever compelled to wear a clanking saber or spend her substance in arms and armaments in order to be secured against the assault of a jealous, lawless foe. It frankly proposes world-wide peace and the abolition of war—a purpose which none will have the temerity to oppose. And the man who resists it on any other grounds, without being able to offer something better, is not only foredoomed to defeat but is to be pitied for the shame he will bring down upon his diminished head.

The Wheat Bill.

OF

HON. RICHARD WAYNE PARKER,

OF NEW JERSEY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 21, 1919,

On the bill (H. R. 15796) to enable the President to carry out the price guaranties made to producers of wheat of the crops of 1918 and 1919 and to protect the United States against undue enhancement of its liabilities thereunder.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, the Food Administration of the United States, especially in the matter of wheat, the staff of life, has been the marvel of this war. The wise and patriotic genius of its chief, Herbert C. Hoover, has controlled every branch of that Food Administration in such a manner as to save the world from starvation without even imposing onerous restrictions upon the people of our country. The rest of the world have been under severe enforced rations. Hoover trusted the patriotism of America and his trust was not in vain. The problem was mighty. It came to a crisis when we entered the war in April, 1917. For three years the great Russian wheat production had been cut off by the closing of the Black Sea. The ravages of the submarine had made it impossible to bring wheat from Australia or from Argentina. The crop in India had failed; the crop in Egypt and northern Africa was negligible. The most fertile parts of France were in the hands of the enemy. Our crops of 1916 and 1917 were not overabundant. Our problem was to keep the allies from starvation, and to that end we passed the act of August 10, 1917, to provide for the national security and defense by encouraging production, conserving supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Production was to be encouraged for the following years, but it was essential immediately to preserve the supply and control the distribution of wheat. Under that act the grain corporation was organized with a capital stock of $150,000,000, held entirely by the United States, and the President was authorized to make all business in necessaries subject to license; to prevent hoarding; to requisition food for the Army and Navy; to buy, store, and sell; to take over food plants and packing houses; and to regulate markets. Other war legislation had given the President war power over transportation, exportation, importation, and shipping in order to prevent our products from going to the use of the enemy, or from being wasted by our allies or by neutrals; and to take care of the soldiers in the field, the allies, and our own people. The work done by the Food Administration has been of the most intricate and marvelous character. The allies, perforce, agreed to submit the whole question of their food supply to Mr. Hoover's decision. Our people had done the same, and from that day to this not a bushel of wheat has been grown, distributed, transported, exported, imported, or sold on the markets except subject to the control of his wise administration.

It is also essential to the conducting of the war that we should encourage the production of wheat. To that end the act referred to guaranteed $2 a bushel for all wheat to be grown in 1918. This was a minimum. The President was given power also from time to time and in advance of seeding time to determine and give notice of what is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat to secure a reasonable profit. February 21, 1918, the President, by proclamation, guaranteed $2.20 for No. 1 northern spring wheat at Chicago, if the wheat should be harvested during 1918 and offered for sale before June 1, 1919; and on September 2, 1918, the President guaranteed $2.26 per bushel at Chicago for like wheat harvested during 1919 and offered for sale before June 1, 1920. As a result, our production of wheat grew by leaps and bounds. In 1917 it was under 700,000,000 bushels, in 1918 it is estimated as 917,100,000 bushels, and in 1919 if the increased planting gives equally good crops it will be 1,000,000,000 or possibly 1,200,000,000 bushels. It is obvious that the price guaranteed was sufficient to encourage production and to reward the farmer, for otherwise he would not have planted. It has obviously not been too great for the exigencies of the war, because the price in the United States has been much less than the price among the allies or in the neutral countries of Europe. It has been less also than the usual price during wars. In England during the years 1801 to 1810, except in the years 1802 and 1806, wheat ranged in price from $2.31 to over $5 a bushel. The fluctuations were tremendous, and profiteering was universal among farmers and dealers. We have been saved from all this, because our Government, through the Grain Corporation, held a large store which could be placed on the market at any time. The Government prohibited exports when wheat threatened to go high, and it controlled the distribution throughout the world, so as to maintain a sufficient price to give to our farmers an ample profit, while at the same time it prevented the oppression of the people by an exorbitant price. It is true that the guaranteed price is higher than was paid before the war, but it is not higher than during and after the Civil War. The price of wheat in New York City—see part 2 of Senate Report No. 1394, second session Fifty-second Congress, page 64—ranged in 1864 from $1.60 to $2.75; in 1865, from $1.45 to $2.25; in 1866, from $1.70 to $2.80; in 1867, from $2.25 to $3.25; in 1868, from $2.05 to $2.75; in 1869, from $1.40 to $1.90; and in 1870, from $1.22 to $1.44. Our people have therefore, paid less for wheat than was paid during or after previous wars.

The Food Administration act ceases with the war—see section 24—except as to obligations accruing or accrued. There is an accrued obligation as to wheat harvested in 1918, but that wheat has nearly all been sold above the guaranteed price, and the United States are free of liability. There is no "accrued" obligation as to wheat which will not be harvested until the middle of 1919, but there is an accruing obligation as to wheat that has been planted.

The spring wheat has not yet been planted. We have an armistice, though we have not yet peace, and the notice of a guaranty might be withdrawn as to spring wheat so that the land can be devoted to other purposes if the raising of that wheat will result in a loss to the Government. The United States are not making guaranties in order to put taxes upon the people for going into the production of goods that are unnecessary and that glut the market. The whole theory of the food-control bill is to secure production of necessaries and to encourage such production only when necessary.

It is astonishing that there should be any difficulty in any mind upon this question if the predictions of the experts are to be trusted.

The war is not yet over. I am one of those who fear that it will not be over for some time. I likewise fear that our crops may not be as large as expected; that deficiencies in Europe may be greater than we now think; that the European crop of 1919 is likely to be much diminished by the ravages of war, present anarchy, and the scarcity of seed wheat. Our experience after the Civil War seems to be in point, although so many conditions—of climate, weather, and otherwise—enter into the crops of any particular year that I have no reason to put my own opinion against that of the experts.

These experts say that we are likely to have a bumper crop of 1,000,000,000 to 1,200,000,000 bushels, which includes over 300,000,000 bushels of spring wheat not yet planted. They tell us likewise that the United States will use for food and seed over 600,000,000 bushels, and that 400,000,000 bushels more are likely to be demanded elsewhere, but that the uncertainty as to that demand makes them fear that there may be a surplus, which will probably not be over 200,000,000 bushels, but which may reduce the price, say, to $1.25, so much that the United States might have to pay a dollar a bushel for its guaranty on the whole crop of 1,000,000,000 bushels, or $1,000,000,000. This bill asks the present appropriation of that sum to meet that possible contingency, together with the continuance of the purchasing features of the food-control legislation and also of its restrictive features until October, 1920.

I am sorry not to be able to concur or to consider all these remedies proper at the present time.

As to spring wheat, if it is really probable that we shall have a surplus of wheat, which will lower prices, it is the duty of the United States to withdraw the offer of our guarantee of the price of the spring wheat which is not yet sown but which will amount to between 300,000,000 and 400,000,000 bushels. No one has any vested right in a crop that is not yet sown, for the land can be devoted to other purposes. The guaranty had no other consideration except to encourage production, and the production is not now wanted. Nothing has been paid out by the farmer that will not help another crop. He can sell any seed wheat. The fact that he received the guaranteed price for 1918, which was ample, instead of an exorbitant war price, is no consideration for further United States action. No man has a right to exorbitant prices for food. The President should decide on his best judgment as aided by these great experts.

Second. Purchase and storage: The right of the Government to purchase and store so much of the wheat crop as will maintain the price is beyond all question under the present law. So long as the guaranty remains the Government stands in the position of surety and guarantor who has full right to protect himself against loss. The purchase would not amount to over 200,000,000 bushels, or, at most, 400,000,000 bushels, for which there are ample storage facilities. The Grain Corporation with $150,000,000 of capital found no difficulty in making purchases to this amount, and if such purchases be made the Government would lose nothing on the rest of the wheat, because those purchases will hold the price the whole world over. As to the justice of such action, it is a very different thing to buy and store goods in order to stabilize prices from buying goods in order to get excessive prices by cornering the market. Nothing is worse for the world than fluctuations in the price of grain which cause the farmer to despair and to refrain from planting a crop. There is much to be said in favor of municipal warehouses for fuel and food, to store surplus, prevent unreasonable fall in prices, and preserve the people from scarcity caused by weather, breakdowns in transportation, or speculation. During the recent famine in China the citizens of Tientsin were living comfortably from the city's granaries. Joseph was right in saving food in Egypt for the years of scarcity. Every fortification has its stores for time of war. There is no reason why our Government should not keep such stores until it can sell without loss. This is no war measure, but simply the proper and necessary disposition of assets acquired to meet obligations contracted during the war. This power is so essential that it is obviously retained by the Government, and the present bill is not needed to confer that power though it may be proper to assure it.

Third. The appropriation of $1,000,000,000 is at least premature, if not unnecessary. Wheat now maintains its price and is likely to do so. If there should be a bumper crop in the fall of 1919 the Grain Corporation have ample capital to buy enough wheat to hold the price until the meeting of Congress, if, indeed, Congress shall not have met long before that time. It is not usual to appropriate for a contingent liability, nor to appropriate three or four times what that liability is likely to be at a time when every dollar is so hard to get. The appropriation, if made at all, should be not over $150,000,000 more.

Fourth. The war powers of the food-control act and of the other national-defense acts should not extend into time of peace. They exist necessarily until that time, which we hope may come soon; but when peace does come a free people desire no limitations by executive boards upon their production or the selling, transportation, distribution, or exportation of any of their products. They do not wish to ask for licenses to sell their goods or send them to friendly nations. They wish the free right to import from Canada or elsewhere, subject only to such tariff or duties as may be imposed by law, but not to the changing decrees of any man or board. They are ready to submit to war, but they wish peace to be a real peace. They want no priority orders, embargoes, licenses, or prohibitions.

This bill will perpetuate war control. By section 4 the President may regulate or prohibit any wheat exchange or market. Section 5 not only continues the food-control power to license importation, manufacture, storage, or distribution, but adds the word "exportation," and section 6 adds a new section, not known to the food-control act, that the President, in carrying out the guaranties or to protect the United States against enhancement of its liabilities, may make imports or exports of wheat or wheat flour unlawful.

These powers are war powers. They should not be carried over into time of peace. They are unnecessary for the protection of the Government guaranties, for it is easy, as already pointed out, to protect the Government price through the year 1920 by purchasing any surplus, so that if there be any loss it will be on that surplus only and not upon the whole crop.

Appropriations to meet a merely possible and contingent loss can wait until we know something more about the production and demand of 1919. It should certainly be but a fraction of the amount proposed by this bill. A bill to continue the power of the Grain Corporation to purchase and sell is proper now and will be proper at that time, with a possible enlargement of its capital by a sufficient appropriation, but provisions that carry into the time of peace war powers which were only necessary during the war in order to monopolize the scant production of wheat for the use of our allies, their soldiers, and ourselves are utterly improper as a peace power to enable the Government of the United States, when crops are sufficient, to maintain prices by arbitrary interference with the freedom of production, transportation, trade, and commerce, including importation and exportation. In time of war the law is silent; in time of peace we are all free. The Government is free to buy or sell, and so is the individual.

This bill is at least premature. We do not yet know conditions.

OF

HON. NORMAN J. GOULD.

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 25, 1919.

Mr. GOULD. Mr. Speaker, I have to-day introduced a resolution directing the House Committee on Foreign Affairs to investigate the present situation in Costa Rica and the Government's connection therewith.

I have taken this step because of information which recently has come to me and which, if truthful, indicates the existence of a situation in that Republic and of a diplomatic policy on the part of this Government which is so repugnant to our traditions and previous policies as to call for prompt explanation on the part of the Department of State and full and free discussion in Congress.

Personally, I can not vouch for all of the facts, or alleged facts, that have been brought to my attention; and, due to the unfortunate policy of the State Department as a result of which Americans seem to forfeit their rights to the protection of their Government when they venture into Latin American countries in the pursuit of foreign trade and commerce. I do not now feel at liberty to give the House the names of my various informants. This much, however, I will state on the strength of my own observation:

The political plague born in the State Department, reared in its recently acquired atmosphere of paternal idealism and pride-stifling internationalism, which has wrecked peaceful, prosperous Mexico in the last eight years, now seems to threaten not only Costa Rica but all of Central America.

Articles in both Washington and New York newspapers recently exposed a very serious condition of unrest extending virtually from the Rio Grande to the Panama Canal. It would appear that this condition is merely the natural and inevitable result of a policy toward Costa Rica strikingly similar to the policy which has, in my belief, been so terribly exemplified in the case of Mexico.

For more than 18 months President Tinoco, of Costa Rica, has been refused recognition by this Government. The reasons which prompted the refusal are not now known and never have been known to the public. The results, however, are clear enough. Costa Rica's credit has been injured; her Government has been discredited, and her very institutions threatened with the same kind of attacks that Mexico has endured during the last eight years. During the fall of 1918 a number of American newspapers published a series of sensational articles which purported to be a revelation of President Wilson's motives in refusing diplomatic relations with Costa Rica. These publications at that time claimed that a group of American citizens led by Mr. Lincoln G. Valentine of New York, inspired and financed the overthrow of the Gonzales Government and placed Tinoco in the presidency, in order to secure from the new Government certain oil concessions.

Subsequent to this publication, I am reliably informed, a subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate inquired into the refusal of this Government to accord recognition to the existing government of Costa Rica, headed by President Tinoco. That subcommittee, of course, had before it not only such information and such allegations as the newspapers had published, but additional facts, obtained, I presume, from the State Department and other sources.

With this information before it, Mr. Speaker, the subcommittee reported, in effect, that it could find no good and sufficient reason for the continued refusal to recognize the Government headed by President Tinoco. In view of international conditions then existing, however, the subcommittee did not recommend mandatory action on the part of the Senate, although, I am informed, several members of the subcommittee unofficially communicated these facts to the State Department and urged President Tinoco's recognition.

Gonzales, the deposed President of Costa Rica, immediately after the bloodless coup d'état two years ago, had left Costa Rica and had come to the United States. Since that time, I am informed, he and his friends have persistently maintained an intrigue of publicity against President Tinoco and against American interests in Costa Rica. If statements I have received are true, this intrigue has reached into some of the executive departments of this Government.

I wish to lay before the House at this time some of these allegations, which have come to me unsolicited and which I feel strongly should be investigated by the Foreign Affairs Committee. They include these:

1. That the newspaper articles published last fall included what was alleged to be confidential correspondence between Mr. Lincoln G. Valentine and other American citizens.

2. That, according to these publications, this confidential correspondence—involving American citizens of integrity and good standing—was obtained from the safes of the parties named through the assistance of—I quote the publications—"officials of the United States Government."

3. That this assistance was alleged to have come through a man who purported to be an agent of the Department of Justice.

4. That this alleged agent of the Department of Justice delivered these pilfered papers to Gonzales to be used in the furtherance of the latter's publicity intrigues against American citizens and their interests in Costa Rica.

5. That one of the first acts of Gonzales after assuming the Presidency of Costa Rica in 1914—shortly after the outbreak of the European war—was to found, in collaboration with a notorious German propagandist, a newspaper devoted to pro-German publicity.

Mr. Speaker, I am loath to believe these allegations; I am loath to believe that the Government—shall I say "foreign office" of the United States Government?—is engaged in safe-cracking work against its own citizens in behalf of foreign political exiles or that it is conniving at a publicity intrigue which may have for its object the wrecking of an important phase of our foreign commerce.

And I am loath to permit such statements and allegations to go unchallenged by this Congress.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am more loath to accept the responsibility as a Member of the American Congress for the continuation without my protest of such practices if they do exist.

I want this House and this Congress to have the facts. I want to see the unpublished portions of that stolen correspondence. I want to know if, as has been alleged, Gonzales, during his tenure as President of Costa Rica, persistently and systematically persecuted foreign interests that had invested in Costa Rican properties on his solicitation. I want to know if, as has been alleged, this Gonzales, in his persecution of American interests, advised with and was advised by that same German propaganda service of whose insidious and diabolical workings in Mexico we learned through the publication of the Zimmerman note two years ago. I want to know if, in Costa Rica as in Mexico, such anti-American political leaders have been used as the cat's-paws of the pirates of Wilhelmstrasse.

It took the American people a good many years to realize, Mr. Speaker, that crimes were being committed in Mexico under the guise of "revolution"; it took them a good many years to realize that the German Government had reached into the very vitals of that country with its baneful influences, and when the story was told officially through the publication of the Zimmerman correspondence this country stood aghast.

I believe the time has come to show the hidden hand of intrigue among our Latin American neighbors and to serve notice on all agents of Germany that this Government will no longer allow them to hound Americans, even though their activities are shrouded in the mystery of Latin American politics.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the time has come again, and I thank God for it, when Members of the American Congress may ask questions of the State Department without inviting reflections upon their loyalty, public spirit, or patriotism.

Sermon by Rev. Arthur B. Kinsolving, D. D., on the Occasion of the Funeral of the Hon. J. Frederick C. Talbott.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. CHARLES LINTHICUM,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 16, 1919.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks I include the following sermon by Rev. Arthur B. Kinsolving, D. D., on the occasion of the funeral of the Hon. J. FREDERICK C. TALBOTT:

We have assembled in this home on this beautiful autumn day to lay to rest with the church's old words of faith and hope one of the best-loved public men that Maryland has had for many years. This vast concourse of people, comprising as it does a distinguished deputation from the Congress of the Nation, of the citizenship of Baltimore, and the community around, bears witness of itself to the affectionate esteem in which our departed friend was held. I can not forbear adding to the ritual of the church some words of appreciation of our friend. I do this with some hesitation, because I speak in the presence of many who were far more intimately associated with him than I. Yet I feel confident that what I shall say of the sterling traits of his character and service will find an echo in your own hearts and minds.

Mr. TALBOTT dies at the close of a very remarkable career and at a time when his services to the Nation compel the tribute of our gratitude.

As a young man he caught the spirit of chivalry pulsing in the souls of so many youths in this State and cast in his lot with the Southern Confederacy, making an honorable record as a member of Gilmour's cavalry. To the end of his life he looked back upon this service with unfeigned satisfaction, and at all reunions of his comrades was a central figure.

He held his friendships throughout life by his strong and unchanging loyalty. FRED TALBOTT did not forget. In the rough and tumble of a long political career he had many strenuous and hard fights. After the battle was over there was no bitterness in his soul; he accepted his few defeats with equanimity, which only a strong man possesses, and soon retrieved himself in large measure by this very spirit. As life wore on the acerbities of earlier political strife abated, and it is quite remarkable how his circle of friends widened with the years and how many former opponents came to appreciate the man at his true worth.

Mr. TALBOTT was a true servant of the people in this State. He was unsparing of himself in this service and absolutely unwearied in his attention to every detail of his duties as a Congressman. Indeed, he came to his death perhaps a little before his time because he left his bed a few days ago to go to Washington to keep an appointment in the interest of a young man whom he had promised to help. Several years ago, while traveling in New England with a Congressman from Texas, I believe, his companion said to him, "I should think it would be very awkward, TALBOTT, for you to live while in Congress right in the midst of the people you represent and to be forever accessible to their requests for patronage and help." TALBOTT turned instantly and said, "On the contrary, one of the joys of my life has been to know that every morning I would find on my desk some opportunity to serve my people, and perhaps during the day receive several of them at my office. This, I conceive, to be one of the greatest joys of a man's life—to live among the people whom he serves and to be in touch with their needs."

His most conspicuous national service was the work he was permitted to do as ranking member of the Naval Affairs Committee. From the beginning he stood stanchly against those who clamored for a little Navy and in favor of the most liberal naval program which this country could afford. His services here are valuable beyond all estimation. The justification of his foresight has already been written in these pages of recent history when our American Navy has rendered such conspicuous service in this war for civilization and freedom. It is most fitting that one of the vessels now building should bear the name of the man who has labored so valiantly for our greater naval program.

And this reminds me to speak of what is, perhaps, the crowning honor and distinction of his life as a public servant, for he has served in Congress for a longer period than almost any other Member. Though he has had unusual opportunities in his conspicuous position to further his own interests, Mr. TALBOTT, I am assured by those who know best, dies a poor man. In this respect he is an example to all men. His ideal was not gain but service. He had caught the vision of the nobility, the blessedness of service to his fellow men, and to that vision he was true until his strength was gone.

As to his attitude in religious matters, Mr. TALBOTT seems not to have identified himself with any Christian church. We wish he had. It had been better so; but he was the friend and helper of all churches. No acrid skepticism blighted this man's soul. He was a believer in our blessed Lord and Savior, and he often appeared among the worshippers, and his leanings were in the right direction. Toward the end, as he realized that his days were numbered, this spirit of reverence and trust in God seems to have deepened. We leave him to the mercy and care of the God and Father and Savior of us all.

OF
HON. GILBERT N. HAUGEN, OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 21, 1919.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit the following:

[Convention of National Board of Farm Organizations. Afternoon session. Washington, D. C., Tuesday, Feb. 11, 1919, 2 o'clock p. m.]

ADDRESS OF HON. GILBERT N. HAUGEN, M. C., MEMBER OF COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. HAUGEN. When asked by your secretary what subject I might prefer to discuss, I said: "Though no comment on the organization seems necessary, having come in contact with a number of the officers and members of the association and knowing of their high type of character and rectitude of purpose and ability to do things, I was naturally interested in your organization and its success and, if agreeable, I would prefer to offer a word of encouragement."

I have never understood why one half of the American people should find it necessary to organize and cooperate for their benefit and not the other half. It has occurred to me that if it was proper and necessary for labor and industrial interests to organize, it was also proper and necessary for the other half—the agricultural people—to organize and cooperate as well. Certainly, when we consider all that is involved it seems that every fair-minded man will concede the justice, right, and necessity for cooperation.

When we turn to the census reports we find that more than half of the American people live in rural districts. We find that more than 6,000,000 farmers and 6,000,000 farm laborers, tilling more than 6,000,000 farms, produced last year 5,600,000,000 bushels of cereals, which is about one-third of the production of cereals in the world; 917,000,000 bushels of wheat, about one-third of the wheat produced in all the world.

The gentleman preceding me has spoken about the dairy interests. We have 43,000,000 head of cattle, 23,300,000 milch cows, giving more than 8,500,000,000 gallons of milk. We have 71,000,000 swine; 49,000,000 sheep; 19,500,000,000 pounds of meat, pork, and mutton. The live stock on the farms on the 1st of January and the 1918 crop was valued at $24,700,000,000, which is three times the stock of money in the United States, after our printing presses have been running to full capacity the last year and turning out all sorts of money.

My friends, here we are with organization on one hand, the labor and other activities cooperating. On the other hand we have this vast number of people without cooperation.

It would seem that it is proper and fair and just that they cooperate; that is, to perfect an organization such as suggested by your chairman here a moment ago, men with heart and soul in the work, and who have a sincere interest in the agricultural people—an organization equipped here with proper office building, with money to support it, and with money to employ the proper talent to appear before legislative bodies to impress their viewpoints; men who stand for a square deal all along the line, for just laws, and an honest administration of just laws. Legislation not to meet the views of those who have no respect for law, order, or property rights, but legislation dealing with all questions in a broad and comprehensive manner, with a spirit of fairness and justice to all concerned; legislation not to deprive an individual, corporation, or interest of a single dollar honestly acquired, but legislation to promote and perpetuate the prosperity and happiness of the people in all communities.

Now then, as to the necessity of organization. Have we any grievances? Is there any just cause for complaint? My friends, if anybody is in doubt, if he will turn to the Federal Trade Commission's reports, I believe he will find food for thought. If he will look over the reports, he will find, for instance, that the Steel Trust was permitted to increase its profits from $47,000,000 in 1914 to $478,000,000 in 1918, or about 1,000 per cent, much of it at the expense of the Government. They were given the benefit of the natural law of supply and demand largely stimulated by the Government.

The millers increased their operating profits 175 per cent, and on the capital invested 100 per cent; he would find that four packers increased their profits $121,000,000 above their prewar profits. He will also find in those reports that the meat producers—the live-stock men—are at the mercy of, say, five packers, killing 70 per cent of the live stock, by reason of their control of the market facilities and pooling and splitting shipments and dividing purchases, the little black book, and various other combinations and conspiracies.

As you know, the railroads were on the verge of bankruptcy. They were about to go into the hands of receivers. Their stock had been watered and mortgaged to the limit. They were unable to renew their obligations or to borrow money. They were taken over. Nobody objected to that. They were guaranteed $175,000,000 to $200,000,000 compensation above the amount estimated by the Interstate Commerce Commission. They were guaranteed an annual compensation running as high as 647.22 per cent. We are paying compensation to one road—the Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad—several times over every year.

So, my friends, we might go along, but I believe this is sufficient. Now, on the other hand, the farmers. As you know, Hoover told us that wheat would go to $7 a bushel and that that should not be done. The price then was $3.45 per bushel. Neutral nations offered $1 premium, or $4.45 per bushel. He stated his task would be to furnish flour at $6.60 per barrel. That would have netted the farmer about $1 per bushel. Later he said he might concede $1.50 per bushel. Congress fixed the price at $2, and provided for a commission which fixed it at $2.20 and later at $2.26. Italy fixed the price at $3.60; France, $3.96; Canada, $2.24½; Switzerland, $3.36; Norway, $4.38. The price of wheat was fixed not at the price it would have been under the natural law of supply and demand but was arbitrarily fixed by the Government. As a result the wheat grower suffered a loss of approximately a billion dollars. The farmers did not object. Their representative told the committee to carry out the plan; that what they were interested in was winning the war. They accepted the price.

Now, the representatives of the farmer, about 200 of them, all from the various exchanges, the millers and bakers, appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and stated that they proposed that the wheat grower shall have the price fixed. Coupled with that they asked that the poor millers who increased their operating profits 175 or 100 per cent on their capital stock—they say that they should be protected against loss; and we have prepared a bill which is being introduced and will come up in a few days, and it provides for a guaranty to the miller against loss. It goes further than that—it guarantees the baker against loss.

I have served on the Committee on Agriculture a number of years. I have observed that the representatives claiming to represent the farmers are nine times out of ten members of or representatives of other organizations such as the boards of trade or exchanges, the millers and packers. They profess great friendship for the farmer, but, after all, they are human and selfish and not infallible. Although appearing as spokesmen for the farmer, we find them pleading with tears in their eyes for legislation to further their own interests, even at the expense of the farmer.

It has often occurred to me that the best interests of the farmer might be better subserved if he appointed his own spokesman, rather than to depend upon these self-appointed representatives. I call attention to the cotton futures act, the standardization act, the meat inspection act, the legislation giving authority to fix the price of wheat, the oleomargarine act, and a number of others might be cited. It has also occurred to me that with farmers' organizations and cooperation, such as the National Dairy Union, of which your chairman, Mr. Creasy, is secretary—and I speak of it because I have come in more frequent contact with its representative than any other—if, with the proper, active, efficient organization, equipped with headquarters in Washington, such as is suggested by your organization, the Temple of Agriculture, and provided with the necessary funds to maintain it and the employment of the necessary number of industrious and capable representatives, with a view of effectively impressing its viewpoints upon our lawmakers and to look after its interests—if represented by them instead of being represented by boards of trade, packers, millers, and various other boards appearing before the committee suggesting and framing legislation, might it not result in legislation different and more conducive to the best interests not only of the farmer but of the consumer and of the people as a whole? It has often occurred to me that with a complete system of checking up the legislation, with proper representation in shaping legislation, it would bring beneficial results. I am not putting it too strong when I say that one man with the backing of 7,000,000 farmers employed to aid in shaping legislation and one man in the gallery checking up and making records would bring better results, so far as the farmer is concerned, than any 2,000 men employed in the Department of Agriculture. In stating that, I desire to be understood that I have no quarrel with the Department of Agriculture and with the scientists employed therein, though I believe great improvement could be made so far as the farmers' interests are concerned. I appreciate the great work done and I am proud of its achievements and I feel certain that much good must come from it in the future, but that does not imply that the department and the scientists are entitled to the credit of all that has been accomplished or that we can look to them alone for our future prosperity and happiness. Furthermore, I believe that much of the overlapping and duplication and waste of expenditures should be dispensed with. I believe the department should confine its appropriations and activities to the duties assigned and not to promoting propaganda for the retention and for the securing of unnecessary new appropriations.

In referring to the department and legislation, do not understand me to charge the members of the legislative bodies or the department with corruption, but all are human and none infallible and, as all of us are more or less the products of our environment, as long as certain interests assert their rights and influence and the other does not, the one exercising its influence naturally comes out ahead.

In order to accomplish the desired results, it is, of course, not necessary, either in making or in assisting in shaping laws, that these representatives be farmers, or, as suggested by some, instead of having 400 attorneys in Congress, a number of attorneys should be substituted by farmers, merchants, bankers, and so forth, though there is no need of a large number of attorneys in shaping and passing legislation, certainly not those devoting their time and art to the question of constitutionality and the preparation of jokers for the purpose of defeating the purpose sought.

Railroads and packers have probably interested themselves more in legislation and cooperation in influencing legislation than any other business enterprises. In their employment of representatives to represent them before legislative bodies they do not always employ men engaged in railroading or in packing. They employ men who in their opinion can accomplish the most. So with the board of trade. I am told that its secretary, Mr. Merrill, is a farmer; that he never deals in future trading; he spends most of his time on the farm; he can give one as many pointers on farming as anybody; that he is an honorable and capable man, performing his duty with fidelity and rectitude of purpose. Hence, what is needed are men with heart and soul in the work. I feel at liberty to express my views upon the subject. Though I never posed as a farmer, having been born and reared on a farm and having owned and operated a farm for 42 years and with my limited possessions, four-fifths consisting of real estate, or 4 to 1 in farm value to every other investment, I might properly be styled a farmer and, if influenced by personal interests or selfishness, my interests would be with the farmer. But I trust, in framing legislation, I may be credited with taking a broader view of the matter. I prefer to believe that all take a just and pardonable pride in our Nation's growth and greatness, in the fact that we are living in this age of marvelous expansion and are moving forward with a mighty speed; that the wheels of industry are moving; the fact that we rank among the most practical, prosperous, and intelligent people on earth; that progress, prosperity, and happiness are in evidence everywhere and that all feel it their duty, no matter what their political affiliation, creed, occupation, or prejudices may be, to strive to benefit this country, to relieve the distressed, to protect the weak, to uplift humanity, to promote and to perpetuate true greatness; if so, honest and thoughtful consideration should be given by all with the view of securing full benefit for our natural resources, for the development of mechanical appliances and the skill and genius of American labor; to see to it that nobody is imposed upon; that everybody is given adequate protection against any invasion on the part of unscrupulous and dishonest interests in order that we may have the fullest development of every worthy and legitimate enterprise.

HON. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD,
OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 27, 1919.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an editorial from a New York paper on the life of Mrs. Mary Russell Butler, who died recently, having 19 grandchildren who have patriotically served their country in this war. The following is the editorial:

A LADY OF OLD NEW YORK.

"Memories of a New York of the long ago are awakened by the death at the age of 90 of Mrs. Mary Russell Butler. As the daughter of Capt. Charles Marshall, head of the Black Ball Line of trans-Atlantic packets, and wife and since 1902 widow of William Allen Butler, she was a link with a social, literary, and commercial past in the history of the city which grows even more romantic the further it recedes. When she was a girl the fame of Washington Irving was at its height, and Cooper, Bryant, and Paulding were giving a new renown to American literature. In 1850 she married the man who was to make himself famous overnight with a slight satirical poem, 'Nothing to Wear,' which outlives his more substantial reputation as lawyer and author.

"As a bride Mrs. Butler lived in Nineteenth Street, just east of Broadway, and it is with the New York of which Madison Square was the farthest north, the lesser but socially more spacious New York of the period preceding the Civil War, that her name is associated. Her long life comprehended nearly three generations of social evolution, and she saw the progressive extension of fashion's boundaries from Washington Square to upper Central Park.

"To have been a girl in New York when the 'Knickerbocker school' of literature was flourishing, a young matron when Jenny Lind sang and Patti made her début, and to have lived well into the twentieth century surely is a rare lifetime."

ROLL OF HONOR OF THE GRANDCHILDREN OF MARY RUSSELL BUTLER WHO HAVE RESPONDED TO THEIR COUNTRY'S CALL.

SONS, DAUGHTER, AND SON-IN-LAW OF WILLIAM ALLEN BUTLER.

Lyman Collins Butler. Veteran of the Seventh Regiment, New York National Guard. Reenlisted December, 1915. Served as corporal in Company K, Seventh Infantry, New York National Guard, and United States, at McAllen, Tex., during the Mexican campaign of 1916. Was there promoted to sergeant. His health became impaired as a direct result of climatic conditions and excessive activities on the border. Was therefore not able to respond to his country's next call for service. He died June 20, 1917.

Charles Terry Butler. Served under Dr. Joseph Blake in the military hospital at Ris Orangis, France, for seven months from June, 1916. Volunteered for service in the Medical Reserve Corps, United States Army, August, 1917. Assigned to officers' training camp, Fort Oglethorpe, Ga. Commissioned first lieutenant. Assigned to Evacuation Hospital No. 3. Has served with American Expeditionary Forces in France since January, 1918. Proceeding to Germany with army of occupation.

Louise Tracy Butler. Qualified as Red Cross nurses' aid, 1916. Typist at Red Cross home service (civilian relief), 1917. Sailing for France, Y. M. C. A. canteen work, December 5, 1918.

Maitland Dwight. Enrolled in United States Naval Reserve Force August 7, 1918. Ordered to aviation school for ground officers at Great Lakes, Ill., with rating of C. Q. M. (A.), September 16, 1918. Now stationed at United States naval air station, naval operating base, Hampton Roads, Norfolk, Va.

HON. JULIUS KAHN,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, March 1, 1919.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, availing myself of the privilege granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to call attention briefly to the splendid service rendered by colored soldiers in our recent war. But it is a fact that as early as the Revolution the black man helped to fight for this country. In all the other wars since he likewise performed signal service as a soldier.

There is a movement on foot among the colored citizens to have compiled and prepared as a public document a memorial history of the colored race in America which shall narrate its loyalty and service to the Republic. I take pleasure in presenting herewith a copy of a memorial to the Congress of the United States, signed by a number of prominent colored men and women, praying that steps be taken by Congress to have such a publication compiled and issued.

The memorial is as follows:

MEMORIAL TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES.

To the honorable the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned, your memorialists, respectfully request the Congress of the United States to provide by appropriate legislation for the preparation, compilation, and publication of a memorial history of the colored race, one recording fully their loyalty and devotion to the United States in all its wars and civil achievements.

We recall the fact that twelve millions of colored Americans neither owe nor pay allegiance to any other flag save that of America, and we urge this loyalty and fidelity should be fittingly recognized. They have never faltered in their patriotism, and point to the fact that history has never recorded a black Benedict Arnold. Recalling the above, your memorialists believe the time is auspiciously ripe to give to the world these salient facts of their history. And, further, that no more fitting monument on the eve of a great world peace could be provided than one recording their supreme sacrifices at Lexington, Concord, Bunker Hill, Valley Forge, Red Bank, Groton Heights, and other important battles of the War of Independence.

At Lundy Lane, N. Y.; Lake Erie, under Commodore Perry; North Point; Bladensburg; New Orleans; and other actions of the War of 1812–1814. They bore a conspicuous part in all the colonial wars and later against the Indians on the frontier.

At Vera Cruz, Mexico, 1847, under Lieut. Raphael Semmes, when they manned the naval battery in that siege; and, again, their fidelity to every obligation assumed was tested in no doubtful manner on both sides of the great civil conflict of 1861. Their loyalty and fidelity to their former owners, their wives and children during that strenuous period was eloquently described in burning language, May 31, 1918, by Congressman POU, of North Carolina, and at an earlier date by the late lamented Henry Grady, spokesman of the new South, who declared it challenged his highest admiration as being without a parallel in recorded history. This alone, we believe, warrants our plea.

They were present on every battle field in the Spanish-American War and with Dewey in Manila Bay. But this is not all. In less militant times they were conspicuously in evidence. Pietro Alonzo, a man of color, was pilot of the Nina in 1492 under Columbus. They were with Lewis and Clark, 1804–1806, and with J. C. Fremont, in 1842, in his explorations of the Rocky Mountains. One of their race stood beside Admiral Robert Peary at the North Pole and waved the American flag on the roof of the world.

No monument of bronze or marble can fitly recount these things. No one place can justly claim them. But not so with a monumental history as is herein asked for. By the medium we ask an enduring monument would be placed in every city, town, village, and hamlet, and in all the great libraries of the world. It would be an inspiration to all who had taken part in the narrated events and a heritage to be transmitted to their children. The loyalty, fidelity, and willing response of the race with its blood and treasure during the war with the central powers deserves such recognition, and the most elementary claims of gratitude demand that it should be generously given.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 18, 1918.

Resolved, That the executive committee of the National Equal Rights League heartily indorse the action of the colored citizens of Ohio, Illinois, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Maryland, and New York, etc., in presenting to the United States Congress a memorial asking Government aid in gathering, compiling, and preparing for publication as a public document a memorial history of the colored race in America, narrating its loyalty and service to the Republic, as an act of appreciation by the American people of their fidelity, devotion, and supreme sacrifices on every battle field of every war in which the United States has been engaged.

The colored race has not available the necessary means to systematically and comprehensively gather and publish the facts concerning their achievements in the United States as a world group and place them before the American people.

That each member of the race feels keenly the handicap suffered thereby, and believes were a full, just, and widespread showing of these facts, narrating the part the race has borne toward building up America on land and sea, placed before the world, it would serve effectually to greatly modify feeling against the colored race and be of inestimable help to it in its battle for a man's chance in the struggle for existence.

Approved by the executive committee of the National Equal Rights League in session Wednesday, December 18, 1918, at Washington, D. C.

Attest: JAMES L. NEILL, Secretary.

I also desire to print in the RECORD the following two newspaper articles which indicate the great number of negro soldiers who fought on the side of the allies in the recent war and the valorous conduct of many of these soldiers under fire. They are as follows:

SHOULD THEIR CASE IN EQUITY BE LAID BEFORE THE PEACE CONFERENCE?

Says the conservative Southwestern Christian Advocate of December 26, 1918:

"The negroes furnished more than 2,000,000 soldiers on the side of the allies. There were nearly 400,000 of our own boys under the Stars and Stripes. France had 800,000 colored troops and Great Britain had 1,161,800 colored troops. Does anyone doubt the significance of this force in the victory of the allies? Is there a man anywhere in the world that would deny to the race that these men represent, since they fought for the freedom of the world, their own freedom in everything that relates to full citizenship?"

WHEN 124 WERE DECORATED—BOSTON POST SAYS IT WAS AN IMPRESSIVE SIGHT IN PARIS, AND SUCH HEROISM SHOULD OBTAIN FOR COLORED MAN MORE CONSIDERATION IN THE SOUTH.

That must have been an impressive sight in Paris the other day when 124 colored soldiers of the United States Army were decorated with medals and war crosses "for extraordinary heroism under fire."

There is no color line in the bravery of our fine troops, nor any sectional limits, either. It is stated that these gallant fellows hailed from as many and widely separated States as Massachusetts and Tennessee, Ohio and South Carolina. They were all a proud part of the fighting force of America and they gave their country good reason for pride in them.

Let us hope that the fine share of the American negro in this war will obtain for him more consideration in regions where he does not always get his just deserts.

New Angle on Cotton Contracts.

OF

HON. BENJAMIN G. HUMPHREYS,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, March 1, 1919.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following article:

[From the Memphis Commercial Appeal.]

NEW ANGLE ON COTTON CONTRACTS.

Mr. J. T. Gooch, of Greenville, Miss., presents a phase of future contracts in cotton that has been little touched upon heretofore in its consequences.

Our people, whenever cotton is down, have a disposition to run to Congress. Then a Congressman or Senator attempts to put some notion into a legislative act. This act or rule may be far away from the trouble.

If the law of supply and demand causes cotton to advance, then the Congressman points to his act as a factor in the advance. If cotton continues to drop another act is suggested.

The price of cotton can not be controlled in Congress. But abuses in contracts can be regulated. The price of cotton can be fairly regulated by the producers themselves, if they determine upon a safe or sane policy, or both, and combine growing cotton with other agricultural industries.

But as to future contracts, Mr. Gooch shows that several hundred varieties of cotton can be tendered on a contract.

If a call is made for delivery of cotton in New York the cotton delivered would be such that is not merchantable. No man could afford to take over a lot of cotton having an infinite variety of grades. Under the system of tendering now in vogue in New York and New Orleans no man would dare to demand 500 bales. He would get cotton of so many intermixtures that he could not hope to close out the lot to a spinner or any other consumer.

Mr. Gooch's letter is so interesting that we print it for the benefit of producers, sellers, and exchanges:

"Anent the resolutions passed yesterday in the chamber of commerce, setting forth the abuse of contract and future trading on the New York and New Orleans Cotton Exchanges, it seems that the 'open season' has arrived for southern commercial bodies to meet and pass resolutions to decrease acreage to cotton and to execrate the members of the two exchanges above mentioned in general and Wall Street operators in particular.

"This has been done with a consistent regularity for the last 25 years until the time has fastened upon us as a tradition. The New York and New Orleans Cotton Exchange members and the Wall Street operators look forward to the occasion with much the same interest that the small boy looks forward to 'fishing time.' Should this 'open season' close without the South sending forth to Congress these annual 'resoluting and execrating' petitions, Congress would be very much surprised and the Wall Street operators would suffer a confusion comparable only to 'shell shock.'

"That the abuse of contract and future trading on the New York and the New Orleans Cotton Exchanges does exist is notoriously obvious, but we of the South, whose interests are so typically at stake, in our just and righteous indignation are execrating a set of gamblers whose interest in cotton values are thoroughly impersonal. We inject sectionalism into our arguments and into our resolutions. We accuse them of selling cotton that does not exist, to people who need it not, in blocks sufficiently large to break the various exchange markets. We accuse them of making 'wash sales' in large blocks in order to establish quotations and disseminate false ideas of value. This is done, openly and admittedly done, but we accuse them of doing these things as if they had secretly done them against us, because we are of the South.

"Divested of all cant, we are appealing to a set of gamblers, whose trade is legitimatized by long custom, not to win and accusing them of doing this when it is done because we are of the South and they 'strafe' us. The truth is they love us. The members of the New York and New Orleans Cotton Exchanges and the Wall Street operators do not care whether cotton sells for 4 cents or 40 cents a pound. What they most desire is for the market to fluctuate, to go up 20 points to-day, 30 points to-morrow, and then break 40 or 50 points the next day. They love us because we are their asset, their stock in trade. If you are a merchant, do you hate your store? If you are a planter, do you hate your plantation? If you owned a gold mine, would you hate it? No; because it is from these things that you get your profits, your dividends.

"Applying the simile, the New York and New Orleans exchange members and the Wall Street operators do not want to see any calamity befall us of the South, because we are their asset, their stock in trade, their gold mine. As long as we survive they shall not perish.

"And it is not because we are of the South that they hold this feeling toward us. They are running a big game, and they invite the whole world to sit in. They do not care from where you come—Greenville, Savannah, Denver, Seattle, and, further, you can hail from Patagonia, the Valley of the Nile, or the Fiji Islands. They do not care who you are nor what were your antecedents. Their one and only concern is that you sit in the game and be able to put up margins in a grand way. We of the South do sit in on a grand scale; men, women, and children buy futures. We of the South are the favored zone, because we are nearly all customers and have been customers from 'the time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary.'

"If we consistently buy cotton, some one must of a necessity sell it to us, and for them to make money out of this transaction they must just as necessarily put the market down. In order to be able to manipulate the market they must have an advantage that we have likely overlooked; and this advantage that they seem to have over us must be something stronger than hate and more potent than sectionalism.

"Probably this advantage that they have over us in the big game is their 'contract.' Do you know what their contract really is when it is analyzed? Let us look it over.

"There are 13 different and distinct standard grades that can be tendered on contracts. There are 8 different and distinct colors and tinges of each grade; there are 5 different and distinct lengths of staple commonly tendered. So multiplying the 13 different grades by the 8 different colors, and this result by the 5 common lengths of staples, gives you 505 different and distinct classes of cotton that you can tender on contracts. Should you buy 500 bales of March contracts—and at present March contracts are practically the same as spot cotton—the seller could tender to you the 500 bales, and each bale would be a different class staple from any other bale in the 500-bale lot tendered. Such a lot of cotton as this no mill could spin and would not buy, no shipper would dare buy it, no cotton factor would solicit such a consignment of cotton, and should he receive it unwillingly it would take him more than one week to class it out and more than probably five years to sell it all. The only person who would buy it would be a speculator, who would only buy it at a price that he considered far below its value, and with the knowledge that he would have to sell it for less than it was worth to some other speculator, who in turn would have to follow the same process through an endless chain of trading, et cetera. At this writing there is a stock of cotton in New York of 91,500 bales, a very large per cent of which is low grade, off color, and blue tinged cotton. The larger per cent of this stock of cotton is owned by speculators, and especially so of the lower grades and off colors. These speculators, on account of their large wealth, are dignified by the cognomen of operators.

"Should a person buy 100 bales of contracts and demand delivery, these operators could so mix up the grades and staples of the 100 bales tendered, that the contract, merely on account of this mixture of grade and staple, would become nearly valueless from the consumers' viewpoint. This stock of low-grade cotton is carried in the New York stock from year to year and is used as a sledge hammer on the market to intimidate purchasers of cotton. Low ordinary, ordinary, good ordinary, strict good ordinary, and low middling, these being the lower grades that are tenderable on contracts, have value when classed into lots and tendered separately. Being allowed to tender any part of all grades and staples on a contract, depreciates the value of the contract to a very large extent, indeed, and gives to the owner of a large and assorted stock of low-grade cottons an advantage in the market that few realize. If this statement is controverted, try to get some member of the New York and New Orleans Cotton Exchanges to explain to you just why it is that March cotton closed at 22.60 cents in New York Wednesday, while on the same day middling cotton in the same market was quoted at 26.07 cents. Let them explain just why middling cotton is quoted over 5 cents above March contracts, the while March contracts are practically the same as spot cotton, and remembering that contract quotations are based on middling grade.

"The Germans are not the only people who carry on a propaganda. As soon as any legislation is contemplated the New York and the New Orleans Cotton Exchange members get very active, showing the southern planter and farmer just where they act as a beneficent stimulus to cotton values. They show to the cotton shippers that these exchanges are a necessity to a conservative course of his business. But again let us look.

"They tender the use of their exchange to the cotton planter and farmer as the most likely place where he can unload the very low grades out of his crop, claiming the demand for this grade of cotton so fickle that it has to be wooed and pursued so delicately that even the exchanges at times can not quite master the situation, and in that event these despised low grades of cotton can find lodgment in their exchanges. These particular brands of despised grades constitute less than 20 per cent of the total crop. In their solicitude concerning the producers' welfare they omit to state that this 20 per cent of the despised low grades that find lodgment with them is carried in stock with the benign purpose of so assorting their contracts and making of them a general mixture to depreciate the contract over 5 cents per pound on the 80 per cent of cotton which this trusting and ever hopeful farmer and planter has sold or has for sale.

"The location of the abuse and its remedy is not at all confusing. The mysticism with which it has been clothed is propaganda pure and simple. Amend the contract of the New York and New Orleans Cotton Exchanges or abate them. These exchanges should be, and can be, made useful instrumentalities of commerce; using their present contract they are nefarious gambling institutions. If they are to serve either the cotton grower or the cotton spinner, their contracts must be so changed as to require the tendering on one contract of 100 bales, cotton of one grade and staple, though the grade and staple need not be specified in the contract. One hundred bales of cotton of any grade and staple can be used in commerce. One hundred bales of cotton of 100 different grades and staples can not be used except for gambling purposes. If 100 bales of even-running grade and staple would necessitate a volume of business too large for one contract, change the unit of measure and make the contract for 50 bales instead of 100; if this would be too cumbersome make the unit 25 bales. To the cotton trade, regardless of how small the dealer, 100 bales of cotton in evenly classed lots is a small transaction.

"In wheat, corn, oats, provisions and all commodities traded in on exchanges there is a great difference from cotton. There is not in its entirety over three or four grades of wheat, corn, oats, etc., while in cotton there are over 500. The abuse of grain exchange trading to which cotton is subjected can not exist, hence there is no comparison.

"Let us petition Congress, not as southerners, nor confine our petition to southern Congressmen, but rather let us go to Congress with a well-defined corrective and submit it to them, stripped of cant and execrations, and ask them to allow us to submit it to them on its merits. Give them to understand that if our logic is bad, if our conclusions false, we ask nothing. But if our measure is a corrective we ask for legislation as a national economic measure and not a southern one.

"J. T. GOOCH."

OF

HON. HENRY B. STEAGALL.

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, March 1, 1919.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to place before the House a copy of resolutions recently adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives of Alabama relative to the Government ownership of railroads, telephone, and telegraph lines. The resolutions are as follows, to wit:

House joint resolution.

Whereas Government ownership of railroads and other public utilities is contrary to the traditions and principles of our Government and people; and

Whereas experience has shown that the Government can not operate such public utilities as economically or as efficiently as private corporations; and

Whereas we believe that the interest of the people will be better subserved by a restoration of the railroads and other public utilities to their private owners: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Alabama (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States take prompt action looking to an immediate return of the railroads and other public utilities now operated by the Government to their owners, reserving such Government control thereof as may be necessary.

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution, certified by the secretary of state, be sent to each, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives in Congress, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives in Congress from the State of Alabama.

Adopted by the house and senate January 31, 1919.

The action of the House of Representatives of the State of Alabama is of peculiar interest. No State in the Union has experienced a greater agitation of the railroad question than has Alabama, and no State has encountered greater disappointment in the effort to do away with the evils and abuses of private ownership. After several years of discussion and consideration of the question the people of Alabama attempted to secure certain reductions in freight and passenger rates in that State and to accomplish the correction of abuses on the part of the railroad officials in granting passes and other favors and trying to dominate and even corrupt the politics of the State. After fighting out the issues repeatedly the people succeeded in securing the enactment of legislation to bring the relief desired, but the railroads enjoined the State and inaugurated a prolonged contest in the courts, which resulted in a compromise, thus thwarting the will of the people of Alabama. It would seem if any State in the Union could be found to oppose a return to private ownership, with all the abuses and evils which we have never succeeded in eliminating, Alabama would be one. Yet we find both houses of the legislature of that State urging a return to private ownership. There can be no explanation for this except that they regard the new régime as worse than the former, and I think that the expression of the people of Alabama through their senators and representatives may be fairly regarded as typical of the sentiment throughout the country.

Of course, we were all willing to have the Government operate the railroads during the period of the war and as long after the cessation of hostilities as necessary to wind up affairs in connection with the conduct of the war. When we were in the death struggle with Germany and our boys crossing the ocean in millions, and dying by the thousands upon the fields of France, every patriotic Member of Congress was ready to go the limit to organize the resources of our country in order to support and sustain our forces at the front. The people of the country fully approved of our action, but it was distinctly understood that Government operation was to be only temporary and would terminate when the military necessity ceased. I contend that we are bound in good faith to make good our assurances and that the Government should return the roads in accordance with the understanding upon which they were taken over.

We can not in good faith and consistency take advantage of the power that was intrusted to the Government thus temporarily to fasten public ownership as a permanent policy nor even to continue experiments. We should do just what we said we would do, and that was to use the roads to win the war and then return them to their owners. When this is done the advocates and opponents of public ownership will have a fair opportunity to fight out the contest on that proposition.

When it was proposed to take over the roads it was insisted that among other advantages to be gained the Government would be able to effect a saving by consolidating management and other economies. But what are the facts? Notwithstanding a burden of approximately $600,000,000 has been added in six months, from July to December, in freight and passenger charges through the raise in rates, the Government has sustained a loss of approximately $200,000,000. So it will be seen that instead of effecting a saving there has been, directly or indirectly, a loss of over three-quarters of a billion dollars; and that, too, at a time when the vast increase of business afforded unparalleled opportunity to make a profit. Of course, it will be said that economies will yet be accomplished, but I have no faith in the suggestion. We all know how difficult, if not impossible, it is to abolish or reduce any salary or expense when once fastened upon the Public Treasury.

When we took over the roads we appropriated $500,000,000 to be used as a revolving fund, and now we are called upon to appropriate three-quarters of a billion more, and the advocates of the measure are unwilling to agree upon a time when it shall end except the period of 21 months after the signing of the peace treaty, as fixed in the original act. I am willing to vote for an appropriation to cover all expenditures that have been made and all obligations incurred. This is the proposition embodied in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] to limit the present appropriation to $381,000,000. This fund would be sufficient to discharge all obligations and maintain a working capital of $247,000,000 in the hands of the administration, which was the amount heretofore used, and which it is desired to maintain. Without the adoption of this amendment I am unwilling to support the bill. I am opposed, in the present condition of the Treasury, to appropriating $369,000,000 for loans to be made to the railroad companies, and especially without fixing a time when the Government is to be relieved of its burdens in this connection. I want to see the activities of the Government simplified and reduced rather than multiplied and enlarged. I view with great alarm a proposition to increase in such sweeping fashion the centralization of power in the Federal Government and to fasten permanently upon its pay rolls the vast army in the service of the railroads. I am opposed to the effort to temporize with this question or evade responsibility, and for these reasons I can not vote for this bill.

The Political Refugee.

SPEECH

HON. MEYER LONDON,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 22, 1919.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill H. R. 14746, the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, in a proposed amendment to the immigration law, which I intend to discuss when it will be taken up for consideration by the House, there is one particularly obnoxious feature to which I desire to call your attention.

The proposed amendment does away with all exemptions in favor of political offenders.

There is no excuse for such a radical departure from an American tradition which is as old as the country itself.

It will neither be new nor original to say that this Republic had its birth in rebellion against an oppressive form of government. The great majority of the men who have built up this country were men who had fled from some form of oppression. They were rebels, bringing with them a love of liberty.

Every revolution in Europe brought hosts of political refugees to this country. With his hatred of oppression being fresh, the newcomer helped to keep alive the ideals of liberty in this Republic and helped furnish that vigilance which is the eternal price of liberty.

This is the worst possible time to shut the doors of America to the political refugee. We may expect many a political offender in European countries within the next few years. Quiet and contentment can not be established by a fiat of the peace conference. There are too many new forces at work. Economic, social, and national values will be undergoing a revision and revaluation. There will be new governments galore, and each government will during its brief hour of authority contend that it is the very best government in the world and that its opponents are enemies of society. It will be a hard time for the minorities.

The Committee on Immigration argues that it owes a duty to the country to protect it against the influx of Bolshevist ideas and Bolshevik propagandists. I need not dwell on the futility of legislating against the spread of an idea. If there is anything sound about an idea, if it can in any way be adapted to the needs of the people, if it can hold out any hope for the future, it can not be shut out by any artificial rule. You can not bar an idea by restrictive immigration laws.

The specter of Bolshevism has frightened the committee out of all sound thinking. Of course, no real effort is made by anybody to understand either the meaning of the word Bolshevism or the significance of the movement which it is supposed to represent.

Reactionaries of all degrees of darkness have been branding every new thought as Bolshevism. What is this Bolshevism that drives so many people mad with fear?

At a convention of the Social Democratic Party held in 1903 there developed a factional struggle as to methods and policies. The group which happened to be in the majority came to be known as the Bolsheviki, which means "those in the majority." Were we to coin an English equivalent for that word we would use the word "majoritists."

It fell to the lot of the Bolsheviki to take up the reins of government of a country wrecked by a disastrous war and in the agony of a revolution which followed the overthrow of an absolute monarchy. When they took possession of the Government, Russia was neither in a position to carry on the war nor to secure peace.

The contest between church and state, the fight against the elements that were seeking to restore the monarchy, the bitter class struggle between the large landowners and the peasantry who wanted more land, the superabundance of theorists, the attempt to build on the ruins of an autocracy the most advanced form of political and industrial democracy, the disastrous Brest-Litovsk treaty, the blockade which is still carried on by the allies and which prevents any hope of rehabilitating her industries, the presence of foreign armies on her soil—all these things would have broken down the best organized form of government.

Like the word "bolshevism," its methods are peculiarly Russian. It is impossible to apply the methods used in the desperate moments of a revolution in a country ruled for a thousand years by an absolute monarchy to a country with nearly 300 years of development of political institutions.

And then it is so hard to get at the facts. It will take decades before the world will know the real part played by men or parties in the present world crisis. Several of the very best periodicals in America, such as the Dial, the Nation, the New Republic, and such Socialist publications as have not been crushed, have been trying to present an historical analysis of the soviet form of government. The Nation has recently published the constitution of the Soviet government, a number of decrees and laws, including a comprehensive marriage and divorce law, as well as a series of documents which shed a great deal of light on recent events in Russia. The average man is impressed, though, by screaming headlines, by reports of the grotesque and the unimaginable.

This unreasoning dread of Bolshevism only shows the utter incapacity of our present statesmen to solve American problems in an American way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONDON. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. LONDON. In connection with this, Mr. Chairman, I wish to point out the necessity of repealing without delay the laws which were enacted under the hysteria of war and which curb the freedom of the press and destroy freedom of speech.

No country can live when men are afraid to speak the truth. You can not obtain the truth unless men are free to speak. I repudiate the doctrine that the minority is necessarily wrong, or that the minority is necessarily disloyal—a doctrine recently proclaimed by a noisy fool before one of our committees. How is a representative government to live unless every man is free to express his views on all subjects affecting the welfare of the country? How can there be an exchange of thought, how can thought be shaped or expressed unless men are free to give utterance to their opinions? And if every man is to hold his ear to the ground and try to determine in advance what a majority will think, or what a majority will say, there will never be any thought worth while.

The world has been moved forward by strong minorities. The most men love comfort more than they love liberty. They love to be thought well of by their neighbors. And one of the best ways of being thought well of by your neighbor is to agree with your neighbor. The very words "like" and "unlike" illustrate that. One dislikes another because he is unlike, because he is different. A free country can not live without a free press. In some of the sections of the country those who happen to be temporarily in authority are now committing all sorts of outrages against the law in the name of the law. In the name of the law people are prohibited from speaking, and in the name of the law people are prohibited from assembling, just because they might say something that will not be popular. Well, if it is not popular to-day it may become the ruling thing 25 years hence.

Men should be given the opportunity to speak their thoughts. I hope this Congress will repeal before this session is at an end the laws which curb the freedom of the press and freedom of speech. Let us forget the hatred and the bitterness of the war. Let us begin and build anew; not only build the rest of the world, but build a better America. If America is to be good, it must always try to be better. We can only build well upon the foundations of freedom of the press, freedom of thought, and freedom of speech, and upon respect for the rights of the minority.

Smashing to Victory.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK C. HICKS,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, January 14, 1919.

Mr. HICKS. The appeal—

IN FLANDERS FIELDS.

In Flanders fields the poppies grow
Between the crosses, row on row,
That mark our place; and in the sky
The larks still bravely singing fly,
Scarce heard amid the guns below.

We are the dead. Short days ago
We lived, felt dawn, saw sunset glow,
Loved and were loved; and now we lie
In Flanders fields.

Take up our quarrel with the foe.
To you, from failing hands, we throw
The torch. Be yours to hold it high.
If ye break faith with us who die,
We shall not sleep, though poppies blow,
In Flanders fields.

—Lieut. Col. John McCrae.

On this winter's day, when the implements of warfare are already rusting upon battle fields but yesterday the scene of savage carnage, we give our heartfelt thanks for the blessings of peace—blessings achieved in large measure by the matchless courage and the superb bravery of our own boys and by the unflinching spirit of devotion and determination of our people at home. With the glorious triumph that has come to American arms on land and sea, we say to every man in the service, to the men in khaki and the men in blue, to each one from seaman to admiral, from private to general, those who were on the firing line as well as those who did not have the opportunity of going overseas, that your heroic deeds and your sacrifices have been appreciated by a grateful country. For all time you have earned the gratitude of the Nation in maintaining the great principles of our Republic and the prestige of our flag.

Mr. Speaker, in the time allotted me to-day I desire to relate some of the things I saw on the "firing line" last summer during a trip I made overseas as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. As my narrative is entirely too voluminous for oral presentation, I will ask the House for the privilege of extending my remarks.

Our official party consisted of Congressmen PADGETT, RIORDAN, HENSLEY, CONNELLY of Kansas, OLIVER of Alabama, VENABLE, WILSON of Texas, BUTLER, BROWNING, FARR, MUDD, PETERS, and myself. Leaving Washington July 13, the next morning we boarded the U. S. S. Arkansas, lying off Old Point Comfort. This dreadnaught, Capt. Bullard commanding, had been detailed to join the allied fleet stationed in the North Sea. From the time we weighed anchor until our ship passed the last net in the harbor of Scapa Flow, 11 days later, the vigilance of the officers and crew was not for a moment relaxed. To provide additional protection against submarine attack, the ship's head was altered every two hours, the course followed being a prescribed zigzag, alternating right and left, and paralleling the base course at regular intervals. In readiness for attack, two of the big turret rifles and four of the secondary battery were manned night and day, the crews at station beside the guns and down in the ammunition chambers. Although no submarines were sighted, several shots were fired at suspicious objects, as the captain took no chance, believing that the best policy was to fire first and inquire afterwards.

The day before reaching our anchorage three British ships met and convoyed us to Scapa Flow, the great British base in the Orkney Islands. Here we were received by Capt. Guy Gaunt, of the Royal Navy, detailed by the First Lord of the Admiralty to act as our official escort. In the days which followed, his courtesy, consideration and thoughtfulness endeared him to every member of our party. During our stay in Great Britain and Ireland we were the guests of the British Government, receiving many generous and distinguished courtesies, and being afforded every opportunity of securing complete information on war activities.

Our first inspection was the mine-laying plant of our own Navy, at Inverness, Scotland. This important work was under the supervision of Admiral Strauss, who had in his command here and at Invergordon, another station, several thousand highly skilled men engaged in fitting up and adjusting the mines and planting them in the great barrage being laid across the North Sea. This project, conceived by American daring, called for the sowing of some 70,000 mines in a vast belt 24 miles in width and 234 miles in length, extending from Scotland to Norway. Owing to the great depths between the coasts, in some places 800 feet, a specially designed mine had to be used. Ten vessels were employed in this dangerous work, each fitted with appliances and machinery enabling them to plant mines at the rate of one every 12 seconds. Although this barrage, constructed largely by our own Navy, with the British Navy acting in hearty cooperation, was completed only a short time before the signing of the armistice, yet it is estimated that at least 10 German submarines were caught in it.

Nineteen miles from Inverness is Strathpeffer, noted for its medicinal springs. Here a completely equipped naval hospital had been established for the care of our sick and wounded. At Leith, near Edinburgh, was another great naval hospital fully manned and provided with all necessary appliances. These two hospitals had a capacity of about 1,200 beds. In many places near Edinburgh we saw barbed-wire entanglements and trenches, constructed at the outbreak of the war for the defense of the city in case the Germans effected a landing, but happily these trenches were never needed, for the British at all times held the supremacy of the sea. Near Leith we inspected a British Navy ambulance train equipped with kitchens, dispensaries, and every convenience for the comfort and treatment of sick and wounded sailors. To avoid the discomfort of moving men from one bed to another, cots with springs and mattresses had been devised, which could be carried by stretcher bearers. The wounded men were placed on these cots, carried on board the train, and then removed to the permanent hospital without change. The cots were so constructed that in the daytime, if need be, they could be converted into lounges.

The cordial cooperation between the American and British Navies, so pronounced everywhere, was especially manifested in our hospitals, where the sick and wounded of the British Navy were cared for with the generous consideration shown our own boys, and the British hospitals reciprocated by extending the same courtesy to the boys of the American Navy.

At Edinburgh we were accorded a review of the British Grand Fleet, anchored in battle array in the historic Firth of Forth. Five American dreadnaughts—New York, Texas, Delaware, Wyoming, and Florida—under the command of Admiral Rodman, a fighting commander, formed a division of this mighty armada. It is a pleasure to record the many tributes of praise bestowed by Admiral Beatty and his officers upon our squadron. Again the splendid spirit of cooperation between the two navies was fittingly expressed by Admiral Rodman, "that it was not two services of two countries, but one service of two countries."

These double lines of gray ships, with steam up and crews at guns, were ready to do battle on the instant word came for action. Never before had the world seen such a stupendous concentration of sea power, never before had the world witnessed such an ignominious surrender as followed in a few short weeks, when a great enemy fleet, the second most powerful navy on the seas, struck its flag without firing a shot. That victory, although silent, was complete and absolute, demonstrating the unquestioned importance of naval strength by the results achieved throughout the period of hostilities and by the events leading up to the culmination of its supreme power.

In London we were received by Admiral Sims and his staff, who extended every courtesy and offered us a detailed review of the work of his department and the requirements of the service. We can not laud too highly the admiral and the officers and men under his command for the efficient and comprehensive manner in which they carried forward the overseas operations of the Navy. We were entertained by Admiral Sims at the American Officers' Club in Chesterfield Gardens. Upon the entry of America into the conflict, Lord Leconfield placed at the disposal of the officers of the American Army and Navy his magnificent house Mayfair, superbly furnished and equipped. With no dues, fees, or obligations of any description, with the only requisite for membership the uniform of an American officer, this club attests the hospitality of our British allies and the generosity of its sponsor.

The admiral showed us the following interesting extracts from a captured German Army intelligence report referring to American troops:

> The Second American Division may be classified as a very good division, perhaps even as assault troops. The various attacks of both regiments on Belleau Woods were carried out with dash and recklessness. The moral effect of our firearms did not materially check the advance of the infantry. The nerves of the Americans are still unshaken.
> The individual soldiers are very good. They are healthy, vigorous, and physically well developed, who at present lack only necessary training in order to make them redoubtable opponents. The troops are fresh and full of straightforward confidence. A remark of one of the prisoners (a marine) is indicative of their spirit: "We kill or get killed."

I regret time does not permit me to speak in detail of the cordial receptions tendered us by the King and Queen and the officials of the Government in Scotland, England and Ireland. Wherever we went we found only praise for all that America was doing, and the strongest desire for cooperation in the prosecution of the war.

Ambassador Page, although at that time a sick man, was at his desk, as he had been through all the trying days of four years of war. Little did we realize then that he was so soon to receive the call to a higher post, and when the news came of his death it was a shock to everyone who knew and appreciated his sterling character. In the passing of Walter Hines Page the Nation lost a distinguished diplomat, his associates a brilliant leader, his companions a generous friend.

We visited the British naval base at Dover, under the command of Admiral Keyes. From Dover operations were conducted against the German submarine activities in the North Sea, and it was from here that the daring attack was made last spring against the German bases at Ostend and Zeebrugge.

Near Dover was the Capel air station, from which aircraft were sent to guard the troopships crossing the channel, and we had the pleasure of making a flight in one of their large Blimp machines. Harwich was another important naval base, both for destroyers and aircraft, and here we had an interesting experience. As we were at lunch on the flagship, a carrier pigeon brought word that a British aviator had gone down in the channel and had been picked up by a Dutch vessel. Immediately a destroyer was ordered to the rescue. In the meantime we were taken up in one of the large seaplanes, from which we followed the course of the ship as it went out of the harbor in search of the daring pilot.

At Queenstown, Ireland, our Navy operated both a destroyer and an aviation base. This important station was under the command of Admiral Bayley of the British Navy, and the operations conducted from this point by the British and American forces, covering a wide area, were most comprehensive in scope. One night our committee attended an entertainment as guests of the enlisted personnel, where the entire program was arranged and produced by our bluejackets. The real merit of the performance attested the high character of the men in the naval service.

Just back of Queenstown, in a quiet valley, surrounded by the cultivated fields of the Irish farmers, is the little cemetery where sleep the victims of the Lusitania tragedy. With bowed heads we looked upon their graves and with sorrowing hearts read the inscriptions which told of their untimely deaths—deaths which struck at the conscience of humanity; deaths which aroused a Nation and carried it forward with a unity of purpose to render it impossible for crimes such as these ever again to mar the pages of history. Such deaths were not in vain. One inscription told of a mother and two children who lost their lives on that fatal day. On another stone was this pathetic legend:

Alfred Scott Witherbee, jr.
Born June 27, 1911.
Died May 7, 1915.
A victim of the Lusitania.
Foully murdered by Germany.

Several times while in London we visited the famous Eagle Hut, just off the Strand. This canteen, under the care of the Young Men's Christian Association, was self-supporting. It was equipped with 279 beds, the charge for which, with clean sheets and pillows for each occupant, was 18 cents per night. In the restaurant, during July last, a daily average of 2,700 meals were served, the charge for a table d'hôte dinner, consisting, for example, of American hash or liver and bacon, potatoes, cabbage, and pie or pudding, was 16 cents. Meals à la carte were in proportion; bread and butter was 2 cents, potatoes 3 cents, coffee 3 cents. A real soda-water fountain probably was the most popular piece of furniture in the building, where ice-cream soda could be bought for 6 cents. Reading, billiards, lounging, and bath rooms were also attractions much enjoyed and appreciated by the boys. Over the fireplace in the main room this motto, composed by one of the men, was displayed:

America has kept her word
And been to freedom true.
The answer all the world has heard
Because of such as you.

Before leaving London we had conferences whith Sir Eric Geddes, of the Admiralty, and also with Prime Minister Lloyd George, discussing with these two leaders of thought and action various phases of the war. It is needless to say that these gentlemen, each eminent in his line of service, impressed us as being men fully capable of handling the many problems confronting them. Mr. Geddes was loud in his praise of our Navy, saying: "The dauntless determination which the United States has displayed in creating a huge, trained body of seamen out of landsmen is one of the most striking accomplishments of the war. Had it not been effectively done, one would have thought it impossible, but words fail me to express our admiration of this feat undertaken and accomplished by your Navy Department."

Mr. Lloyd George was also very emphatic in his appreciation of our efforts, telling us that "the allies have been cheered by the splendid fighting of the Americans." A few days after our call he paid in Parliament this tribute to the American soldiers:

It is not merely that they fought with courage—everyone expected that of the American Army—but they have fought with a trained skill that no one ever expected or had a right to expect. The men are brave, but the officers, who, after all, are not trained officers in the ordinary sense of the term, have shown skill and knowledge and management of their men under trying conditions which you could hardly expect from men who have not had a good deal of the experience of war.

That is one of the most remarkable facts in the fighting of the American Army.

It was a keen personal pleasure for me to renew the friendships of the previous year with Mr. Beal and Mr. Littlefield, of our embassy, whose great courtesy our party so fully appreciated. I was again the recipient of much kindness extended by Mr. Ian Malcom, M. P., whose work with Mr. Balfour and in connection with the British Red Cross is of distinguished merit.

London last summer was the same London as on my visit in the fall of 1917—the darkened thoroughfares, the restrictions regarding open blinds at night, the same crowded streets thronged with soldiers, the dearth of automobiles, and scarcity of food. In fact, food was less plentiful at the hotels last summer than the year before, and I venture to say it was the same elsewhere. No sugar served at all, the only sweetening being sirup; which while making an indifferent oatmeal, renders coffee anything but coffee. Bread and meat could be obtained only on ration tickets, and then simply in small quantities. Butter and cream were never seen, and, of course, pastry and other delicacies existed only in the memory of other days.

In this connection let me tell the story of a man who went into a restaurant in which an American negro was employed as waiter. The hungry customer ordered beefsteak, cream potatoes, ice cream and cake, with plenty of bread and butter. The darky looked at him in bewilderment, and then exclaimed, "Say, boss, is you givin' a order or jest reminiscin?"

If material things in London showed no change, there was a notable difference in the morale of the people. The gloomy anticipations of 1917, coupled always, however, with unabated determination, had given way to a buoyancy of spirit and a confidence which bespoke certainty. It permeated every walk of life. The weary weeks of dread following the inauguration of the great drive had been broken by the brilliant victories of the allied armies; the submarine menace was in check; the Americans at last had come; Belleau Wood and Chateau-Thierry had been fought and won; Paris was safe and Foch was on the offensive. Now it meant only a little more sacrifice until the triumph would be complete.

I regret that opportunity does not permit me to speak fully of the achievements of Great Britain in this conflict; but let me say that the men of English blood and of Scotch and of Irish and of Welsh blood and the men from the colonies overseas fought in this conflict like the bulldogs which they are, and that the people of that great Empire gave of their substance and of their blood without stint and without reserve.

The Paris of August, 1918, was vastly different from the Paris of the previous year. In 1917 the German lines were far removed, and the French capital, while always apprehensive, had neither experienced the destructive air raids nor been subjected to the bombing of the big Berthas. On my former visit the streets, although filled with soldiers, were almost normal, and business went on practically as before the war. Last summer, however, all was changed. The long-range guns, with tragic frequency were finding their victims by day, while the night was filled with terror by bombs dropped from the overhanging darkness. As in London, the street lamps were dimmed, and one had to grope his way along the darkened thoroughfares. When the big guns started their deadly work the missiles would fall with such regularity that one could almost set his watch by the explosions of the shells. From the church steeples and other towers, huge sirens warned Paris of an attack, and throughout the city, along the boulevards and in the side streets, were the significant signs "Abri," denoting subterranean shelter. We saw many places where these shells had wrought their destruction, the most tragic of all being the Church of St. Gervaise, within whose sacred precincts on Good Friday, nearly 100 persons were killed and mangled.

Although the drive on Paris had been stayed and the tension of the French somewhat relieved, yet the battle line was too close for complete security; the awful dread of the few short weeks before when the imperial army was only 40 miles away had not entirely passed. The thousands who left Paris when the capture of the city seemed imminent had not returned; and while the spirit of the people was one of elation and confidence in the smashing offensive of Marshal Foch and the allied forces, there was the possibility that the tide might turn, and above all was the seeming certainty that the conflict with its toll of death, suffering, and privation would drag on for many weary months.

Our first official visit was made on Ambassador Sharp, our representative, who throughout the war had remained steadfastly at his post, rendering invaluable service to his country and his countrymen, and by his ability and courtesy holding the esteem of the French people. We paid our respects to President Poincare; Mr. Leygues, minister of marine; Mr. Pichon, minister of foreign affairs; and Premier Clemenceau. Mr. Clemenceau, most aptly styled the "old tiger," gave us a hearty welcome. There was no doubt in his mind of the ultimate result, no question even of a speedy conclusion of the struggle, and he was backing the forces at the front with all his fiery zeal and indomitable will. He was the man of the hour, carrying the whole nation with him as it hurled its all into the final drive. "Yes," he said, "we do not know what would have happened to Europe had it not been for America; it saved civilization." In answer to a query what would the next move be if the allies captured a certain place, he replied: "It is no longer if; it is we will take it."

One afternoon I had the pleasure of calling upon Maj. Roosevelt and his brother, Capt. Archie, each convalescing from severe wounds, and both fretting over the delay in getting back into the line.

By train we went to Bar le Duc, and thence by motor along the famous victory boulevard to Verdun—Verdun, immortal Verdun, the rock of destiny, guarding the passage of the Meuse on the eastern frontier of France. We were greeted at the portals of the citadel by Col. De Hay and his staff, who escorted us to Marre Hill, from which, across the valley, we could see the German lines. The artillery on both sides was maintaining an erratic bombardment. Now a German shell came screaming from the farther hills, to be answered by the French guns from their positions just back on our right. All day long for weeks and months and years these guns have been hurling their projectiles on these scarred heights. We were on the crest of a hill, hidden in an old redoubt, and were under observation of the enemy, therefore in passing to and from our place of concealment were obliged to walk singly and far apart, so as not to attract attention and invite a shell, for the Germans are very careless with their artillery, and a group of persons, even of Congressmen, would be considered worth taking a shot at.

While we were watching this drama, a French plane flew over our heads, bound for the German lines. When it came within range the enemy antiaircraft guns opened upon it. Shot after shot was fired, the grey spots of the exploding shells smudging the sky about the machine, but luckily none struck home.

The city of Verdun is a desolate ruin, not a house but shows the work of German destruction. Streets piled high with débris of twisted steel, charred timbers, crumbled bricks, and broken stones, are abandoned and silent. It is a veritable city of the dead, closed to the outside world. Demolished shops and vacant homes, desecrated churches and shattered schoolhouses, tell the story of the avalanche of steel and fire which swept this defiant city into a holocaust of ruin and despair. Here and there flowers, perpetuating memories of happier days, brightened the gloom of desolated gardens, and vines still cling to the broken walls as if nature by her gentle mantle sought to hide the ravages of war and shame the savagery of man's wanton destruction, contrasting the brilliancy of her blossoms with the darkness of vacant homes and sorrowing hearts.

The stately palace of the archbishop is a battered wreck of its former splendor, strewn with the sacred furnishings of a house of God. It was here that the Crown Prince had decided to have his banquet in celebration of the fall of Verdun! Strange how many dinners of the imperial conquerors remain uneaten! As we were picking our way among the fragments of holy figures, broken glass and pieces of exquisite carving accumulated in the courtyard, a group of 14 French planes passed overhead on their way to Metz. The machines, in regular formation, whirled through a thin cloud of vapor, each making a path as if a snowplow had swept the course.

The great church of St. Sauvier and the massive cathedral have met the same fate of the palace, and their ancient glory is lost forever. That evening a few of us wandered through this twentieth century Pompeii, where the only sound was the fall of our steps upon the broken pavements, and the only sight empty windows and darkened doorways. Where once the light of happy homes pierced the night, now only gloom; where once the laughter of children echoed their happiness, now only the rustling of the wind as if moaning a requiem over memories buried beneath the vengeance of German guns. In the sky an observation balloon flashed its signals to the forts below; but no cannon answered, and silence reigned along the battle line and in the city, which through all the anguished days of blood and terror stood steadfast in its defiance, "They shall not pass."

We slept that night in the citadel, deep down in the recess of the rock, and in the morning went out to Fort Souville, and then to Fleury, St. Douamont, and beyond, tracing our way among the most awful scenes of destruction it is possible to imagine. In places the German lines were only a few hundred yards distant. It was on these hills which surround the city like a great necklace, 30 miles in circumference, and in these valleys and on the farther heights, that the battle of three years ago was fought—square mile after square mile of ground, every inch of which has been torn by shell and consecrated by the blood of those who fell in its defense. Helmets, rifles, masks, grenades, shells, and broken wheels strewed the land as far as eye could reach. I pulled a helmet out of the mud, and there, wedged in its steel case, was the rotting head of a German soldier; a boot encased a leg of decaying flesh and crushed bone.

Let me refer briefly to the history of Verdun, famous since the days of the Romans. In the time of Henry II it was conquered for France, and under Louis XIV, Vauban, the eminent engineer, constructed his elaborate system of bastions, ravelins, and moats. In the war of 1870 Verdun made a stout resistance, and fell only when supplies failed. Since those fateful days it has been one of the principal bulwarks of eastern France, guarding the crossing of the Meuse on the main line of advance from Metz, only a day's march distant, to the passes of the Argonne and the upper Marne Valley. Here the road from Paris eastward meets the highway running along the river valley, and here five railroads have their junction. Its commanding situation prompted the French to make this the strongest of their frontier posts. The surrounding hills in a long circuit were fortified with redoubts, forts, and batteries. It represented the highest degree of military skill in the old science of defense, and had not been neglected like Lille and Rheims.

Before the war the forts had been reconstructed, concrete and steel replacing masonry and earthwork. Guns of heavy caliber, mounted in sinking turrets after the Brialmont system, had been installed. Within a few weeks after the outbreak of hostilities the city was almost invested by the armies of the Crown Prince, but the French victory at the Marne compelled the Germans to retreat. For months following there was no serious attempt to capture Verdun, the objective of the Crown Prince being to sever French communications by advancing his lines southward in order to effect a junction with the German Army at St. Mihiel; but in spite of all attempts, the city and its forts remained a great salient. Baffled in their plans to isolate Verdun, the imperial high command decided upon a direct attack.

On February 16, 1916, the German guns opened fire in a desultory manner, and in anticipation of what was to follow, the city was evacuated by its civilian population. Early in the morning of February 21 the real siege began, a bombardment never before equaled in all history. Artillery, with guns ranging in caliber from the 4-inch to the powerful 13-inch, massed with wheels touching, hurled their missiles in a deluge of steel upon the French lines. Trench after trench was blotted out and mangled men by the thousands lay slaughtered on the slopes. The very hills lost their form beneath that terrific attack. Then the German infantry, 14 divisions strong, swept forward; 230,000 bayonets were concentrated to complete the work of the shells in the capture of the city. Barrage charge, counter attack, bombardment followed in succession as the lines swayed back and forth over ground already piled high with dead and dying men. Torrents of shrapnel, high-explosive shells, liquid fire and asphyxiating gases fell upon the dauntless French as they were slowly driven back.

By the night of February 24 the German lines were pressing against the last positions. This was the fourth day of the battle, the day set by the high command for the victorious entry of the imperial army into Verdun, the day which, due to the matchless courage of the French soldiers, never came. The morning of the 25th was ushered in with a canopy of snow lying upon the death-strewn heights. Both armies knew that the crucial time had come. Each realized that for them the outcome of the next 24 hours would mean either victory or defeat. With the first rays of dawn came the boom of the German guns as battery after battery opened. The whole front soon became an unbroken line of belching fire, each lurid flash a blotch of flame against the leaden morning sky. Individual sounds, at first distinct in the crisp air, became merged and finally lost in one mighty roar of shrieking, whining shells as the cyclone of steel reached its maximum of fury. The sun was blotted out by the clouds of smoke and gas which hung low over the charnel house—funeral shrouds for friend and foe alike.

Then wave after wave of gray-clad infantry of the enemy surged up the hills, to be hurled back again and again in ever-increasing slaughter by the thin line, fighting with their backs to the wall, in defense of homes and for the honor of France. Mangled flesh, headless bodies, and dismembered forms, reeking with spurting blood, lay in gory heaps. The line bent, swayed back in places, but it did not break. Let me quote from a French officer who witnessed the scene from an observation post: "Beyond, in the valley, dark masses are moving over the snow-covered ground. It is German infantry advancing in massed formation to the attack. We telephone through to the batteries, and the ball begins. The sight is hellish. In the distance, in the valley and up the slopes, regiments spread out, and as they deploy fresh troops come pouring in. There is a whistle over our heads. It is our first shell on its way. It falls in the middle of the enemy infantry. We telephone, telling our batteries of their hit; then a deluge of heavy shells pours on the enemy. Through glasses we can see men maddened, men covered with earth and blood, falling one upon the other. The first wave of the assault is decimated—the ground is dotted with heaps of dead—but the second wave is already pressing on. It tries in vain to get through our fire. It is driven back, and again discovered by our guns; once more our shelling carves awful gaps in the ranks. Nevertheless, like an army of rats, the boches continue to advance. Then our heavy artillery, bursts forth in fury. The whole valley is turned into a volcano, and its exit is stopped by the barrier of the slain."

With the French position desperate almost beyond hope, Gen. Petain, one of the ablest and most resourceful of the French fighting commanders, was ordered to Verdun and placed in supreme command. His task, in reorganizing shattered communications and bringing up supports in the face of a smashing offensive flushed with victory, was herculean. He achieved the impossible and saved France. Gen. Petain assumed command in the morning. In the afternoon of the same day came the crisis, the culmination of the German effort to capture Douamont, the key of Verdun. Imperial orders had been issued that, at all costs, the fort was to be captured, and the attack, under the personal observation of the Kaiser, reached a pitch of unprecedented savagery. He and his generals watched the conflict from the hills known as the Twins of Ornes. So confident were they of victory that word had been sent to Berlin to prepare the capital for a great celebration.

Line after line, the Germans swept over the edge of the plateau in a desperate effort to gain the crest. Again and again they were thrown back by the terrific fire of the French guns. Wave after wave surged up the slopes, broke and ebbed, then recovered and advanced again, only to be beaten back. At last one wave mightier than the rest, a remnant of the Twenty-fourth Brandenburg Regiment, reached the crest and broke through the French trenches. On the right and on the left the French still held their positions, but the fort itself was in German hands. A wedge like a dagger point had been thrust into the French lines. Although their front had been pierced, it had not been broken. To the watching Emperor it meant victory, and a telegram flashed the news to Berlin that Douamont, the key of Verdun, was captured, and the capital decorated itself with flags and bunting in anticipation of a victorious march to Paris. But between those gray German lines and their goal stood the intrepid soldiers of France! True to the traditions of their glorious past, they met charge with charge, attack with attack, bayonet with bayonet, club with club, stayed the avalanche which had piled the ground in places with nine feet of human corpses, and held on; and the victory flags of Berlin, tattered and torn by waiting, became shrouds on the coffin of the Kaiser's dream of conquest.

"That night it was bitter cold and the wounded left upon the fields were corpses in the morning. Looking from the parapets in the faint light each side saw dark figures apparently crawling in no man's land between the lines. At first they suspected a night attack, but soon they saw it was an army of the dead." While the capture of the ruined fort was spectacular, it was an empty victory for the enemy, as that night the wearied lines, which for five days had been beaten back inch by inch, were reenforced. On the morning of the 26th Gen. Petain, swift to take advantage of his fresh troops, launched a counter-attack with the famous Twentieth Corps of Nancy veterans, driving all but a handful of the Brandenburgers from the crest of the heights. These few remaining still held the fort. The next day, with snow deep upon the ground, the combat continued, marking no decisive results on either side. Then came a lull, while the German high command revised its plan of attack.

On March 2 the assault opened upon the western defenses, the objective being the capture of Dead Man's Hill, key of this sector as Douamont was the key of the eastern heights. To prevent the French reenforcing the real point of attack, a drive was made against the Douamont position. By threatening their railroad communications close to the lines, the French were compelled to resort almost entirely to motor transportation for ammunition and supplies. Along the great highway leading north from Bar le Duc to Verdun an endless chain of convoys passed and repassed. This road, so absolutely vital to her success, is now renamed the Avenue of Victory, a fitting appelation, for it carried the might of France to the lines of her defense on the hills beyond. To visualize the scene upon this highway in those grim days and nights, let me quote from a letter written by a French transport driver:

> Each trip represents for us from 15 to 25 hours at the wheel—when it is not 30—and for our lorries 150 to 200 kilometers. This, day and night. On arriving here we did the journey twice daily, almost without stopping—that is to say, 48 hours without sleep and almost without food. Can you imagine what it means to drive one of the lorries weighing 5 tons and carrying an equal weight of shells, with a lorry just in front and one just behind, or driving during a frosty night or without lights when nearing the front? Can you see the driver alone, on his lorry, whose eyes are shutting when a shock wakes him up suddenly, who is obliged to sing, to sit upright, to swear at himself so as not to sleep and throw his lorry into a ravine or get it stuck in the mud or knock the one in front to pieces?

From March 2 to April 9 there was almost continuous heavy fighting on both the eastern and western heights. With attacks and counter attacks, in the front and on the flanks, by shell and by bayonet, the tide of battle ebbing and flowing, the struggle for mastery went on. A gain in one place was balanced by a loss in another, but the strategy of the German command had failed, the 4 days which was to witness the capture of the city had become 48, and Verdun still remained unconquered and unconquerable. On April 19 Gen. Petain took the offensive, as the three last efforts made to pierce the French lines were fruitless. Germany, however, was still hopeful of winning a decisive victory that would bring to her side wavering neutrals and delivering a blow which would break the morale of her opponent and compel a separate peace. But the spirit of France never burned brighter than when her armies lay on those shattered heights, weary but unconquered.

On May 3 the Germans renewed the assault, opening with a violent bombardment on the western crests, and the French, to ease the pressure in that sector, made an attack on Fort Douamont. The ruins were captured, only to be retaken by the enemy. There was desperate fighting along the whole line. Mounds of the dead rose above the level of the ground which the living used as breastworks to pile up yet more corpses. On May 29 the Germans, still in possession of Fort Douamont, were within 5 miles of Verdun, and their position afforded them observation of all the intervening terrain. Then Vaux was attacked and captured, and only Fort Souville, 3 miles from the city, remained to stay the avalanche. On June 23 came the great assault against this last defense. One hundred thousand men were thrown into the charge, and Fleury, at its base, passed into German hands. But the tide had spent itself. Human endurance could stand no more, and the German hordes were turned back, beaten and crushed, never again to advance against those ramparts of liberty.

Verdun was saved. France was saved. During all these terrible months the citadel by the Meuse had been for France the watchword of her faith, the pledge of her fortitude, the symbol of her resolution. It was a place apart, a sacred spot crowded with hallowed memories, and its possession was the measure of her devotion. The fame of Verdun will live through the ages, and for all time it will be a shrine where mankind will offer homage to the unflinching courage and supreme sacrifice of the thousands who fell before her gates. Her hills are forever consecrated by the immortal dead.

From Verdun we went to Nancy, passing en route train after train filled with American soldiers and their equipment. These boys were being concentrated on this sector preparatory to the offensive against the St. Mihiel salient, which was in a few weeks to bring such glory to the American Army. Hardly a village but had a camp, and every station was patrolled by our military police. These boys were here in France for just one purpose—to win the war and then return home. They did the one, and now it is our duty—we who sent them on their mission—to see that they do the other. There has been too much red tape in granting discharges, too much delay in demobilization.

At Marboche, about 15 miles north of Nancy, was located the camp of the marines, under command of Gen. Lejeune. Near by, at St. Genevieve, were the headquarters of the Twenty-third United States Infantry, Col. Malone commanding. From an observation point in a cemetery on the crest of a hill just back of the town we looked over into German territory and at a distance could see the buildings of Metz. While we were witnessing a bayonet drill, three French airplanes started to reconnoiter the German lines. They were attacked by the enemy antiaircraft guns. Shot after shot was fired at them, the white puffs silhouetting against the twilight sky. Then range-finding shells were brought into action, the heavy charges making black spots around the machines, but the gallant Frenchmen, rising higher and swerving to the right, then to the left, darting this way and that, passed through the barrage unharmed. There is a fascination, terrible though it is, in these duels of the air, where neither the skill nor the daring of the aviator can guard against a lucky shot.

Throughout the war what heroism and courage has been displayed by the men of this dangerous service, and with what superb spirit have they met the trials and the hardships of their hazardous calling! They are the cavalry of the skies, the crusaders of the heavens, the knights of the air, personifying the chivalry of a forgotten age, with every flight a romance and every victory an epic.

Our soldiers were billeted everywhere, in tents, in barns, in barracks, and in houses. Trained to the minute, they were supremely confident. Mutual agreement and accord is a pretty certain remedy for misunderstanding. If you and I have the same opinion about the same thing at the same time, we will not get into much trouble. So it was with these Yanks. Every one of them knew he could whip a boche, and every boche knew it, too. We heard much about hand-to-hand encounters and bayonet duels. They made flaring headlines in the newspapers, but, outside of trench raids and a few isolated cases, our boys did not have a chance to put their practice into execution. Our lads were there with the short jab, but the Germans did not wait to become acquainted. When they saw the Americans coming for them with heads down, yelling like Indians, they preferred shoe leather to bayonets, discretion to valor.

OUR SOLDIERS WERE UNAFRAID.

Make me a soldier unafraid
When the crucial hour draws near,
That I may play the manly part
And show no craven fear.
For, though the spirit may be brave,
Surprise hath oft betrayed
Through sudden shock of unknown things
And made a man afraid.
One life's a little thing to give,
Legions their price have paid;
So, if mine's added to the scroll,
Write me as unafraid.

—Harry Bryan Owsley.

Do you know that many of our boys have been arrested as deserters? Oh, yes, they have; and you and I, my colleagues, may be called upon to clear their records. We had soldiers stationed all over France—at the seaports and stations far back of the lines. Men, despairing of ever getting into the fight, deserted the colors, and when they were found they were in the firing lines fighting with their comrades!

Along the roads from Nancy to St. Genevieve were line after line of American trucks, all hidden beneath the overhanging foliage, and every grove of trees offered protection to the "pup" tents of the drivers. I asked one man how he fared. "Oh," he said, "after we see what these French people have to stand we don't say a word and think we are getting good treatment, for we all have homes to go to." I called out to a group to come home with us. "No," they yelled; "we won't go back till we've finished this job, and finished it right."

Gen. Boyle, at headquarters, related his experience with a German officer, a prisoner who was brought before him for examination. After the customary small talk had been exhausted, he asked him: "Well, what do you think of the drive at Chateau-Thierry?" "Oh," said the German, "that was a small affair; but do you think you can drive us to the Rhine?" "No," said Gen. Boyle; "we expect to drive you to Berlin." A hazy, incomprehensible expression came over the German's face, as if such a possibility had never dawned upon him. The general then asked him what he thought of the American soldier, to which the German replied, "Mein Gott; the artillery!"

While we were at headquarters several German airplanes passed overhead on their way to raid Nancy. Rockets flashed in the night to warn the city of their approach. Through deserted streets, along black roads, passing dark houses, with no lights on our cars, we journeyed back to the city. On the way I experienced a shock, although comic after realizing the cause, it was very intense and startling at the time. Having been listening to thrilling accounts of battles, and knowing that German planes were somewhere overhead, our thoughts had a keen war edge. We were in an open car when suddenly, in response to a suspicious sound, I looked up, and there only a few feet above me was a huge black object which in the darkness looked for all the world like a descending bomb. I confess I was frightened. No use for me to deny it. I felt that in a moment there would be a vacancy in the first New York congressional district. How we laughed when we found that the deadly bomb was only an innocent electric light suspended across the street! Our driver lost his way, and we spent a full half hour trying to locate our hotel. With streets in total darkness, with every window closed, every door barred, and with no one astir, it is not an easy problem to find one's way at night in these cities close to the firing line.

Returning to Paris we started for the headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces at Chaumont, 165 miles distant; the route traversed a beautiful country, rich and fertile and free from the terrible scenes of war. Plentiful crops of wheat, alfalfa and hay were being harvested, German prisoners laboring in the fields with the women and old men. We were greeted by Gen. Pershing and his staff, lunching with him in a chateau which had been placed at his disposal by a French family. He talked to us very freely of war conditions and expressed unlimited confidence in the men under his command. In his mind there was absolutely no question of the superiority of the American soldier over the German. He said they were superior in organization, in training and in fighting qualities, and that as "every American naturally thinks he can lick anyone, the Army represents this concentrated confidence."

Not far from Chaumont is the little Normandy town of Domremy, the birthplace of Joan d'Arc. In this quiet hamlet is a training camp for our soldiers, many of whom received added inspiration in their fight for liberty from the story of the life which began in the humble cottage 500 years ago. There in that little room where the heroine of France first saw the light of day, is the rough bed on which she slept, the cupboard, and a few chairs—personal mementoes of one who, freeing her beloved country from invading hosts, died neglected and deserted, a victim to the superstition and the hypocrisy of the age.

What memories crowd this quiet chamber; what sacred associations of the past. Holy inspiration, chivalry, and romance lead onward to the pathos and the agony of a friendless girl, sublime in her faith, standing alone at the stake in Rouen. I looked out of the narrow window toward the hill on which stands the chapel to commemorate her vision of long ago. What a wonderful inspiration it was that came to this child of immortal name. "Yes"; said the Frenchman standing by my side, "yes; that was a marvelous vision and she was the savior of France; but the spirit of Joan still lives. There are the saviors of France of to-day," and he pointed to the American soldiers.

Joan of Arc! Joan of Arc!
Do your eyes, from the skies, see the foe?
Joan of Arc! Joan of Arc!
Let your spirit guide us through;
Come lead your France to victory;
Joan of Arc, they are calling you.

From Chaumont we returned as far as Meaux, making in the day's run over 310 miles. But for the excellent condition of the roads it would have been utterly impossible to cover such a wide radius, and these highways are typical of all the roads in France, even those leading up to the battle fronts, subject as they are to constant use by artillery and heavy trucks. One secret of success was this maintenance of lines of communication, enabling the War Department at all times and under all conditions to forward supplies. In our journeys we frequently stopped at villages for gas and water, and whenever doing so our cars at once were surrounded by French people, who showed their appreciation and gratitude by crowding around us and thanking us for America's participation in the war. Pathetic in the extreme were the old French women whose sons and grandsons had gone to the front, many of them never to return, as they endeavored to kiss our hands. The little children in their enthusiasm and joy touched our garments, exclaiming "Americans, the saviors of France."

It was almost 1 o'clock in the morning before we reached Meaux, and just as we were approaching the city we had quite a fright. While driving along the road, with the headlights of our car burning, we were obliged to stop for a tire puncture, and what was our surprise to hear almost directly overhead the peculiar and unmistakable whirring of a German airplane. The boche machines made a sound different from those of the allies, the rhythm of the engine being uneven and easily detected. It was short work extinguishing our lights and jumping into the ditch. Not having noticed the enemy until we stopped, we scattered in all directions, for fear the German aviator had noted our position and would swoop down upon us with his machine gun. I can assure you it was with feelings of relief that we heard the exhaust of the engine grow fainter as it passed on to the north. We learned afterwards that a squadron of these raiders had visited Paris that night, and this probably was one of these machines on its way homeward. Out there in the dark, with no protection whatever, expecting every moment to see the blackness pierced by the flash of a machine gun, I know we all experienced sensations not easily forgotten.

From Meaux we proceeded to La Ferte, where a motor-transport company was camped. Here we spent about an hour with the boys, and I was fortunate in meeting several from Long Island. We had our first sight of the battle fields on which American soldiers had won such imperishable fame at Lucy and the villages around Chateau-Thierry. On every side were signs of slaughter. There shattered buildings, broken and twisted trees, and blasted slopes, with the ground ripped and torn by machine-gun fire. Here fields, acre upon acre, pitted and scarred with holes, like craters, the mark of high-explosive shells. Scattered about or heaped in piles lay all kinds of equipment—torn pieces of uniforms, broken gun carriages, unexploded shells and grenades, bayonets, helmets perforated with ragged holes, bent rifles, gas masks, and twisted machine guns with belts of unused ammunition. Here, too, were the crude graves of the immortal dead, each marked with a cross, bearing silent but eloquent testimony of how upon these battle fields, American soldiers had struggled and conquered and died. Such destruction, desolation, and ruin! What once had been prosperous villages, now only heaps of débris; where houses had stood, now only piles of crumbled stones and broken tiles. Demolished churches, battered pavements, wrecked homes, tell of the terrible havoc of those grim July days when our boys held the line in the defense of Paris.

Let us go back a few months in history and recount briefly the stages of the German offensive which had for its objective the dividing of the allied armies and the capture of the French capital. With the collapse of Russia and the establishment of new frontiers on her eastern borders, Germany was in a position to concentrate her forces in a last desperate effort to break through on the western front. Time was now running against her, for with economic conditions in the empire daily becoming worse and with America marshaling her enormous resources of men and material, Germany knew that her only chance to win was by one all-powerful drive, smashing through before a revolution would defeat her at home and before America could place in the field her millions of fresh soldiers.

The troops stationed on the Russian line were transferred to the west and from Austria were brought large quantities of war material. All were thrown into the desperate gamble. Superior in men and artillery, the long-expected attack began on March 21, with the main blow directed against the British Fifth Army in Picardy. In a few days the whole British front from Ypres to Amiens was assailed by the most savage attack of the war. The British were rolled back, the Germans in rapid advance capturing Peronne, Ham, and Bapaume and opening up a gap between the British and French Armies. The old battle field of the Somme was again in enemy hands. On the 26th the French arrived in force and closed the gap which had threatened destruction to the British Army. This drive, which extended to a 50-mile front, had by March 30 gained for the German Army an advance of 35 miles. After an interval of a week another attack was launched, this time in the Ypres sector. The Germans advanced just south of Arras, close to Vimy Ridge, delivering blow after blow, which bent back the Third British Army; the gains were unimportant, yet the losses to the German Army were enormous. As the British in this second Battle of the Somme were on the retreat, their losses also were heavy, not only in guns and material but in men wounded who were captured by the Germans.

Then came Gen. Foch, the new commander in chief of the allied armies, and with Foch came confidence. Although the strain at the Somme was temporarily relieved, with Amiens still in allied hands, the crisis was by no means over, and the British and French and now the American armies had before them new and terrible tests of their fighting qualities. In the four weeks which had elapsed since the launching of the German offensive the world had never known such carnage. Terrible blow after terrible blow had fallen on the British forces. They were beaten, routed, almost annihilated, and yet despite their reverses, with backs to the wall they fought on and held the lines. On April 12 Gen. Haig, in a special order of the day addressed to "all ranks of the British Army in France and Flanders," gave this ringing message:

Three weeks ago to-day the enemy began his terrific attacks against us on a 50-mile front. His objects are to separate us from the French, to take the Channel ports, and to destroy the British Army. In spite of throwing already 106 divisions into the battle and enduring a most reckless sacrifice of human life, he has yet made little progress toward his goals. We owe this to the determined fighting and self-sacrifice of our troops. Words fail me to express the admiration which I feel for the splendid resistance offered by all ranks of our army under the most trying circumstances. Many among us are tired. To those I would say that victory will belong to the side which holds out longest. The French Army is moving rapidly and in great force to our support. There is no other course open to us but to fight it out; every position must be held to the last man. There must be no retirement. With our backs to the wall, and believing in the justice of our cause, each one of us must fight to the end. The safety of our homes and the freedom of mankind depend alike upon the conduct of each one of us at this critical moment.

At this point the Germans changed their system of attack. Their new method was to strike with one colossal blow after another, few in number, yet with their entire strength in each. This was the strategy of Napoleon, who believed in venturing all on a single stroke, risking complete disaster if the supreme blow failed. His brilliant victories at Marengo, Jena, Austerlitz, and Wagram were achieved in this way. When the old guard was defeated at Waterloo, the Empire was at an end.

Following the second Battle of the Somme there was almost a month's pause before the Germans advanced again. During this time each side prepared for the summer campaigns, reorganizing shattered divisions and bringing forward new supplies of men and guns.

On May 27 the imperial army struck on the Aisne sector along a front extending for 30 miles. The attack consisted of a brief bombardment of great intensity followed by dense waves of infantry, advancing in overwhelming numbers in the wake of a lifting barrage. Heavy artillery pounded the lines of communication and shelled the areas in the rear of the retreating lines. The French were driven from the Aisne and across the Vesle River, then the Germans turned directly toward Paris. The situation was critical in the extreme, for Foch not only had to bar the roads to Paris, but also to prevent the capture of Rheims and the heights south of it, which were threatened. While he was hurrying forward his reserves and checking the German advance on Paris with the wreck of his divisions, Soissons was taken, and with it Chateau-Thierry on the banks of the Marne. The salient thus established, penetrated toward the capital to a depth of 30 miles, and although the ground occupied was less than a quarter of that captured in Picardy, yet it was territory that had been securely in French hands since the Battle of the Marne in September, 1914. This third Battle of the Aisne brought the Germans within 40 miles of Paris. By their new method of attack the trench system of defense was of little use and the allies were thrown back with heavy losses.

The German tide was near its flood; French reserves and American troops begin to pour in between the Forest of Villers-Cotterets and Chateau-Thierry, driving back the Germans who had by this time crossed to the south side of the Marne. While our boys here along the river were showing the mettle of which they were made, another body of American troops were winning fame by their capture of Cantigny in the north. On June 9, two weeks after their Aisne drive, the Germans launched an attack on the Oise, striking on a line between Montdidier and Noyon. The objective was the capture of Compiegne, which would compel the French to evacuate the high ground around the city, and although the Germans advanced 6 miles in the first few days they failed to take the town.

Let me now speak of our own boys who won unperishable glory in stemming the German rush on Paris. You and I recall how day after day we would see on the map in the lobby that thin line of defense being pushed farther and farther southward, as the German Army swept forward. Each day a victory in the advance, each day bringing them nearer to their goal, until only 40 miles separated them from the capital. Then America, who in all her faith and strength had been answering the call of humanity, hurled into the breach her sterling manhood. The Germans had struck a stone wall; when they saw those old slouch hats they thought that the stone wall was made of Australians and Canadians—and it was an honor to be mistaken for a Canadian or an Australian on that line of death. They sent back for more artillery, for their reserves; they rushed in the Prussian Guard; and they stormed and charged, but that stone wall held; and then they discovered that these slouch hats belonged to the boys from the States—the American "devils."

A short distance beyond Lucy is Belleau Wood, now known as the Wood of the Marine Brigade, in honor of the men who have forever made it famous. We spent some time wandering over the historic ground still strewn with camp utensils and implements of war. The dugouts and caves were littered with tin cans, papers, and discarded clothing of our soldiers who had occupied these shelters after their victory. I picked up a letter written by a mother to her son. It was full of love and hope and pride. It told him of local items and ended with a fervent prayer that all would go well with her boy. As I read the weather-stained note, full of the peace and sympathy of some quiet home, my thoughts reverted to that boy. Was he still fighting with his regiment, adding new laurels to his fame and awaiting the time when he could join the family circle, or had he gone to that eternal home to be mourned forever by a sorrowing mother? In places the woods are so thick with underbrush and fallen trees that it was almost impossible to force one's way through the tangle. As a guide in this jungle, the soldiers had tied lines of string from tree to tree. Here and there we came upon the bodies of forgotten Germans, the stench of whose decaying flesh was overpowering.

Let me tell you some stories of German treachery, which shows the kind of a foe our boys were fighting. After the terrific hammering of our marines and infantry the boche began to surrender, and each day numbers of them were made prisoners. On one occasion five were seen advancing. They had thrown down their rifles and with hands above their heads came forward shouting "Kamerad! Kamerad!" A squad of our boys, thinking they were honest, rose from the wheat fields to bring them in. Directly behind the first five came five more with hands up shouting "Kamerad," and more of our men went forward. Suddenly the first five stopped, leaned over, and then the second five rushed up to them and commenced firing machine guns, which had been strapped to the backs of the first five. Every one of those men was killed by this dastardly act, but there were others who had seen the trick, and not one of the boches escaped to tell the story of his perfidy. They told me, too, of other tricks, how Germans, dressed as Americans, crawled up close to the lines on dark nights and in good English shouted "gas." Then while our men were adjusting their masks the Germans raided the trench.

Another instance was of a boche machine gunner who came forward to surrender, and while he was standing with hands up his gun opened fire. Upon investigation it was discovered that by means of wires attached to his feet he was able to operate his gun from a distance. I want to tell about a Brooklyn marine, a young chap I met on the Leviathan just after he had come out of the hospital. He had gone through the drive for the woods without a scratch and one night he volunteered to take a message to another command. The work of these runners was fraught with greatest risk; a cool head and daring nerve were essential to the task. The boy started out in the early morning, his course lying through the edge of the wood. Anticipating no danger, he groped his way through the darkness, stumbling over the rough ground, when suddenly a shot rang out; he fell with a bullet in his side and his right arm wounded. While he lay in agony and in terror lest his foe should discover him, he heard the twigs snap as his assailant crept upon him to learn the result of his shot. Knowing if the German found him still alive his chances of life would be small, he marshaled his fast-ebbing strength, rolled over on his side, and, wounded as he was, managed to draw his revolver. Too weak to stand, he balanced his pistol on the wrist of his left hand, keeping it pointed in the direction of the approaching sound. Luckily for him, the German was advancing in front. Daylight had come, and with the faint glow of the morning streaming through the heavy foliage, he saw the head of his enemy as the German crept toward him with fixed bayonet. Fortunately his aim was true, and at the first shot down went the boche. To be sure there was no camouflage, the boy emptied his revolver into the German and then swooned from loss of blood. For 36 hours he laid there unconscious and when found his hand still gripped the pistol which had saved his life.

While I am speaking of these personal exploits, let me relate others I feel sure will be of interest. I met a young naturalized Italian on his way back to Seattle. He had just come from the hospital and was bemoaning his fate at not being allowed to go back into the lines. His right arm had been amputated at the shoulder, but he was bright and full of fight and showed how he could still throw a grenade. Both his father and mother had been killed when the Germans and Austrians swept down into northern Italy in the fall of 1917; and two brothers had lost their lives in the Italian Army. He told me how he had fought and killed, buoyed up in his strength and courage by the hope that each time his rifle brought down a boche it might be the man who had murdered his mother. This poor chap was all alone in the world, and his one consuming desire was to get back, wounded as he was, to fight again for his adopted country and against the enemies of the land of his birth.

Another case was of a soldier who had been made a prisoner and was employed filling up a hole in the road over which artillery was to be moved during the night. His guard fell asleep, but the American, instead of escaping, filled up the cavity, using soft dirt and refuse, which he covered over with gravel, giving it the appearance of a properly finished job; then he drove his pick into the sleeping boche and ran. He got back safely into the lines, and a few days later, when the Germans had been driven back, a heavy gun was found mired in that hole, the result of the forethought of that brave young boy. Oh, those lads had their nerve with them, and their gumption, too.

An American who had been taken prisoner was being marched to the rear with a guard on each side and one behind, when suddenly he put out both feet and the two Germans beside him stumbled to the ground. In a flash he grappled with the one in the rear, securing his rifle; then, before they regained their feet, he killed the two who had fallen. Compelling the other one to surrender, he marched him back a prisoner. For this he was granted two months' leave.

I met another boy who tried the same thing, but was not so successful. Instead of tripping his guards, he struck one, knocking him down, and then turned to the other, but in the meantime the guard in the rear had driven a bayonet into his back, paralyzing his spine. He was left for dead and lay several days before he was found. When I saw him he was a hopeless cripple. One badly wounded chap I met, when asked how he felt, replied, "Oh, I am all right, but I am looking for the man who did it."

The Germans were extremely clever in their schemes of deception, but they did not fool the Americans very long. I was told the story of how in an old trench which the French were occupying, spies mysteriously appeared. While their presence was known, their method of getting into the lines was not detected or even suspected until a German who had been taken prisoner and was sick of war gave away the secret. He showed behind a screen of burlap, a door which led into a tunnel. The French, of course, knew of this opening, but they thought it a blind tunnel and paid little attention to it. The German said, "I will show you how it was done," and with that gave a few raps on the door, when immediately there appeared three Germans dressed as French soldiers. This little game had been going on for some time, and the spies had been able to communicate a good deal of valuable information.

I met a poor boy on crutches whose right foot had been shot away. He told me his story of courage. When he was wounded he was out in no man's land and could obtain no medical attention. With rare presence of mind, he undid the lacings of the shoe on his mangled foot and used them as a ligature to bind up his bleeding stump, thus saving his life.

Another case was of five wounded men who had been captured and taken to an old barn, where they were left, the Germans retreating before medical attention could be given them by their Red Cross. These poor fellows lay in that barn from Monday morning until Wednesday noon without food or water and with shells from both sides bursting about them. The roof of the barn was blown away and they were covered with splinters and dirt. Then they heard our troops marching by but were too weak to call out. Finally they were rescued by a telephone gang who had come to the barn to string up wires.

Let me tell you of a boy, a son of old Bunker Hill stock. He was a marine, only 18 years old, and yet had seen 15 months of service and had 3 wound stripes on his arm, the last from a broken leg at Belleau Wood. This boy when 16 had gone to New York, where he endeavored to enlist in the Navy. He passed all requirements, but when asked for his birth certificate confessed his age, and the officer sent him home. One morning on his way to school he hiked out for another recruiting station, and this time managed to get into the Marine Corps, had gone through their training camps, and had made on the firing line a marvelous record for bravery and courage.

A grewsome story was told me by a young chap, who, with his pal, had wrapped themselves in their blankets and had gone to sleep close up to the firing lines. A heavy bombardment was on, and shells were exploding all around, but the tired lads were soon asleep. My young friend was awakened by a sudden movement of his bunkie; he reached over to ascertain the trouble, and his hand met a warm, soft substance. In alarm, he called the guard, who produced a flash, and, to his horror, the lad found he had plunged his hand into the shattered skull of his dead comrade. Another fellow told me of being out in "no man's land" on patrol duty when a flare went up. Dropping to the ground for concealment he became spattered with stinking offal. He had thrust his arm into the stomach of a decaying German! Oh, no wonder, my colleagues, that boys come back with nerves shattered and minds wandering when they have to endure such trials as these!

But, in the midst of all the fearful scenes that try men's souls and pall the stoutest hearts, there is humor as well as tragedy. They tell the story of a darkey who described the meaning of zero hour and the feat of going over the top. He said, "You is told to clean yo' gun and sharpen yo' bayonet and get everything in shape, and then yo' wait and putty soon yo' hear them cannons aboomin' and then yo' hear a whistle, and then yo' stand up on the fire step, crawl over the top, and say 'Good mornin', Mr. Eternity.'"

One of the best of these darkey stories is of a young southern soldier who was known for his dexterity with the razor. Having been told that he was to go over the top, he at once got busy honing his trusty weapon. He stropped it and polished it, having it in fine condition when he started. He got down into the boche trenches and a big, burly German made a lunge with his bayonet, which he dodged. "Missed me," yelled the darkey, and with that he made a swipe with his razor. "Missed me," said the German. "Missed you? Like h—— I did; jess you try to move yo' haid."

Here is another story that has been told so often that I hesitate to repeat it; but it is a good one: Two boys were lamenting the fact that their shoes were worn out. They did not want to take the trouble to go to the quartermaster for new ones, so one said he was going over to borrow a pair from Fritz. He went, and soon came back with his find. His chum said, "Well, you had luck; guess I will go over to-morrow night and see what I can get." So when to-morrow night came, over he went but he did not come back, and his friend, waiting for him, thought he had been killed or made a prisoner; but just at the break of day back came the chap, helmet gone, face covered with blood, clothes all torn, but he had a new pair of shoes on his feet. "Where on earth have you been?" his friend asked him. "Oh," the other fellow said, "I had a terrible time. You know," he said, "I had to kill 16 Germans before I could find a pair of shoes that would fit me."

I wonder if you have heard the story of the raw recruit who was commanded by his captain to "present arms." Bewildered by the order he blurted out, "Sure, take the darned old gun; I don't want it." Two soldiers were discussing Army regulations, and the conversation turned to courts-martial. One said to the other, "Suppose you were sentenced to be shot at sunrise, what would you pray for?" His friend replied, "Pray for? I would pray for a cloudy morning."

Whenever in the years to come the name of Belleau Wood is mentioned, there will rise the picture of the United States Marines fighting and dying, the heroes which they are. They exemplified the courage, the bravery, and the grim determination of the Nation whose uniform they wore, whose traditions were their faith, whose glory was their own, and whose honor they held more precious than life. To show how imbued with the traditions of their corps these warriors were, let me tell you the story of a wounded boy in a hospital. Coming out from an operation, some one asked him if he was an American. "No, sir," he said, "I am a marine."

On the afternoon of June 2 began the Battle of Chateau-Thierry, with the Americans holding the line nearest Paris, at a point where the Prussian blow would fall the hardest. On came the gray-clad hordes expecting an easy victory; but wave after wave was swallowed up in that seething fire of the marines and the soldiers of the American Army. The machine gunners and riflemen withheld their fire until they could literally follow Gen. Warren's famous order, "Don't fire until you see the whites of their eyes." Artillery, machine guns, and rifles tore great gaps in the advancing line. The Germans wavered, then stopped, then fled, leaving the field carpeted with their dead. To prevent any attempt to advance by infiltrating through, the Americans, with machine guns and rifles, raked the woods and ravines in which the enemy had taken shelter.

Foiled in their attempt to break the lines, and mystified at the stubbornness of the defense, the Germans for the next few days strengthened the positions they had previously won. In the caves and among the rocks and along the ravines in the black recesses of Belleau Wood they established nest after nest of machine guns. In this jungle of underbrush and heavy timber they believed they held an impregnable position, and this meant that unless routed and driven out the defeat of their attack of June 2 would count for nothing. The Battle of Chateau-Thierry, although it had checked their advance, could not be a decisive victory for the allied cause unless Belleau Wood was captured also. At 5 o'clock p. m., June 6, the marines commenced their attack against the German position; the wood itself, and the towns of Torcy and Bouresches forming the objective. This battle—or, rather, a series of battles—which continued in all its fury for days, ended in the complete triumph for American arms. So impetuous was the attack, so daring the charge, that in many cases the men overreached their objectives. One officer, reprimanded because he had allowed his men to advance beyond the designated point, excused himself by saying he could not hold them back. "If the Germans can't stop them, how in thunder do you think I can?" he replied.

Without relief, without sleep, without food or water they held the lines in those grim days of the terrific onslaught of the German drive; held when to yield would have meant irretrievable disaster; held and saved Paris. Exhausted to the very limit of human endurance, with ranks decimated, fighting in American fashion and with American daring, they met attack after attack and charge after charge. They beat to its knees the invincible Prussian Guard, which had been thrown in to "show these amateurs how to fight"; then smashing forward, they hurled back, ever back, in disorder and defeat, the legions of the imperial army.

But there are many who will never fight again. They will be mourned by fathers and mothers, sisters and wives, and they will be revered by the millions of Americans who will pay them homage everlasting. Every spot where American blood has been shed for American honor is hallowed ground, every deed a sacred memory, every grave a consecrated shrine. Belleau Wood and Chateau-Thierry are forever written on the pages of American history. With Lexington and New Orleans, with Gettysburg and Antietam and San Juan they will endure, imperishable monuments to the bravery and courage of American heroes, the vindication of democracy and the triumph of liberty and of righteousness.

The heroism and endurance of that conflict are unparalleled and form one of the most brilliant chapters in our military annals. All fame and honor to the United States Marines; all honor and fame to the soldiers of the American Army, equally brave and equally courageous! It was here that the blood of heroes was transmuted into glory everlasting.

We've learnt the law of shot and shell,
We've learnt the law of steel;
But the law of the trench is a cultured hell,
For it stifles the power to feel.

And this is our fate: When the gods are kind,
Our existence shall simply cease—
A sniper's bullet, a trench that's mined—
Godspeed, and a quick release.

—Capt. Horne in Harper's Magazine.

It was at Belleau Wood that Lieut. Col. Wise uttered his laconic reply to the French officer who ordered him to retreat, a reply which voiced the spirit of the indomitable marines. With lines broken after days of terrific fighting, the gallant French were drawing back to new position farther south. They had begun to filter through the American lines, when a staff officer hurried up to Col. Wise, saluted, and said, "You are welcome, Colonel; you are in time to cover the retreat. I am instructed to request you to hold the Germans when you get in touch with their advance as long as you can. You will then retreat to the trenches we shall have prepared for you." "Retreat," said Wise, "retreat, hell! We've only just arrived. We'll let the boches do the retreating."

From Belleau Wood we proceeded to Chateau-Thierry, passing on the way many companies of artillery, supply trains, and motor trucks, all moving out of the sector. Those great guns rolled up the hills as easily as motor cars. Every available space on the huge trucks was crowded to the limit, with boys astride the gun muzzles and others hanging to the fenders, or taking chances atop the engine hoods. And such dust, as this seemingly endless procession in perfect formation, moved along the highways! Patrols were stationed at every curve and at all crossroads to keep the traffic moving. No stops were allowed except at certain places; from the general down all had to obey the regulations, for otherwise the roads would have become blocked and the transportation system paralyzed.

Chateau-Thierry, although a sad wreck, was not so completely demolished as other villages we visited. About 5 miles beyond we came to Bois de Chatelet, near Coincy, in which one of the big "Berthas" had been located. A small spur railroad ran into the woods, evidently to supply ammunition. The circular concrete foundation, erected in a great pit, was about 45 feet in diameter, and the great mount which carried the gun, revolved on ball bearings the size of coconuts. The gun itself had been removed, but all around were brass powder cases and loaded shells. A clearing had been made in the woods around the battery, but to conceal its position from French air machines, huge boxes were constructed in which freshly cut trees from other parts of the forest were fastened. On the approach of an allied plane, gangs of men filled in the clear space with these dummy trees, giving the woods an even appearance, and thus rendering it impossible for the airmen to locate the gun. The ground for acres was covered with empty powder cases, many of them made of sheet iron, showing how short the Germans were of brass.

Returning, we passed an American air station, but unfortunately did not have time to stop. Along the roadsides and back in the fields were graves marked with simple crosses, many of them the resting places of our own boys.

Before proceeding on our journey let me complete the history of the campaigns. We will return to the fifth and what proved to be the last German drive. It was launched on July 15 and was designed to clear the road to Paris. At its inception the offensive extended along a front of over 60 miles between Chateau-Thierry and the western edge of the Argonne Forest, and later, as it developed northward, covered a distance of 100 miles. In the earlier attacks, the element of surprise played an important part, but the French anticipated and were prepared for the blow of July 15. The German bombardment of rear areas, reaching this time as far back as Meaux—only 20 miles from Paris—did not produce the customary confusion and their "mustard gas" failed to demoralize the French troops.

Furious as were the assaults, the attacks failed of any important results. On the first day the enemy succeeded in crossing the Marne, but were immediately driven back by a series of brilliant and successful counter offensives by our own troops, which not only reestablished the allied line on our front, but produced, apart from its military value, a stimulating effect upon the morale of the allied armies. Despite their reverses the Germans on the second day of the battle again crossed the Marne in the southern salient, while farther to the north they menaced Rheims. But Ludendorff had spent his strength, and his troops, exhausted by constant fighting and discouraged by their appalling casualties, lost heart at their failure to break through the French and American lines.

On the night of the 17th the tide turned. Gen. Foch, the military genius of history, launched his offensive with the counter thrust led by Gen. Mangin, and by noon of the 18th, with French and American troops leading the advance, the German retreat was in full flood. By night a dozen villages had been captured by our troops and the French were threatening Soissons from the hills back of the town. By July 22 the Germans had evacuated Chateau-Thierry and were giving way all along the line. Foch had not only checked and smashed the German lines, but he had wrested the offensive from the enemy, thus achieving in this second Battle of the Marne not only a brilliant military victory but a moral triumph which destroyed forever German expectations of capturing Paris. In that decisive counterthrust the American troops played a conspicuous and a gallant part. Comparatively small in numbers our forces displayed fighting qualities of the highest order. They had defeated the picked soldiers of Germany, stayed the attack on Paris, and turned the assault into a rout.

With the German Army driven back to the Vesle and the Aisne, the second Battle of the Marne came to a victorious end. It was one of the decisive achievements of the war, strangely similar to the first Marne. Paris had again been saved, and the allies, with the ever-increasing force of Americans, were enabled to assume the offensive, which was to continue until Germany, beaten and broken, sued for peace. Gen. Pershing, in praise of the American units which had stopped the German drive and then with the French had turned the tide, issued this statement:

It thrills me with pride to record in general orders a tribute to the service and achievements of the First and Third Corps, comprising the First, Second, Third, Fourth, Twenty-sixth, Twenty-eighth, Thirty-second, and Forty-second Divisions of the American Expeditionary Forces.

You came to the battle field at the crucial hour of the allied cause. For almost four years the most formidable army the world had as yet seen has pressed its invasion of France and stood threatening its capital. At no time had that army been more powerful or menacing than when, on July 15, it struck again to destroy in one great battle the brave men opposed to it and to enforce its brutal will upon the world and civilization.

Three days later, in conjunction with our allies, you counterattacked. The allied armies gained a brilliant victory that marks the turning point of the war. You did more than give our brave allies the support to which as a Nation our faith was pledged. You proved that our altruism, our pacific spirit, our sense of justice, have not blunted our virility or our courage.

You have shown that American initiative and energy are as fit for the tests of war as for the pursuits of peace. You have justly won the unstinted praise of our allies and the eternal gratitude of our countrymen.

We have paid for our success in the lives of many of our brave comrades. We shall cherish their memory always and claim for our history and literature their bravery, achievements, and sacrifice.

This order will be read to all organizations at the first assembly formation after its receipt.

JOHN J. PERSHING,
General, Commander in Chief.

On the morning of August 8 the Fourth British Army began the Battle of the Third Somme, the advance, after a brief but terrific bombardment, sweeping all before it. In five days the allied forces regained a large area and captured immense numbers of prisoners and great quantities of munitions. The fighting of the spring and summer of 1918 was vastly different from the methods of the previous months. After three and a half years of trench warfare, with inconsiderable forward movements on either side, the situation changed into open warfare, with advances netting 20 and more miles in one great drive.

On September 12 came the American attack on the St. Mihiel salient, and in less than 24 hours this dagger point ceased to exist. American troops, American tanks, and American artillery had defeated a German and Austrian force, captured thousands of prisoners, and taken one of the strongest positions on the western front. German power at its zenith had been smashed by opponents whose power was only just rising above the horizon. This was the beginning of the end. From now until the last gun was fired it was one unbroken allied advance along the far-flung line from Verdun to Nieuport. Retreating to the old Hindenburg line, Ludendorff endeavored to stay the tide that was sweeping him to destruction, but all to no purpose. The decisive thrust was made on October 8 by the British, supported by an American division and Debeney's French army. The line bent, then broke, and by the 10th the allied forces were through, and the Hindenburg line had become a memory, and with it went the legend of the infallible and invincible German war machine.

While the British were piercing the German lines on the western section of the front, the Americans were achieving an equally great success on the eastern end. After their brilliant victory at St. Mihiel, Gen. Pershing moved his army northward from Verdun, advancing during the last days of September from the Meuse to the Argonne Forest. The offensive was launched on September 26, the attack being made with a heavy concentration of artillery, airplanes, and tanks, supported by many divisions of infantry. Smashing their way through the German lines, by the night of the 28th the Americans had penetrated the enemy positions from 4 to 7 miles on a 20-mile front.

The Argonne Forest is about 30 miles long and 6 wide. Since 1914 it had been in possession of the Germans, who had fortified it in every conceivable way. They considered it impregnable. In this wilderness of deep ravines, swamps, rocks, and broken hills covered with heavy timber and choked with matted underbrush, the Germans had constructed elaborate systems of trenches, entanglements, ditches, concrete pill boxes, covered pits, and steel-enforced fortifications. Our forces were handicapped by the lack of roads, only two leading into this region, which made it difficult to forward supplies, and these two were soon destroyed under the continuous bombardment. The tangled woods were a mass of machine-gun nests, concealed behind rocks and trees and bristling from every hole and depression in the jungle of undergrowth. The thick timber made aerial observation exceedingly difficult, and artillery could be used with little effect.

The Americans had to cut their way through a zone of entanglements 2½ miles wide, crossed and recrossed with hundreds of miles of barbed wire stretching in every direction. This wire, frequently reaching 10 feet above the ground, was nailed to trees through the forest and was often completely obscured by the high bushes. The Germans had built traps under the exact range of their guns farther back, enabling them to sweep with a storm of fire, the troops which concentrated about these hidden snares. They also had excavated huge holes in the roads; these they covered with a few inches of surfacing, so that artillery and tanks advancing over them would become stalled. There were trenches of all descriptions, large and small, single and double, forming an endless labyrinth. Many were of solid concrete, communicating with the rear through protected passages. Some of the dugouts were subterranean palaces, equipped with electric lights, running water, cooking ranges, and all the furnishings of a modern club.

The most difficult task for the tanks were the stone walls and masonry work of the Hindenburg line, which in many places rose sharply several feet above the level of the ground. During much of the time a cold, penetrating rain fell upon the men, who were without shelter except holes in the ground and "pup" tents. Fighting in the darkness of the forest, against foes intrenched behind strong defenses, it was a veritable hades through which our men were ordered to go, but they went. It beggars description. Through the barbed wire, across swamps and thickets saturated with mustard gas, over trenches swept by shell and rifle and hand grenades, they charged with bayonets set, capturing hundreds of machine-gun nests and thousands of prisoners.

A history of the savage fighting in this grim forest will be incomplete without an account of the handful of men who, surrounded by the enemy and without food or water or hope of relief, refused to surrender. The story of the "Lost Battalion" is one of the epics of the war, and the defiant answer of Maj. Whittlesey, its courageous commander, has become a classic. This battalion having made its objective against stern opposition, found itself advanced beyond the main body of attacking troops, and that the Germans were not only in front of them but behind and on both sides. They had started forward with but scant supplies of rations and only 220 rounds of ammunition. Cut off from communications, for three days these men were the targets for German artillery and machine guns, and while their thin lines were being raked by this incessant fire, hand grenades and bombs from trench mortars were hurled at them from all sides.

On the second day rations gave out, but the determined men, subsisting on crusts of bread, plug tobacco, and roots of trees, obtaining water from a muddy swamp, fought on, exhausted as they were. Their plight having been discovered by their comrades, several unsuccessful attempts were made to rescue them. Airplanes dropped food and ammunition, but in that tangled fastness of underbrush, so dense that it was impossible to see more than a few yards away, these supplies failed to reach the entrapped battalion. After 36 hours without food, with many of the men so exhausted they could not stand, when their ammunition was almost exhausted, an American who had been captured appeared with a note for Maj. Whittlesey, which read:

Americans, you are surrounded on all sides. Surrender in the name of humanity. You will be well treated.

The Americans did not know that relief was near, but they did know that even if they escaped death by German fire they would be victims of starvation. Yet, desperate as was their position, they cheered to the echo the reply of their major when he shouted back, "Surrender? Go to hell!" Late that night our troops broke through the German lines and reached the determined band, three-fourths of whom were still alive.

The troops that did such valiant fighting in this forest, one of the bitterest contested battles of the war, were largely from New York. They came from Manhattan, Long Island, Brooklyn, The Bronx, Staten Island, and Westchester. These boys fought with the spirit of seasoned veterans, and too high a tribute can not be paid them. All hail to the gallant Seventy-seventh Division and the equally brave Twenty-seventh and Forty-second.

The defeat in the Argonne completely destroyed whatever chance the enemy had of reorganizing their shattered forces and of making a stand somewhere behind the lines which would have enabled them to hold a defensive position through the winter. It was the decisive blow, but won at an appalling cost.

Encountering heavy losses and enduring untold hardships, our troops swept onward and, after five weeks of continuous fighting against the best of German and Austrian troops, entered Sedan, the old battle field which had witnessed the collapse of the second empire. From this ill-fated field had come the military greatness of Germany and the temporary obscuration of France.

Then Haig, in the end of October, launched his final attack upon Valenciennes. On November 1 the Canadians broke through the last line of the German defenses, captured the city, and then pushed on toward Mons. When the end came the British were in possession of all the ground they had occupied at the beginning of the war.

After more than 50 months they had "come back." They had kept their promise to the inhabitants of all the region, who four years previously had looked sadly upon the retiring British columns. For England the war ended where it had begun.

The return of the British to Mons was no less dramatic than the taking of Sedan by the Americans. On our battle flags hereafter will be inscribed the names of Cantigny, Chateau-Thierry, Vaux, Belleau Wood, Second Marne, St. Mihiel, and the Argonne, and the debt we owe the men who made these names immortal is beyond our payment or our appreciation. Generations will visit these battle fields to offer their tribute to the heroes, living and dead, who here maintained the traditions of their country and the honor of its flag.

Let me quote the messages sent by Gen. Foch and Gen. Pershing to the men under their command on the termination of the war.

Gen. Foch to the allied armies:

Officers, noncommissioned officers, and soldiers of the allied armies: After having resolutely stopped the enemy, you have for months fought him with faith and indefatigable energy without respite. You have won the greatest battle in history and saved the most sacred cause—the liberty of the world.

Be proud. You have adorned your flags with immortal glory. Posterity preserves for you its recognition.

Gen. Pershing to those who served under him:

I pay the supreme tribute to our officers and soldiers of the line. When I think of their heroism, their patience under hardships, their unflinching spirit of offensive action, I am filled with emotion which I am unable to express. Their deeds are immortal, and they have earned the eternal gratitude of our country.

I know of no more fitting way to close this brief and very imperfect account of the great military movements of 1918 than to quote the eloquent words of Mr. Frank H. Simonds, the brilliant war correspondent. Writing in the Review of Reviews, he said:

"For the whole world Sedan has had its significance for nearly half a century. And now the last act in the world war takes place about this town of evil fame. The disaster of the past is abolished by the victory of the present. A German defeat at Sedan is in every sense a fitting end to this struggle, the more fitting since behind the battle lines the German Empire is falling at the self-same hour.

"The French will hereafter have to share Verdun with us as a place of pilgrimage. 'They shall not pass' was the immortal challenge of the French soldiers who held that gateway in 1916. 'We shall pass' was the American watchword, and in six weeks we cleared the road from Verdun to Sedan. A century and a third ago American and French soldiers in generous rivalry sought to be the first in the breach at Yorktown. In the first week of November, 1918, the old rivalry broke out afresh under the walls of Sedan, where the soldiers of Petain and Pershing repeated the triumphs of those of Rochambeau and Washington. We have won the war in the only way that could be worth while. Militarism has brought to Germany a greater harvest of suffering than defenselessness could ever bring. It was Waterloo which shattered the French dream of world power. In the hundred days of Foch, Prussian militarism has been broken as completely as the Napoleonic. The nation collapsed behind the army, but the army was already beaten and the German fleet mutinied rather than engage in battle with the foe. The armistice of Senlis is, then, one of the great landmarks in all human history. It marks the failure of one more effort to dominate the world by the sword. And there is a singular appropriateness in the fact that the death sentence of German militarism should have been signed at Senlis, one of so many French cities ravaged by German brutality and wantonness. 'Have a care,' the German soldiers told the terrified survivors of their Senlis massacres as they stood amidst the still smoking ruins of their homes as the Kaiser's guards turned northward after the first Marne. 'Have a care, for we will come again.' They did come to Senlis again, and there face to face with Marshal Foch, who was waiting for them with the written terms of the armistice, waiting for them, surrounded by the ruins of Senlis, they signed their names to a document which will for all time record the utter and immeasurable failure of German arms. Nor was it less appropriate that the document should be signed just before the daylight hour, since it marked the ending of one of the longest nights in history."

I can not leave the brilliant record of our troops, many of them unfortunately still on foreign soil, without quoting the eloquent address of Gen. Pershing delivered on Thanksgiving Day:

Fellow soldiers, never in the history of our country have we as a people come together with such full hearts as on this greatest of all Thanksgiving Days. The moment throbs with emotion, seeking to find full expression. Representing the high ideals of our countrymen and cherishing the spirit of our forefathers, who first celebrated this festival of Thanksgiving, we are proud to have repaid a debt of gratitude to the land of Lafayette and to have lent our aid in saving civilization from destruction.

The unscrupulous invader has been driven from the devastated scenes of his unholy conquest. The tide of conflict which during the dark days of midsummer threatened to overwhelm the allies forces has been turned into glorious victory. As the sounds of battle die away and the beaten foe hurries from the field, it is fitting that the conquering armies should pause to give thanks to the God of battles who has guided our case aright.

VICTORY WAS UNITED STATES' GOAL.

Victory was our goal. It is a hard won gift of the soldier to his country. Only the soldier knows the cost of a gift we now present to the Nation. As soldiers inspired by every spiritual sentiment, we have each silently prayed that the success of righteousness should be ours. To-day, with thankfulness, we humbly acknowledge that His strength has given us the victory. We are thankful that the privilege has been given to us to serve in such a cause.

In this hour of thanksgiving our eternal gratitude goes out to those heroes who loved liberty better than life, who sleep yonder where they fell; to the maimed, whose honorable scars testify stronger than words to their splendid valor, and to the brave fellows whose strong, relentless blows finally crushed the enemy's power.

Nor in our prayers shall we forget the widow who freely gave the husband, more precious than her life, nor those who, in hidden heroism, have impoverished themselves to enrich the cause, nor our comrades who, in more obscure posts, here and at home, have furnished their toil to the soldiers at the front.

NEW OUTLOOK ON LIFE.

To many fame has come. New names have been inscribed on the roll of the immortals. To all have come a new outlook on life, a clearer perspective regarding its obligation, a more exalted conception of duty and honor and a deeper sense of responsibility to the Nation and to God.

May we give thanks that unselfish service has given us this new vision; that we are able to return to our fireside and our country with higher aims and a firmer purpose, alike ennobling to ourselves and to those who have held long vigil and have prayed for us that we might worthily represent them.

This spirit that has won the victory is to become a permanent and indispensable mainstay of peace and happiness. It is not a matter of individual choice, but of obligation, that we should proudly carry it back with us. If the glory of our military service has been a spontaneous offering of loyalty, it is too priceless to be cast aside by indulgence and too sacred not to be cherished always.

Our Nation awaits the return of its soldiers, believing in the stability of character that has come from self-discipline and self-sacrifice. Confident of the new power that the stern school of war and discipline has brought to each of us, American mothers await with loving hearts their gallant sons. Great cause, indeed, have we to thank God for trials successfully met and victories won. Still more should we thank Him for the golden future, with its wealth of opportunity and its hope of a permanent universal peace.

I will now take up the thread of my narrative. Leaving Chateau-Thierry, we returned to Paris, stopping en route at Meaux where we regaled ourselves on horse meat. That night we left for Rome. At Turin we were tendered a reception by the city officials and officers of the Italian Navy, who had been detailed to receive us. During our stay in Italy we were the guests of the Government, and every courtesy and consideration was shown us. In Rome we paid our respects to Vice Admiral del Bono, minister of marine; Baron Sonnino, minister of foreign affairs; and Prime Minister Orlando. The premier made a most eloquent speech of welcome, in which he said:

The help of the United States in men, money, and material is titanic, and Italy appreciates all that, but greater than the material benefit has been the effect upon the morale of the army and people of Italy. You came into the war with no selfish purpose. Your country was not invaded or in danger of invasion. You entered the conflict for the humanity of all nations. Your Bill of Rights, enunciated before the French revolution, was not alone for the United States but for all the world, and it was toward this point that the allies were striving and you are now fighting in order that all humanity might enjoy those blessings.

We enjoyed meeting Col. Perkins and his staff at the headquarters of the American Red Cross, and I can not praise too highly the work of this unit. We also visited Senator Marconi, the inventor of the wireless, at his residence near the home of Col. Perkins. From Rome we proceeded to Padua, and thence on to Venice, where we were met by the commanding officer, Vice Admiral Marzolo, who gave us the opportunity of inspecting the naval activities being conducted from this base. Poor Venice was a hollow mockery of its former brightness. Deserted canals, empty plazas, barricaded houses, and closed shops were mute reminders that this bride of the sea was within the war zone. Three-fourths of the population had evacuated the city. All the churches and public buildings were protected by sandbags, and the art galleries had been stripped of their treasures, for air raids were of frequent occurrence. I think over 2,000 bombs had been dropped on the city, but fortunately most of them had fallen into the canals and public squares.

We visited the navy yard, which has been in existence since the days of the Venetian Republic. We were much interested in a tank boat which had done wonderful work, and now that the war is over I am at liberty to describe it. It was made of wood, had a flat bottom, and was about 30 feet long, and strongly resembled its land cousin. Two endless belts on which long spikes were fastened, passed completely around the craft from stem to stern. These belts, one on each side, were driven by a small motor, and the vessel itself was propelled by a screw, giving the boat a speed of about 5 knots. As all harbors were protected by chain barriers, this boat was designed to force its way over the obstacles. Coming in contact with a chain or net, the spikes on the two belts engaged the obstruction and literally pulled the vessel over the top.

Being armed with two torpedoes it was a very formidable craft, as the Austrians learned when Conte Pellegrini a year ago entered the harbor of Pola and sank a superdreadnaught of the type of the Viribus Unitis. I want to speak of Rizzo's brilliant exploit when, in December, 1917, in a 55-foot motor boat he entered the harbor of Pola, blew up the Austrian battleship Vienna and escaped. Last June this daring naval officer participated in a still more spectacular achievement. In his motor boat, accompanied by another vessel no larger than his own, he had crossed to the Dalmatian coast to inspect mine fields. As he was returning, he saw smoke on the horizon and presently several Austrian battleships hove in sight, screened by 10 destroyers. Hiding behind an island, he waited until the fleet came abeam and then darted out. Taken completely by surprise, the destroyers, thinking no doubt that he was an Austrian, allowed him to approach. He passed through their lines, fired a torpedo and, turning to escape, unfortunately was captured; but the dreadnaught St. Stephen went to the bottom as the result of his daring.

I want also to speak of the bravery of a young Italian aviator, who, during an Austrian raid, made a counterattack. He figured that there would be no one but the mechanicians left at the station, so he flew over and destroyed it, making his escape before the raiding aviators returned. They told me of a squad of Italian cavalry which had captured an Austrian aviation post during the absence of the airmen. The Italians, after taking the mechanics prisoners, hid themselves and their horses in the hangars. When the aviators returned the cavalrymen made them all captives, destroyed their machines, and escaped before an alarm was given.

Returning to Padua from Venice, we were dinner guests of the King, who entertained us with simple, democratic hospitality. The following morning we had the opportunity of witnessing a review of about 20,000 soldiers composing a part of the army of Arditi, the famous shock troops of Italy. These troops made a most favorable impression upon us, and their equipment, intended for mountain work, was complete in every detail. On the narrow, slippery trails donkeys and mules are used and the artillery and heavy pieces are so constructed that they can be packed in parts and carried on the backs of these animals. The King, after inspecting the regiments, bestowed medals for distinguished service; the first, a gold medal of honor, was presented to a young veteran who, with five comrades, scaled an Alpine peak to a cave in the snow where 80 Austrians had established an artillery position. It took them four hours to ascend the 4,000 feet, but they succeeded in bombing the Austrians, killing or taking prisoner the entire number. We had the pleasure of meeting Gen. Diaz, the commander in chief of the Italian Armies, a man of great ability and judgment.

At Bassino we saw shells being hurled by the Italian artillery into Austrian-held territory, the thunder of the explosions echoing and reechoing in the mountain passes. After lunching with the officers of the Sixth Italian Army we were taken to Gina di Fonte, high up in the mountain peaks. The road on which we ascended was a marvel of engineering skill. For 10 miles it wound up the steep slopes, crossing the deep ravines on stone bridges, and with an easy grade traced its sinuous course back and forth on the breasts of the jagged crags.

We passed a number of great kite balloons from which Italian observers were watching the Austrian lines. To expedite the transportation of materials and relieve congestion on the road, the Italian engineers had constructed a cable conveyor running from the base of the mountain straight to the summit, on which was carried in suspended cages, ammunition and supplies. Arriving at the crest we were escorted by Gen. Cavan, commanding the British sector, to the trenches from which we witnessed the bombardment of Asiago, an Italian city held by the Austrians. We could hear the shells screaming toward the doomed city; then would come the upheaval of bricks and dirt, followed by the dull roar of the exploding missiles. The Austrians from their lines answered with shrapnel and high explosives, the spurts of flame from the bursting projectiles and the echoes of the blasts among the valleys and precipices forming a vivid picture of mountain fighting.

On our return to Paris we again stopped at Turin and inspected the great Fiat factory, where 40,000 persons were employed in manufacturing motors of various kinds. I can not leave this very casual account of our visit to Italy without expressing the deep appreciation of every member of our party for all the courtesies extended us. The record of the Italian Army and Navy in this war has been one of brilliant achievement. Fighting against overwhelming odds, beset with difficulties well-nigh insurmountable, the brave people of our southern ally have made heroic sacrifices, meeting every call of liberty and of honor with the courage inherited from a glorious past. With 14 per cent of her population under arms, with supplies of food and fuel and all the necessities, both of life and war, always critical, Italy never faltered in her determination and her high resolve.

From Paris we proceeded to Bordeaux, where we were joined by Capt. Cone, United States Navy, in charge of naval aviation, one of the most efficient officers in the service, upon whom too much credit can not be bestowed for his able administration of this department. We reached Bordeaux, and, after inspecting the docks and warehouses, started in autos for a tour of inspection of the naval air stations along the coast. With the war a thing of the past, it is useless to go into details concerning conditions. Let me say, however, that the delays and confusion in our aircraft production, so manifest in the Army, was reflected in the stations we visited.

Our party visited Moutchic, Paulliac, Rochefort, La Rochelle, La Pallice, Fromentine, Palmboeuf, St. Nazaire, Montoir, Le Croisic, L'Orient, Ile Tudy, and Brest, and at all of these stations we found splendid bodies of men, much enthusiasm, and many parts of machines but few "ready for service" planes. Let me be most emphatic in stating that neither Capt. Cone nor his corps of assistants were in any way at fault for the lack of equipment. They had done all in their power, but were not responsible for shipments which brought parts of machines to one port and other parts to another. Neither were they to blame for cargoes shipped without bills of lading, which necessitated the opening of all boxes to ascertain their contents. We were told of one shipload of supplies which, being opened and unpacked, consisted of jars of jam, kegs of spikes, steel rails, and ammunition, all jumbled together.

At Pauillac we lunched with over 3,000 of the enlisted personnel, the mess hall being presided over by Capt. Evans, son of "Fighting Bob." This station is a clearing point and headquarters for supplies and repair work. Commander Briscoe, of New York, was in charge of the shops, and his great executive ability was in evidence on every hand. At St. Nazaire, one of the principal ports of entry for American material, we saw three of the Navy 14-inch railroad guns being made ready for shipment to the front. This railway battery was completely independent of any permanent artillery base. With 12 specially constructed cars, the complement for each gun, the equipment was so mobile that the battery could move position—gun, personnel, kitchen, fuel, ammunition, wireless, and machine-shop cars—in less than an hour. These guns fire heavier projectiles and have greater range than any ever before placed on mobile shore mounting, being capable of hurling shells a distance of approximately 30 miles. Admiral Plunkett, who was in command of these guns on the front, reported that—

> The shell craters were remarkable for their uniform size and great extent. One shot was sufficient to completely wreck a railroad line of three tracks for a distance of at least 100 feet, tearing up the rails, shattering the ties, and blowing an enormous crater in the roadbed. Traffic was stopped completely, not only during the firing, but from 6 to 10 hours each day after the firing had ceased.

There are immense docks, sheds, and railroad yards at this point, all constructed since our entrance into the war. Many German prisoners, a sorrowful looking lot, were employed in road building and construction work around the city. At Quimper we visited a Belgian refugee camp, just outside the town. These poor unfortunates were housed in great barracks, and it was a pitiful sight to see these homeless wanderers, many of them entirely alone in the world, and all destitute. Arriving at Brest, we were cordially received by Admiral Wilson, one of our most distinguished officers, who was in command of operations on the French coast. This old city of Brest has been awakened from its slumbers by the coming of the Americans. Until our entry into the conflict it was used exclusively as a naval arsenal, but we have made it the chief port for the disembarkation of our troops, as many as 40,000 having landed in a single day. To provide for their temporary stay before moving to the front, it was necessary to construct great barracks and complete water and sewerage plants, but unfortunately the camp was badly located.

Our party separated here, all but three sailing for home, leaving Congressmen WILSON, OLIVER, and myself who had decided to return to the front. And now I want to take you with me to the battle lines, to the active front, where our boys were making history. Having secured a guide, passes, and a car, which we loaded with rations and blankets, we started from Paris for Meaux, and then on to Fere en Tardenois.

As we approached the war zone, the scenes of desolation became more and more dreadful. We were right in the track of the German retreat, and on every side were piles of loaded shells, stacked up like cordwood, and every sort of army equipment which the Germans did not have time to remove. You know the Americans were after the boche, and as speed was better than valor, the enemy left everything in their flight. We passed through village after village, all completely destroyed and deserted. Occasionally some lone Frenchman would be seen, wandering among the ruins of his home, trying to find a piece of furniture or some utensil with which he could start life anew. In most places there was not a single thing of value left, all had been burned or demolished by the retreating Germans. Along the road and scattered in the fields were helmets and rifles and chunks of ragged steel. Smashed airplanes, broken gun carriages, dismantled warehouses, torn-up railroad tracks, all told the story of the conflict, while here and there, now alone, then in groups, were the fresh mounds of dirt, marked with a cross or the twisted barrel of a rifle—mute reminders of the bloody struggle of but a few weeks before. Many of the fields were so lacerated by artillery fire that it will take many weary months before they can be brought back into cultivation, and it will be years before the barns can be made ready for the crops.

Near Fere en Tardenois we saw the ruins of a great wagon factory which the Germans had used to repair their trucks and gun carriages. The shops had been burned with all the valuable machinery, but there must have been at least 5,000 wheels stacked in a field nearby.

Passing through Fere en Tardenois, the headquarters of a French Division, we soon came to the headquarters of Gen. Alexander, commanding the Seventy-seventh Division, composed of New York troops. He and his staff had their quarters in a superb old edifice, Chateau de le Fere—at least it had been a stately mansion before war swept over it. It was located in a little clearing on the edge of a wood, and to deceive enemy aviators, approach to the building by motor was strictly forbidden. To carry out the deception that no one was quartered inside, no attempt had been made to repair the shell-riddled roof, and every storm sent its deluge of water spattering down through each room. This old chateau had been built in the thirteenth century, and before war had marred its beauty must have been one of the show places of the region, for spacious courts, artistic gardens, rows of statuary, and a magnificient stone bridge spanning a narrow defile gave proof of its former splendor. Inside, there was the strangest conglomeration imaginable. Superb mirrors set in exquisitively carved frames, encrusted with gold leaf, were hanging over an old packing case on which an Army clerk had placed his typewriter. Seated in a stately chair, rich with brocade facings, he pounded out the day's orders, unconscious of the incongruity of his surroundings. When the Germans, who also used this chateau for headquarters, evacuated the place they left leaning against the wall in the hall an innocent-looking stepladder. Suspicious of some trick, the American engineers examined the ladder, finding not unexpectedly that a wire attached to the lower rung lead to a heavy charge of TNT in the cellar, and had the ladder been removed before disconnecting the wire the entire building would have been demolished and everyone in the vicinity killed.

Gen. Alexander very kindly detailed an aide to conduct us to the active front; and equipped with helmets and gas masks we started out. Passing along heavily camouflaged roads on which companies of our boys were marching back to rest positions, we came to the headquarters of Gen. Johnston, and from there went forward toward the lines. As we were skirting the edge of a small woods, a terrific explosion took place just ahead of our car, the flame bursting in our faces like a blast from a furnace. Our first thought was of a German shell, as an incessant bombardment was going on at the time. With the explosion came yells from the woods, "Get that car out of sight," an invitation we accepted without the formality of transmitting it in writing. We found we had unknowingly passed directly in front of one of our own batteries, which had just received orders to "open up." Our New York boys, several of whom I knew, were in charge, and we spent an hour with them watching the operation of the guns. An observer in the top of a tree far out, was noting the effect of the shells and telephoning back to the commanding officer, giving instructions about ranges, and so forth. The crews worked the guns with great rapidity and with clock-like precision, loading, firing, and withdrawing the empty powder cases. After each discharge the guns were trued up, elevated, depressed, or swung to the right or left, according to the directions received from the observer. First they would fire in order at regular intervals, then a salvo by the entire battery would burst forth, the blast of each gun merging into one mighty roar, which shook the ground.

The men had either erected crude shelters of sticks and stones or had dug themselves pits, which they covered with their raincoats. The few cleared spaces in the woods were carefully guarded, no one being allowed to stand in them for fear of attracting the attention of enemy air machines. On our way back to headquarters we stopped in a little clump of trees where the Knights of Columbus had established a coffee wagon, and it was good coffee with real sugar and good crackers. I know, because I sampled it. They told us that one day they had served as many as 1,700 soldiers on their way back from the trenches. Here they were, right up on the line, in range of the German guns. That night, after dining with Gen. Alexander, we bunked with the boys out in the timber. We had to pass from the chateau along the edge of a ravine. It was pitch dark and no lights, of course, could be used. Men rolled up in their blankets were sleeping in every conceivable place, and many a lad was awakened by our stepping upon him in the darkness. We stumbled over trees and rocks as we tried to find our own blankets, which we had unpacked before going to supper. At one place the stench of a German corpse almost overcame us. The lieutenant who was helping us, occasionally used his pocket flash light, but instantly there came the stern command from a sentry, "Put out that light!" At last we found our belongings and without undressing, rolled our blankets about us and lay down on the ground for our rest. All night long there was a continuous booming on the line only a few miles away, and every little while we would hear a sentry challenge some motor truck or a company of soldiers moving forward.

Next morning Gen. Alexander invited us to accompany him to the front on a tour of inspection. Leaving our car just beyond the woods where yesterday we had seen the battery at work, we began our tramp forward, passing men on their way back from the trenches. Gen. Alexander, a soldier of exceptional ability and with large military experience, had just taken command of this division, and frequently he would stop and inquire of the men the condition of their food and clothing. He asked one young chap, an Irishman, if he knew who he was. The lad said "No," and when the general told him the boy answered in a rich Irish brogue, "Begorah, Gineral, but I am glad to maat you." We were hardly able to repress a smile at the hearty good will of the soldier. Another, when the general said, "An American can always whip a boche," replied, "Yes, you are d—— right, General, and we will give them some more h——."

Whenever we came to an open space we separated, each man walking alone, for groups are dangerous targets. Shells began to burst around us; one, falling scarcely a hundred yards away, sent a fragment which struck in the road just behind Congressman WILSON. We saw a squad of the 302nd Engineers constructing some trusses for a bridge to be thrown across the Vesle River. I just missed meeting my friend and neighbor, Capt. Fred S. Greene, whose men were working on the bridge. This officer has made a gallant record, and I regretted not seeing him. We climbed up a steep, heavily wooded hill, near the crest of which was a large cave. Here an advanced rest and hospital station had been established. We passed on through the thick underbrush with shells from our own batteries as well as from the German screaming overhead. At one point, as we were descending into a little valley we encountered mustard gas, which caused us to beat a hasty retreat. But before we could adjust our gas masks Gen. Alexander, who was in the lead, had inhaled sufficient to cause him great annoyance. Finally we reached the far edge of the ridge, the fringe of "no man's land," overlooking the German lines.

Out in a clearing was an observation station connected with the woods by a communicating trench, through which we crawled. This was a place where it was wise to remember the slogan, "Keep your spirit up and your head down." From our vantage point we looked across the Vesle River into the town of Bazoches, which our artillery was then bombarding. Shell after shell exploded as we watched, each one adding its havoc to the doomed city. While we were at this point the artillery duel increased and the General thought it wise to return. During the entire time we were at the front his staff were nervous for fear a chance shot might find its target, but luckily none did, although on our way back shells fell close to us. We saw a few poor fellows being carried back on stretchers, two of whom had been badly gassed. Every few yards on the side of the road, little dugouts had been excavated, convenient shelter places in case a barrage was laid down.

Returning to our cars which we had left secreted in a thick tangle of woods we met many of our boys, some cooking, others washing or cleaning their equipment; all happy, but all kicking about the postal service. Whenever I came across any of the lads I told them if they would give me the name and address of some relative, upon reaching home I would write a letter saying that I had met them. I think I collected nearly 500 names, written on backs of envelopes, on pieces of newspapers, and labels from tin cans. I fulfilled my promise, and I can truly say that the responses received from grateful mothers all over the State in acknowledgement of my notes far more than compensated me for the trouble.

We lunched with Gen. Johnston and his staff in an old farmhouse. A huge bomb-proof shelter which had just been completed, was shown us by Maj. Martin and Lieut. Morgan, who were rendering valuable service. Both of these gentlemen were from Westbury. We had a good lunch, but at times it was a question who would come out first—ourselves or the flies. The mess hall was in an old stable, and I suppose the flies considered us intruders. Anyway they put up a stiff fight and it was about a 50–50 proposition.

After lunch we went to the headquarters of Gen. Bullard, commanding the Twenty-eighth Division, and had a pleasant chat with this veteran, whose famous reply to French instructions a few weeks previously, will long be remembered:

> We regret being unable on this occasion to follow the counsels of our masters, the French, but the American flag has been forced to retire. This is unendurable, and none of our soldiers would understand their not being asked to do whatever is necessary to reestablish a situation which is humiliating to us and unacceptable to our country's honor. We are going to counter-attack.

Then on to Sergy, where the Wisconsin and Michigan troops did such splendid fighting. Four times on that hot July day this town changed hands; it was here that a German colonel and 500 of his men were captured. We passed by Cierges, another desperately contested town. Ruins everywhere, with the accustomed sight of discarded weapons and broken implements. Near by we came across a body of negroes digging a huge pit for the burial of American dead. Thirty-seven of our poor boys had been gathered for interment. There they lay just as they had fallen, legless, armless; yes, and headless. It was the most gruesome sight I have ever seen, and it haunts me still. Some mother's son lies here in a nameless grave; some lover who will never return; some father, perhaps, whose child will weep for the dear face it will never see again.

Leaving these heroes to sleep in the peace of the ages, we went to the grave of another hero—Quentin Roosevelt. Each of us had gathered some flowers by the wayside, which we placed on the grave in loving tribute to the memory of a gallant officer. A cross had been erected on which is inscribed his name and the date of his death. Several floral tributes from officers of the French Army told of the esteem in which Lieut. Roosevelt was held by his comrades in arms. Close to the grave is a small stone slab, placed by the Three hundred and second Engineers on the spot where the young aviator fell.

On our way back to the chateau we visited a pigeon cote and saw how these important message carriers are cared for. In speaking of the pigeons, let me tell the story of a gift of these birds made by the British to some Portuguese officers. Not fully realizing the purport of the present, the officers, in acknowledging the gift, sent back this note, "The squabs were delicious. We had them for dinner. Please send some more."

A little farther along the road we saw one of our heavy batteries, the famous 155. The gun was mounted just back of a low hill and was covered with a screen of boughs to conceal its location. In approaching the battery from the road, great care was taken to prevent the formation of any distinct path, which, to an aerial observer, would be a sure sign that artillery was located at its terminus.

That night while at dinner, a carrier pigeon brought word that the great chateau in Bazoches, which we had seen being shelled, had been destroyed. Col. Insinger, one of our hosts at headquarters, related two incidents that had come under his personal observation, both showing the kind of stuff our boys are made of. He said that one night out in "no man's land" he had stumbled over a man crawling through the grass. "Stand up," he commanded. "Can't do it," replied the soldier, "I am wounded." "Well," said the colonel, "if you are wounded, you should go the other way." "Yes; I know," said the boy, "but I know, too, that right over there is a German machine-gun nest, and I am going after it." That boy gave the last drop of his blood, wounded as he was, fighting the enemies of his country. The other case was of a young soldier from my own State who was charging the enemy with his revolver. "Put up that pistol," commanded the colonel; "it isn't heavy enough for this work; use your rifle." "I can't do it," he replied, "I am wounded." The officer looked and found that a machine-gun bullet had ripped open the boy's stomach, and with his left hand he was holding in his intestines, while he was running forward, firing with his right hand. Ah, but that was courage and grit!

A young fellow I met who had recently come from the hospital, told me how he had saved a friend in the fight at Cantigny. Our attack, sweeping down from a hill and across the valley, had carried the town. The objective had been reached, and this boy was safe behind a stone wall, when he looked back and saw, out in the open, his chum who had been hit. Obtaining his captain's permission to return for his friend, he started. Shells and bullets were falling like hail, but he reached the wounded man in safety, and putting his arm about him, commenced dragging him to shelter. Going but a few yards, he too, was wounded. Then, as best they could, they crawled back, only to find that the lines had gone on. Exhausted, they crouched down behind a pile of bricks and lay in a broiling sun, without water or attention, from 9 in the morning until 5 in the afternoon. For that act of unselfish devotion and heroism the boy received distinguished recognition.

Do you wonder now why it was that Bulgaria gave up? Do you wonder why it was that Austria cried "Kamerad"? Do you wonder why it was that the Imperial German Army stopped, then crumbled, and then ran for home, and have been running ever since? Do you wonder now why it was that the German Government, when they pleaded for peace, found themselves in pieces? Do you wonder now why it was that a great Navy hauled down its flag without striking a blow? Do you wonder now why it was that the Kaiser deserted his people and fled to Holland in a vain effort to escape the judgment of humanity?

This experience with the boys—eating with them, sleeping with them, and listening to their stories—was one of the most interesting of my whole trip. A sterling lot of young fellows they were, and fearless fighters, as the Germans learned to their sorrow. New York can well be proud of her men in the service.

In a little wooded valley just below the ridge on which we bunked, was the quartermaster depot. Day and night trucks and wagons passed back and forth. On the edge of the road leading to the stables was a pile of loaded German shells abandoned by the retreating army. Strict orders had been issued not to touch these shells, and yet the drivers of the trucks were so indifferent to danger that they paid no attention to the warning. I saw at least three heavy steel-tired wagons run directly over them. When I asked the driver why he took such chances he said, "Oh, what's the difference; if I am going to get killed I better be smashed up near home than out on the road." Most of these fellows were fatalists. They thought that some particular bullet had their name written upon it, and until that came they were as safe one place as another. That reminds me of old Mike Sullivan, a veteran with whom I toured Long Island last spring in the liberty-loan drive. Mike was a fatalist. An American, born in Ireland of Scotch parents, he enlisted in a Canadian regiment and had fought in France. That was a combination to defy almost anything. He constantly preached the doctrine of fatalism, telling his comrades that it was no use to worry, "that when your time's come it's come, and there's nothing you can do to stop fate." Well, one night Mike was ordered to go over the top, and his chums noticed him very quietly putting an extra pistol or two in his pocket. They jeered, and reminded him that he was a fatalist and that all those pistols would be of no use, for "if your time's come it's come." Poor Mike was stuck for a moment, and then the Scotch-Irish-American-Canadian-French wit came to his rescue, and he said, "Well, that may be so, but I may meet a German whose time has also come."

One night a shell struck on the road directly in front of a motor truck. The driver had no time to stop or turn. Everyone held his breath waiting for the blast which would send them "west," but the shell was a "dud" and did not explode.

With a great jolt, over it they went, and the only comment of the 19-year-old driver was, "If those Germans don't stop dropping their d—— shells in this road, we'll bust a spring."

I wish I could recall all the things those boys told me. While I can not remember all their stories, I can never forget their kindness, their courtesy, and their generosity in presenting me with souvenirs. The Nation will never forget their bravery.

I want to tell you of one very clever sign I saw up on the front, posted to a tree. It read:

The Quick or the Dead.

Gas is a good thing to cook by, but it is a poor thing to croak by. Put on that mask. Be quick or be dead. Don't take a chance. If you do you will never take another.

That night it looked like rain, and one young fellow who was going out on sentry duty insisted that I sleep in his pup tent. Underneath he had scooped out a shallow pit which had been filled with straw, and so, taking my gas mask and my helmet, two things which I never allowed to leave my sight, I crawled in, receiving a royal welcome from about a million cooties. It was a clear, starlit night and not a breath stirred the trees. All was silent in the woods and beyond, except for the ceaseless roar of the guns on the line and the challenge of the sentries on the road below. I had just fallen asleep, when suddenly I was awakened by a terrific explosion, which made the ground tremble, and then came another. We were being raided by German airplanes. Overhead I heard that peculiar rythm of first one machine and then another, and still yet another. We could not see them, but we knew they were there with bombs and that it was the open season for Americans. Presently our antiaircraft guns opened fire, the blast of the charges followed by the explosion of the shells in the air, with each burst of flame lighting up the tree tops. Then fragments of the projectiles came rattling to the ground. Every little while the boche dropped a bomb, which increased by tenfold the roar of the missils. The sensation of lying there, with no protection but a piece of canvas and a few overhanging boughs, was one I shall never forget. There was something uncanny and terrorizing about it, different from anything I had ever experienced. We had no place to go, so we lay in our blankets, hoping that none of the bombs had our names written upon them. In about half an hour the circling machines swung off toward their own lines and all became normal again. One of those bombs struck a house a short distance from our camp, killing its lone occupant, but the others had fallen without harm. Our boys were so sure that the war would soon be over that they had adopted the slogan, "Heaven, H——, or Hoboken by Christmas." I little thought then that their prediction would soon be realized—the Hoboken part.

Just as we were leaving camp the next morning our car went out of commission and we had to abandon it and with it the rifles, helmets, and bayonets the boys had pressed upon us. Hoping that we might have our machine repaired at the divisional motor transportation repair shop, one of the trucks towed us down to the woods, where the shop was located. It was hidden in a little clump of trees on the bank of the Ourcq River, with Capt. Maloney in command. Lathes, forges, benches, and all the equipment of a complete shop were installed on motor trucks, so that the camp could follow the Army. This was the motor repair unit for the entire division, and everything from a damaged bicycle to a great artillery truck found its way to this mechanical hospital.

These mechanicians—and only expert ones were wanted—deserve unstinted praise for what they did. Constantly on the move and always liable to air raids, working 10 to 14 hours a day and seven days a week, their share in the complete triumph of our arms can not be overestimated. But as our car could not be repaired that day, we accepted the invitation of the general and journeyed back to Paris in his machine, again passing through Chateau-Thierry, Vaux, and Meaux. In our first visit to these towns we had seen only American soldiers. Now the Americans were gathering in front of St. Mihiel and the French had taken their place.

Our day in Paris before starting again for the front, was spent making arrangements and in visiting the plant of Andre Citroen, where 50,000 3-inch shells were turned out every 24 hours. 9,000 women and 3,000 men were employed in this great factory, which had been built since the beginning of the war. Two hundred and fifty tons of steel were consumed daily. The plant is equipped with every modern convenience for the welfare and happiness of the employees. Restaurants, reading and billiard rooms, baths, gymnasium, and a complete hospital manned by nurses and doctors make this factory one of the most modern in the world. In their thought for the women workers they have built a baby hospital, where mothers can leave their little ones in the care of experienced nurses. During the week the babies remain here night and day and are fed by the bottle between the mother's visits. On Saturdays the parents take the infants home, and the nurses said they could always tell these visits by the babies losing their regular habits. Five times a day the mothers left the lathe, the forge, and the sweat of the shops to nurse their offspring, and then after this ray of domestic happiness, they returned to make shells and still more shells for their husbands fighting for these babies and the homes of France on the far-flung battle line.

We experienced much trouble and delay in procuring military passes for our trip to Dunkirk, but at last we received the "clear" signal. Capt. Cone, who was very desirous of having us inspect the northern bombing stations and the naval activities at Dunkirk, very kindly placed a car at our disposal, detailing Capt. Gilcrist, of the Marines, to act as our guide and interpreter. We stocked our car with rations, blankets, and a large supply of gasoline, for we intended, before returning, to go through the devastated regions around Amiens.

Passing through Beauvais, Poix, Abbeville, Montreuil, Boulogne, and Calais, we reached Dunkirk late in the afternoon. At St. Inglevert, near Calais, we visited the United States naval air station under command of Lieut. Robert Lovett, of Glen Cove, a splendid young officer, who has brought this station to a high point of efficiency. Montreuil, until recently the British headquarters, showed the effects of numerous air raids. At Oye, just on the outskirts of Dunkirk, we inspected a camp of 500 marines attached to the northern bombing station.

We were received at Dunkirk by Ensign Robert E. Reed, temporarily in command of the airplane base. The importance of Dunkirk, and its proximity to Ostend, has made it the objective of almost nightly raids, but we missed a visit, although the weather conditions were perfect for it. They were also subject to long-range artillery fire from Dixmude, but had devised a clever scheme for protection. A watcher, seeing the flash from the gun, sounded a warning, and, as it took the projectile a minute and a half to reach the town, the inhabitants had that much time in which to seek shelter in cellars and dugouts. They told us that all speed limits had long since been abolished.

Next morning we were afforded an exhibition of fancy flying, a practice I heartily disapprove, because of the risks assumed merely for the amusement of the spectators, and we barely missed witnessing a fatal accident. One man, caught with a bad engine, after turning over seven times and coming within 150 feet of the ground, recovered just in time to glide out in safety. We expected to see him dashed to death, and in talking with him afterwards found that he, too, had thought his time had come. He seemed entirely indifferent to the danger he had been in, and dismissed the subject by saying, "Oh, well, that kind of a death isn't so messy as to be hit by a shell."

While the aero acrobatics were taking place, word came that a German submarine had been sighted off the coast. Instantly flash signals gave the warning to the pilots, who returned to go in pursuit. The sea planes were run out and swung overboard, the pilots took their places, and the big machines whirled off to sea. There is great rivalry between our station and the one across the harbor operated by the French. In this instance our boys were well on their way before their rivals started. Their trip, however, was for naught, as no raiders were discovered.

We then started for Belgium, passing first through the bombed town of Bergues and thence to Woostcappel, where the Belgian officials refused to let us pass. We made a detour and came to Houtkergue, in charge of the British, but, fearing that our civilian attire might again be our undoing, we put on our helmets, hung our masks around our necks, and buttoned up our Army raincoats. It worked, and we passed the frontier. We went through Poperinghe, a silent, desolate town, the scene of bitter fighting in the early stages of the war, and then on to Ypres or, as the British Tommy calls it, "Wipers." We saw many Americans along the road, and, of course, many British and French soldiers. We were near Mount Kimmel, the scene of such fearful fighting, participated in by our own boys, and the roar of artillery and the crack of rifles came to us as we entered Ypres—sad, ill-fated, war-torn Ypres. No voice can describe the awfulness of that destruction, no pen depict the horror of the tragedy which swept this once beautiful city into an inferno of death and desolation. The earthly splendor of Ypres has gone forever, but the blackened ruins by their very frightfulness tell of the glory of those heroes who kept the faith and by their lives answered the challenge of military despotism.

Ypres no longer exists—only mounds of brick and cement, gaping holes, and stumps of walls. All semblance of a city has disappeared. We tramped over the ruins of this city of memories with the guns crashing on the near-by line. No shells had fallen that morning, and we felt free to walk at will. We had noticed an enemy plane cross one section of the city, but paid no attention to it. Suddenly a high-explosive shell fell within 50 yards of us and then another, and with each explosion we threw ourselves on the ground to escape the flying fragments. Within less than 10 minutes, five projectiles had been hurled into the sector where we were standing. One fragment, which I afterwards secured, passed between our driver and myself, striking within a few feet of us.

It did not take us long to evacuate that place, for evidently we had been observed, and as long as we remained we knew the Germans would continue firing.

On our way back to Dunkirk we passed through Elverdingue, Furnes, Oust, Coxyde, and La Panne, all, with the exception of the last, utterly destroyed—ghostly, tomblike cities, with the region between seared and torn; village after village, farmhouse after farmhouse in hopeless ruin.

Kindle the ashes of Belgium
Into unquenchable flame,
Dawning the light of to-morrow,
Open the portals of fame;
Passeth a world-wide sorrow,
Passeth a nation's tears,
But freedom deathless surviveth
Through the uncounted years.
—Capt. Horne in Harpers Magazine.

Mounted in the sand dunes at Saskatoon was a British siege-gun battery of two 7.6-inch guns. These guns, with a range of 18,000 yards, constantly bombed Ostend and Zeebrugge, and were shelled in return, one projectile having struck just below the battery. "Dud" shells "made in Germany" lay thick on the sands, and many more had been buried by the winds. From the highest sand dunes we plainly saw Dixmude and Nieuport and in the distance the great tower at Ostend.

The boundary of the war zone is distinctly traced, and the change in passing the line of devastation is striking. There seems to be no twilight area; the transition from high cultivation and peaceful prosperity to desolation and waste is marked and complete.

The next morning we started for Amiens, and on our way to St. Omer passed many British troops—artillery companies and supply trains. Without exception the horses in the British transport and artillery service were in the prime of condition, well fed and well groomed, and their equipment always clean and bright. It was the same with their wagons and trucks, all displaying that degree of "upkeep" so essential and yet so often neglected.

At St. Omer we visited a casualty clearing hospital in charge of Lieut Col. Storrs, who took us into the operating rooms, where men direct from the front dressing stations were being operated upon. He told us of an American patient who had fallen off a truck on a dark night. The boy had evidently been stunned by his fall. Ten days later he was found behind a fence, where, without food or water, he had lain all that time, and when discovered was almost a skeleton. The colonel related an instance of five men who had been wounded in "no man's land" at a time the lines were engaged in constant attacks. For two weeks these men were exposed, their only food and water being obtained from the rations and canteens of their dead comrades. For five days they had been without either food or drink, and under the terrible ordeal three perished, but the other two were rescued, finally recovering.

At Amiens, the objective of one of the German drives, we found an abandoned city. Only ten months before I had visited this famous cathedral town, which at that time, although close to the war zone, had been but slightly damaged. What a change those few months had made, and what havoc had been wrought by German guns in those savage attacks to capture this great railroad center. The imperial army came within a few miles of their goal and were only prevented from entering by the bulldog tenacity of the British soldiers.

At Grivesnes, a shell-torn hamlet—and there are many of them in this valley of the Somme—we saw numbers of Italian soldiers, the first we had seen. On the roads, German prisoners and Chinamen were at work, for the French religiously keep their highways in perfect condition, a lesson we can emulate to advantage. Just beyond Grivesnes we discovered a little cemetery surrounded by line after line of trenches. It was located in an open field, a few yards from the road, and presented a sight almost too gruesome to relate.

The little chapel had literally been annihilated, and all about were the sacred furnishings that once graced its interior. The tombs had been broken open by the exploding shells, and skeletons and skulls were mixed with the wreckage of marble slabs. In a space no larger than this hall we counted 10 dead Germans rotting in the grass. One young chap, evidently an officer, lay as he had fallen, with arms still stretched over his head. A gaping hole in the forehead told the story of his last agony. I picked up one helmet with the mangled head of its owner still incased. What had become of the body is a mystery, for only the head was lying there. Of course, we examined the bodies to see if any documents of military value could be found. There were none; but let me tell you of a diary which one of our officers did take from a German before Chateau-Thierry. These were the entries:

July 12. Things are going fine. We will soon be in Paris.
July 13. The fighting is becoming furious.
July 14. We have called for our reserves, and are fighting like hell.
July 15. Mein Gott! How those Americans can fight.

We learned afterwards that in this little cemetery, a German machine-gun nest had been located, and the tower of the chapel had been used as an observation post. The ground around here had been fought over last May and June and was in the same condition in which it had been left, a mass of discarded implements and weapons. Hardly a yard of roadside but was blasted by shell holes and seamed with trenches.

Just before reaching Cantigny we came to a crude graveyard, where 22 Americans lie buried. The French had evidently performed this last act of kindness, for the inscriptions were in that language. Each grave had at its head a cross on which was fastened a metal label bearing the American flag surrounded by a wreath of laurel, beneath which a tin-foil name plate bore the legend: "American—unknown."

We reached Cantigny in the early afternoon. Its sole inhabitant was an old man, caretaker for the telephone wire. He lived in a cellar, for not a house was standing. He was the only one who could say he had a home in this spot, and yet he was not alone that September day, for the priest and two old women were there also, wandering about the ruins seeking a familiar sight. The priest told us of his church, but we could not find it, for it no longer existed, only the iron fence, twisted and broken. A little farther we came upon an old man with a cart loaded with household articles. He said he had come back to start life all over again and was looking for his house. He will look in vain, for nothing but débris and memories are left in Cantigny.

We passed through Montdidier, a grim skeleton with houses still standing but deserted and in ruins. Just as night was falling we entered Maignelay, where the First French army, including several companies of the famous Chausseurs, were quartered. The officers, thinking we were members of some sanitary commission, were not inclined to let us spend the night, but when at last they discovered we were not hunting germs, very graciously detailed a soldier to provide us with such comforts as could be procured. Finding shelter in a vacant house and with the canned goods we had with us, we were able to entertain a number of our hosts. As these cities close to the line are, of course, in total darkness at night we devised a happy plan. Running our machine close to the side of the house we passed the "trouble" lamp of the car through the barred window and started our banquet under an electric light. Unfortunately, through a crack in the blind a gleam of light escaped and soon the sentry ordered us to extinguish the lamp. Our guide and friend then procured candles and by hanging our coats over the window we were able to eat without fear of bringing unwelcome guests upon our friends.

The next morning we started for Soissons, passing en route much open country, a large portion of which showed the effects of heavy artillery fire. In a field near Tricot were 10 destroyed French tanks. Many of the roadside trees had been broken off by shells, the splintered stumps resembling great tropical palms.

At Campiegne, which the Germans nearly captured a few months before, we saw a division of French troops on their way to the front, the hardy veterans marching along in regular formation, infantry, artillery, machine-gun companies, supply trains, kitchen trains, and ambulance corps. These French soldiers presented a slovenly appearance, but they were fighters, as all the world will testify. Just outside the city we met the boys of the Thirty-second Division on their way to camp. They came trooping along, singly and in groups, tired, footsore, and hungry, having had no breakfast, as they had been on the hike since 4 a. m. and it was then 10 o'clock.

Approaching Soissons, we discerned 10 or 12 airplanes over the lines; the puffs of gray smoke about them indicating that anti-aircraft guns had also discovered them. Heavy guns were in action and as shells were falling in the city we picked our way carefully among the ruins. The great cathedral has been completely demolished and the city itself is one mass of débris. We entered several houses, homes where the furniture was still in place, and clothes hanging in the closets. Knowing how cunning the Germans were in hiding bombs and detonating fuses under carpets and attached to doors and chairs, we did little exploring.

On our return to Paris we passed through the Forest of Villers Cotterets, where large numbers of soldiers had been quartered; then to Senlis, where in a few weeks German officers were destined to come and beg for peace.

From Paris we visited one of our air stations, enjoying a flight over the city with Lieut. Newport. The most pathetic as well as the most touching sight of our whole trip was at Suresnes, on the banks of the Seine, just beyond the Bois de Boulogne. A few acres upon the hillside overlooking the great buildings and the boulevards of the capital, had recently been dedicated to the American dead. It is the last resting place of those who rendered the final sacrifice in the hospitals of Paris. Each grave is surmounted by a cross bearing the name of the man below, marked with his regiment and company. With the symbols of their faith are the emblems of their devotion, the flags of America and France entwined in loving memory of the men of one Republic who died in defense of the other. Old men and women were there on their hands and knees shaping the mounds, placing sod, and planting flowers. All was a labor of love and veneration for the men who had come across the seas to defend their homes. These graves have been adopted by French families as their own, and for all the years to come the affection and solicitude of a generous people will preserve these shrines of sacrifice, fresh and sweet as the sacred traditions which cluster about them. The flowers of to-day will wither, the grasses fade under winter frosts, but the hallowed memories will remain forever. In thanking the mayor of the city for the tender care bestowed upon our dead, he replied: "Oh, how little it is that we can do for them, who did so much for us."

At Brest we boarded the great ship Leviathan, but found that owing to the rough weather, which delayed coaling, she would not sail for a day or two. The Mount Vernon, just returned from an encounter with a German submarine, was lying in dry dock with a gaping hole in her side. The ship when torpedoed was a short distance out from Brest, 36 men of the engineer's force losing their lives in the fire and boiling water of the stokehole. And yet with two compartments flooded and with their comrades dead and dying, when volunteers were called for to man the still undamaged furnaces, every man of the crew stepped forward and offered to go below. It was our sad privilege to attend the funeral of these brave seamen. With Admiral Wilson, Assistant Secretary Roosevelt, and all the officers and men of the Mount Vernon, we paid our tribute to these victims of German submarine warfare. Each coffin was draped with the flag "above them or about them," and each covered with flowers and wreaths. The simple but impressive service over, with the band playing a funeral march, the caskets were carried on board our ship for the final voyage to the land for which these men had given their lives.

During the three days we were lying at anchor, 10 great ships bearing soldiers for the front entered the harbor. Finally the time came for us to sail, and with the Great Northern and Northern Pacific on either side, a cordon of destroyers to protect us from submarine attack, we passed out to sea. These destroyers remained with us two nights and one day.

We had on board 400 sick and wounded men and nearly a hundred officers detailed to bring back special units. Let me give a brief description of this great ship, the largest in the world. Under the name of the Vaterland she was placed in commission in the spring of 1914 by the Hamburg-American Line, and was lying at her dock in New York when war was declared. Upon our entry into the conflict the ship, which had remained at her wharf for nearly three years, was seized by the Government and turned over to the Navy Department, by whom she was repaired and manned. Since December, 1917, this ship, renamed the Leviathan, has been in transport service. During the summer of 1918 on each voyage eastward she carried approximately 10,700 men of the Army, which, together with her naval complement of over 2,000, gave her a total carrying capacity of nearly 13,000 men. To feed this number, 7 tons of fresh meat, 22,000 eggs, 7,000 loaves of bread, and 3,000 pies were required daily. There has been an erroneous impression that the men were compelled to sleep in watches, half in the daytime and half at night. This is not correct, for there were bunks sufficient to permit all of the men sleeping at the same time.

To accommodate this vast number, the partitions of the lower decks were removed, the space being devoted to mess halls. On other decks, pipe bunks in tiers were installed. The ship was fitted with every device for its safety—fire apparatus, life boats and rafts, water-tight compartments, wireless systems, and thousands of life preservers. At night no lights were permitted on deck or where there was a possibility they might be seen from without. After nightfall no one was allowed outside the main cabins, and every precaution was taken to prevent this mighty ship becoming the prize of some daring submarine commander. We retired without undressing, being careful to place our life-preservers within easy reach, and in the daytime this gear was a part of our costume. While passing through the war zone no concentration of passengers in any one place was permitted for fear of confusion in case of an attack, but after the shores of France were well astern, moving-picture shows became a nightly occurrence.

Before speaking of the sick and wounded, let me give the dimensions of this giant vessel: Length over all, 964 feet; beam, 100 feet; displacement, full load, 69,000 tons; draft, full load, 41 feet 6 inches; maximum speed, 24 knots; height of smokestacks from the keel, 183 feet.

Installed on the Leviathan was a powerful wireless telephone, but it was not in operation, because the one which corresponded with it was in Hamburg, and its use would have been dangerous to the ship. When the Leviathan, upon the completion of repairs, was sent on a trial run to Cuba, this apparatus was tested. To ascertain the radius of the telephone, instructions were given that every station picking up a certain message was to report it to Washington, thus enabling the department to learn the greatest distance over which a message could be transmitted. The operator, after giving instructions to the receiving stations, gave the code number of the ship for that particular day—we will say, "N 54"—and then he read an article from a newspaper. The receiving operators reported the message verbatim; but in every case, to the surprise of the authorities, there was an interpolation after the code number, each report reading, "N–54. Ha, ha; I know who you are. You are the Leviathan." Then followed the article as transmitted by the ship's operator. On investigation it was found that a German operator had picked up the message. Knowing that outside of the apparatus on the Imperator, which was then in Cuxhaven, the only instrument similar was on the Leviathan, and therefore this message came from her. On his exultation he had, on discovering the Leviathan, interjected his remarks, which the shore operators, not knowing its source, received as part of the message sent from the ship.

During the voyage I spent the entire time talking with the sick and wounded. I wish time permitted me to relate all the interesting stories they told me of their experiences. Desperately wounded, as some of them were, all were cheerful and thankful that they had escaped at all. One of the happiest was a young chap from Jersey City with one foot half gone. On his crutches, he hobbled about the ship, telling of his exploits and entertaining his comrades with songs and ditties.

After a remarkably smooth passage we reached New York in the early morning of September 19.

And now that the fight has been made and won allow me for a moment to revert to the tragic struggle. The world probably never before has witnessed such a dramatic transformation as that which took place between the spring and fall of 1918. In April and May, America and Europe were living upon the hope that the armies of Britain, France, and Italy would hold back the invading Germanic hordes until the United States could concentrate its enormous resources of men and material which would ultimately bring victory. It was a question whether America could come in time to save the situation, and we did not arrive a moment too soon. The people of Germany were as exultant as the people of the allied countries were depressed. While the Kaiser was proclaiming "the greatest hour in German history," and talking of the "shining German sword," his diplomats were preparing to remap the world on the basis of a "dictated peace." Yet within four months, as the result of military achievements unsurpassed in all the history of warfare, the scene was reversed; the foe which bid defiance to all the world in May, came in November, beaten and broken, to sue for peace.

In this greatest war of recorded history the heroism of men never reached a higher plane. The war was won, not by the President or the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy or by any admiral or general; victory was achieved by the American soldiers and the American sailors, privates in the ranks and by the privates at home, the American men and women producing the sinews of war and creating the moral power behind the fighting forces.

It was the individual soldier and sailor, inspired by love of liberty and imbued with the spirit of freedom, acknowledging no superior power, but in the consciousness of his independence standing erect before his Maker and his fellow man, the strongest manhood in the world.

On this eve of a new era in world politics, in an alien land, is the mad war Kaiser. Dissipated are his dreams of world conquest; at his feet, broken, lies the sword with which he was to dictate the peace of Europe. In his nightmare he stands again in the land of ashes and of dead men's bones, beholding his legions which he thought invincible hurled back again and again as they dash against the ramparts of liberty. He looks across the shell-torn ground strewn with his mangled dead, and there beyond those fields on which his armies twice paid the toll of defeat, stands Paris, and behind Paris is Rome, and behind Rome is London, and behind London is Washington. In maddened anguish there comes the vision of what might have been, but 6,000,000 bayonets guarded the way and hurled back their defiance, "You shall not pass."

On this winter's day, somewhere in the valley of the Rhine, somewhere in Alsace-Lorraine, somewhere in northern France, the Stars and Stripes are flying. They are kissed by the golden sunbeams, messengers from on high, in the effulgent light of victory for God, for civilization, and for country. They fly in the triumph of a holy cause, glorified in their rededication to human rights.

When we behold that flag let us remember the words of St. Paul, uttered 2,000 years ago. Facing the angry mob which beset him, he said: "Beware how ye molest me, for I am a citizen of Rome." In that warning he epitomized the power and the determination of the great empire of ancient days whose protecting arm stretched to the ends of the earth. To-day the American flag, the symbol of the unity, the purpose, and the will of a mighty people, proclaims to all the world the admonition, Beware how you molest him who renders me allegiance, for he is a citizen of America.

The answer:

Rest ye in peace, ye Flanders dead.
The fight that ye so bravely led We've taken up. And we will keep True faith with you who lie asleep
With each a cross to mark his bed,
And poppies blooming overhead,
Where once his own life blood ran red.
So let your rest be sweet and deep
In Flanders fields.

Fear not that ye have died for naught.
The torch ye threw to us we caught.
Ten million hands will hold it high,
And freedom's light shall never die!
We've learned the lesson that ye taught
In Flanders fields.

—R. W. Lillard.

Your flaming torch aloft we bear.
With burning heart our oath we swear
To keep the faith, to fight it through,
To crush the foe or sleep with you
In Flanders fields.

Sleep on, ye brave. The shrieking shell,
The quaking earth, the startled yell,
The fury of the battle hell
Shall wake you not, for all is well;
Sleep peacefully, for all is well.

—C. B. Galbreath.

They kept the faith and fought it through.

APPENDIX.

War Casualties of All the Nations.

[By Walter Littlefield, from Current History.]

The following table gives the authentic figures regarding the man power employed and the casualties suffered by the 16 nations which were officially mobilized for the war and took active part in it. There is as yet no record available concerning the casualties suffered by the three new nations which came into being through the war or by little San Marino, which sent a gallant 300 to help Italy beat their common enemy. The rest, however, is upon record.

Mobilized strength and casualty losses of the belligerents.

Mobilized strength and casualty losses of the belligerents—Continued.

CENTRAL POWERS.

Nation.	Mobilized.	Dead.	Wounded.	Prisoners or missing.	Total casualties.
Germany	11,000,000	1,611,104	3,683,143	772,522	6,066,769
Austria-Hungary	6,500,000	800,000	3,200,000	1,211,000	5,211,000
Bulgaria	400,000	101,224	152,399	10,825	264,448
Turkey	1,600,000	300,000	570,000	130,000	1,000,000
Total	19,500,000	2,812,328	7,605,542	2,124,347	12,542,217
Grand total	59,176,864	7,681,806	18,681,257	7,080,580	33,443,643

But this only refers to the soldiers who died or were irreparably maimed. Civilians were even greater sufferers, not only by engines of war but by famine, disease, and massacre. There were those who were killed by direct military causes; those who died from indirect causes.

In the first category we have:

Americans slain on the high seas	692
British subjects slain on the high seas	20,620
English men, women, and children the victims of air raids and bombardment	1,270
Belgians butchered or deprived of life in various ways	30,000
French butchered or deprived of life in various ways	40,000
Neutrals slain by the U-boat	7,500
Total	100,082

In the second category we have: American civilian lives lost by U-boat, mines, etc., include all from the one lost on the British ship Falaba, March 28, 1915, till the four lost on the American steamer Lucia, October 17, 1918. British lives lost in the same way include 6,500 members of the mercantile marine not listed as naval casualties. The 7,500 neutral lives also lost are led by those of Norway's death list of 5,120 seamen. The total of 4,000,000 Armenians, Greeks, Jews, and Syrians massacred by the Turks is the latest official estimate of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief. The number of Armenians massacred has been variously estimated at from one to three million. This is probably an exaggeration. An estimate of 300,000 is based on the following facts, published in the Horizon, of Tiflis, and the Artzakank Parisi (Paris); still the natural increase in population in the unaffected region might tend to increase this total: When the war began there were fewer than 3,000,000 Armenians in all Turkey, Transylvania, and Galicia. In Transcaucasia the Armenian population increased from 1,000,000 to 1,207,000; in Ciscaucasia, from 30,000 to 80,000; in European Turkey, from 400,000 to 500,000; and in Transylvania and Galicia, from 15,000 to 25,000. Supposing that this increase were entirely due to refugees, we have 367,000. Now, for the region affected by massacre: First comes Turkish Armenia, with its predominant Kurd population, where before the war there were 650,000 Armenians and to-day there are 32,000, a decrease of 618,000; northern Persia had 100,000 and to-day has 51,000, a decrease of 49,000; showing a total decrease in two regions of 667,000, and a grand total decrease of 300,000 (667,000 minus 367,000):

Armenians, Syrians, Jews, and Greeks massacred or starved by the Turks	4,000,000
Deaths beyond the normal mortality of influenza and pneumonia induced by the war	4,000,000
Serbian dead through disease or massacre	1,085,441
Total	9,085,441

All this gives a military and civilian mortality directly or indirectly the product of the war of:

Military deaths	7,781,806
Civilian deaths	9,185,523
Total	16,967,329

Estimated cost of European war.

ARMY STRENGTH, SUPPLIES, ETC.

[War Department, office of the Chief of Staff, Statistics Branch.]

1. The total Army strength November 1, 1918, was 3,665,000 as compared with 190,000 April, 1917.

Registrations for the draft totaled 23,709,000. Of these 10,481,000 were, on the first draft age basis, of from 21 to 31 years, and 13,228,000 were on the second basis of from 18 to 45 years.

Slightly over 2,800,000 of the registrants were inducted into military service. In addition, there were approximately 878,000 voluntary enlistments.

2. Total embarkations through November 8 were 2,048,000.

3. Equipment—purchased and shipped:

Clothing, etc. (pieces).	Purchased.	Shipped.
Blankets	18,630,000	2,592,000
Breeches and trousers, wool	16,048,000	4,080,000
Coats, wool	11,852,000	3,353,000
Drawers, winter	32,893,000	9,679,000
Overcoats	7,587,000	1,321,000
Shirts, flannel	21,295,000	4,909,000
Shoes, field and marching	25,948,000	8,439,000
Stockings, wool, light and heavy, pairs	85,996,000	26,501,000
Undershirts, winter	28,000,000	9,248,000

4. Rifles: Through October, 1918, a total of 2,137,000 model 1917 rifles had been accepted from the various plants. There were, in addition, about 1,000,000 other rifles in Army use or stored.

5. Munition production through October, 1918:

a. Small-arms ammunition: Ball cartridges (caliber .31), 2,420,000,000 rounds; ball cartridges (caliber .45), 287,000,000 rounds.

b. Artillery ammunition: Total manufacture of light, medium, heavy, railway, and trench, 63,884,000 rounds.

6. Animal purchases: Horses, 304,095; mules, 146,813.

7. Transportation equipment:

a. Standard and narrow gauge locomotives, 5,044 ordered, 1,589 shipped overseas; standard and narrow gauge cars, 100,160 ordered, 40,976 shipped overseas.

b. Miles of track built in France: The General Engineer Depot ordered by November 1 enough rail to lay 7,500 miles of track, of which one-half had been shipped. This material was for additions to and adaptations of existing French system. In addition, enough rail for about 1,000 miles of narrow-gauge track was shipped for lines in back of the trenches.

c. The Army had in use the following number of trucks and other vehicles: Trucks, 83,000 (plus many trailers); motor cars, 16,000; motorcycles, 27,000; bicycles, 22,000. Of these, 55,000 had been shipped and 12,000 were ready for shipment.

8. Hospitals: When the armistice was signed we had a total of 217 hospitals in use, most of which had been especially erected. Their distribution was as follows: In the United States, 80; in France, 104 base, 31 evacuation, 1 special head surgery; in Siberia, 1. The total capacity of the hospitals in France was 220,204.

THE DEVASTATED REGIONS OF FRANCE.

[Commercial Attaché Pierce C. Williams, Paris, from Commerce Reports.]

A few days after the armistice with Germany was signed I accompanied French Government officials and industrialists on an extended trip over the devastated region. The tide of invasion had receded only a few weeks previously, and, for the first time in four and a half years, it was possible to see what the German occupation had meant in the way of destruction.

We visited Lille and the important spinning and weaving district of which it is the center. The Germans held this part of France from September, 1914, until October, 1918. We spent an entire day inspecting one pile after another of twisted steel and crumbling brick. They were all that remained of some of the most productive coal mines of France. At other times we wandered through the shells of buildings that had been systematically pillaged of their machinery by the Germans during their four years of occupation. The third day, for hour after hour, with scarcely a halt, we sped over roads that crossed the old battle field of the Somme. At frequent intervals we passed by low, grass-grown, moldering heaps of stones. We knew these to be the remains of former prosperous "communes" or villages, because their names could be read in large white letters wherever there was a piece of wall still standing. The armies had been compelled thus to identify the ruined towns in order that their men might not lose their way as they moved back and forth over the abandoned and blackened country. In a large part of the territory we traversed the only signs of human life were the occasional rusting sheet-iron shacks, around which loitered British or French patrols. They had been left behind to tend the lines of communication that rolled away like straight white ribbons toward the French frontier, whither the German forces were retiring.

War has now departed from the land we visited, but it can still be adequately described only by the name the soldiers gave it when it was the prize of battle. It is still "no man's land."

EXTENT TO WHICH AMERICAN COOPERATION WILL BE NEEDED.

As a result of what I saw on that trip, and from what French industrialists engaged in organizing the work of restoration have frequently told me, I have no hesitation in saying that the collaboration of American finance and industry will be called for. But I must qualify this statement slightly by saying that the actual flow of orders to other than producers of raw materials, like copper, zinc, iron and steel, cotton, leather, industrial oils, lumber, etc., may be slower in materializing than the American manufacturer of industrial equipment perhaps expects.

My reasons for making these two assertions will, I hope, be apparent from a reading of what follows.

A glimpse of the devastated region is sufficient to convince one that the united efforts of the industrial world would be required to restore in our day what the Germans destroyed. But in estimating the volume of business that American factories may receive in the near future, it is necessary to go into the subject a little more in detail. It is important for our business men to realize just exactly what reconstruction signifies to the French nation.

The average American business man is apt to think of reconstruction as a task which, while unquestionably immense in its proportions, is yet comparatively simple in methods of execution. He is apt to imagine the devastated region as a clean slate, so to speak, awaiting only sufficient labor and material for the work of restoration to begin.

With such a picture in his mind it is natural for him to imagine that there must be an immediate need for new and up-to-date sewerage and electric-lighting systems in cities and towns that have been damaged. It is equally logical for him to think of the damaged French railways as ready for the installation of new rolling stock, new steel bridges, and new signaling apparatus. He is likely to picture the thousands of damaged houses as affording an opportunity for the sale of builders' hardware. Destroyed factories naturally suggest to his mind the need for new labor-saving appliances of all kinds. This, after all, is the image that is conveyed by the word "reconstruction," which we Americans ordinarily employ to describe the French problem.

WHAT THE FRENCH UNDERSTAND BY "RECONSTRUCTION."

But the French task is much more than mere physical rebuilding, and the term the French employ to describe it indicates how vast the job looms up in their imagination. "Reconstitution" is the word the Frenchman uses, for what his nation has to do is practically to reconstitute, to re-create, to make over, in all of its varied aspects—so far as it is humanly possible to do so—the community life which, before the war, abounded in the now war-ravaged region.

The fact that in much of the invaded territory there is a considerable population without means of livelihood introduces a human element that must determine the methods adopted by the French Government and the order in which areas and industries are reconstituted. Obviously the reconstitution of an inhabited area must take precedence over that of an uninhabited one.

To appreciate this point it is necessary to recollect that there are, roughly speaking, two sorts of devastation in the area which the Germans, at one time or another, overran. Each kind introduces a distinct problem in reconstitution and must be handled in a distinct manner.

To begin with, there is a zone of practically complete destruction. Starting at the English Channel, in the northwest corner of France, it winds in a band of varying depth all the way across the country to the Swiss frontier. On an average, it is perhaps 5 miles deep. This band follows the "old front line." Over the Departments of Pas-de-Calais, Nord, Somme, Aisne, Marne, Meuse, Meurthe-et-Moselle, and Vosges it cuts a hideous gash in the fair face of France.

For months at a time during the past four years large sections of this line remained stationary; that is, there was no important action, but a rain of high-explosive shells descended unceasingly upon it, so that everything that stood above ground was sooner or later blotted out. Whenever a big offensive took place, such as the allied advance at the first and second battles of the Somme and the unsuccessful German attack on Verdun, the zone of destruction was widened and deepened. This area of wholesale destruction includes an important section of the French coal fields, of which Lens was a center. It also comprises several hundred square miles of fertile farm land in the Departments of Somme and Aisne, with all the towns and villages that dotted them, as well as the former populous cities of Arras, Douai, St. Quentin, Cambrai, Laon, Soissons, Rheims, and Verdun.

Much of this area may never be rebuilt. A large part of it is now uninhabited, the former residents being scattered all over France. Some of the farm land is so badly torn up by shells that it may never wave with grain again and may have to be given over to pine forests. The stone heaps, which are all that remain of several hundred picturesque "communes," may be left as an enduring monument to Germany's nightmare of world empire.

Between this zone, over which the battle swayed for more than four years, and the French frontier there is a section which, while it lay under the German paw for four years, was not, generally speaking, fought over. Consequently, it has not been damaged to the same extent or in the same devastating way. The area in question contains the cities of Lille, Roubaix, Tourcoing, Armentieres, and Valenciennes—all important industrial centers. It also comprises a part of the coal-mining field as well as an important steel-making district. This area was, in fact, the most highly organized industrial region in France. A large part of its French population is still there.

It suffered damage in two ways. Cities were bombarded during the German retreat last October. Except in a few cases, like that of Valenciennes, the resulting injury was not irreparable. The most serious damage suffered by this region was by reason of the systematic pillage and the wanton, deliberate destruction carried out by the Germans during their four years of occupation.

In the vicinity of Valenciennes there are a number of coal mines. Until the final German retreat they were kept in more or less continuous operation. The Germans, just before their departure, blew up with dynamite the hoisting apparatus and power plants. We saw several such during our visit of examination. In many cases, fortunately, the damage is not serious.

Steel works, metal-working establishments, chemical works, breweries, and sugar refineries were the special target for German hate in the occupied area. After stripping them of their machinery in a search for metals, from sheer lust of destruction the invaders blew up the buildings. This condition prevails over a large area. Whether these last-mentioned industries will ever be rebuilt will depend upon many factors.

THE HUMAN PROBLEM FACED BY FRANCE.

Let me illustrate this point by citing the case of Lille. Its population is about 250,000. When the Germans evacuated Lille in October this population was left without either food or employment. The night our party arrived in the city it was being provisioned with food brought all the way from Paris in motor trucks.

We were informed that the textile mills, for the most part, had not been irreparably damaged. What the Germans had done was to requisition everything they could locate in the way of copper, bronze, zinc, leather, rubber, and other raw materials of which they were in dire need. To obtain these materials they stripped the textile spindles and looms of their copper bearings, their leather belts, etc. At the time our party visited Lille most of this machinery was completely out of service. Now, if the French problem of reconstitution were not so urgently and compellingly a human one, the French textile manufacturer might prefer to scrap his old machines and purchase new. But while awaiting delivery of the new plant what would become of the people of Lille and its environs? They must immediately be given employment; and so, wherever possible, spindles and looms are being repaired with whatever is available, so that work can be resumed, even though it be on an extremely inefficient and uneconomical basis.

All over that portion of the devastated region which is still inhabited the problem of reconstitution must be faced in this same manner. Plants that are so badly damaged that they must be completely rebuilt will probably have to wait some time before they can be given attention. In the meantime, factories which perhaps ought to be scrapped and rebuilt, but which can with slight expenditure be put into shape to employ the local working people, are being repaired and put into operation.

In the case of certain cities and towns which formerly were important commercially and industrially, the French Government may have to decide whether it is justified, for the time being and under existing circumstances, in attempting to restore them at all. This is especially the case where the civilian population was long since evacuated and is now settled in other parts of France.

HEAPS OF DÉBRIS MARK SITE OF ARRAS.

Arras, the "chief place" of the Department of Pas-de-Calais, is a city that possibly may never be rebuilt. Before the war it numbered perhaps 30,000 inhabitants. It was not an important industrial center, but it was the seat of departmental government.

Although the city was never in possession of the Germans, there is little in its outward appearance to distinguish it from St. Quentin and other cities that were. It was under bombardment more or less continuously for more than four years. There is not a house in Arras that has not been damaged by shells.

CITY OF ST. QUENTIN SHATTERED AND SACKED.

The city of St. Quentin affords another illustration of the impossibility of immediately rebuilding a badly shattered city. Before the war it was the industrial capital of the Department of the Aisne. It had numerous textile plants, printing establishments, foundries, machine shops, agricultural-implement factories, etc. Its population was about 50,000. I visited it a month before the armistice was signed, just after the British had driven the Germans out. There had been fighting in the streets between the British and German patrols. In several places, at street intersections, we saw the concrete blockhouses, with narrow horizontal slits, through which German machine guns had commanded the approaches.

The town showed the effects of the terrific bombardment it had recently undergone at the hands of both friend and foe. The railway station and the buildings in its vicinity were wrecked, as was the near-by cathedral, one of the loveliest in all France. Hardly a house in the city but showed in one way or another the effect of the bombardment by cannon and aeroplane. The civilian population had been evacuated before the Germans retired and the only inhabitants were some French soldiers. Private dwellings did not escape pillage by the German invaders. In perhaps 50 houses that I examined there was not a stick of furniture, not a picture on the wall, not an ornament left. Even the electric wiring and the gas fixtures had been carried off.

The industrial establishments of St. Quentin had likewise been sacked by the Germans. Outside one building I observed a neat pile of steel shafting with its hangers and pulleys. Apparently the Germans were unable, in the haste of their departure, to carry the material away with them. The cost of reequipping the industrial plants of St. Quentin alone would run into several millions of dollars. But the destruction in the city is so universal that it may not be possible to do any restoration for some months to come. In any event the rehabilitation of the city must proceed very slowly, and as there is not a large civilian population to be taken care of immediately the reconstruction of St. Quentin may have to be deferred until more pressing problems are on the way to solution.

RECONSTITUTION OF AGRICULTURE—COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS—FARM MACHINERY.

Among these more pressing tasks are the reconstitution of agriculture and the restoration of the coal mines.

In bringing the agricultural industry of northern France back to its former fruitfulness the use of modern farm machinery such as America produces so successfully will doubtless play an important part. The dearth of horses would seem to make the farm tractor absolutely indispensable. The shortage of labor likewise will make the use of labor-saving farm appliances desirable.

Here the peculiar position of French agriculture must be taken into consideration. It is said that there are more than 4,000,000 individual landowners in the country. This means that each farmer's parcel of land is small. The appearance of the French village indicates this. The houses are not built upon the occupant's own land, as in America, but are huddled around a church. Each peasant cultivates his little piece of land, which may be some distance from the village.

The result of this system of small holdings is that the French peasant is not financially able to purchase expensive farm machinery. In the devastated region his difficulty is accentuated by the fact that such capital as he possessed before the war has been destroyed.

Therefore, in order to market any considerable quantity of American farm machinery in connection with the reconstitution of agriculture in the devastated section of France, account must be taken of the necessity for selling to cooperative associations among the peasants. Without some system of purchasing farm machines in common, it would seem difficult to build up a very large business in France. The French Government is alive to the situation and is assisting the formation of these cooperative farmers' associations. Farm implements may, perhaps, be purchased by the Government for distribution among the cooperative societies.

In certain sections, moreover, agriculture provides the raw materials of industry. The sugar mills of the Aisne are fed with beet root grown locally. It would be useless to rebuild the destroyed sugar factories before beet root could be produced by the peasants of the region.

COAL MINES WRECKED AND FLOODED—TASK OF RESTORATION.

A basic industry the reconstitution of which has already begun is that of coal mining. The necessity for restoring to productivity the damaged coal mines of northern France is obvious. Coal is the food of French industry, for there is no water power in the north of France that can be utilized in its place. Without coal it would be idle to reconstruct the damaged electrical power stations, and the resumption of life in the industrial establishments of the devastated region would be equally impossible.

The task of repairing the coal mines is in itself an enormous one. As stated above, a large portion of the coal-mining field was in the battle zone for four years. Not only were the surface works destroyed by gunfire but the deliberate dynamiting by the Germans of the concrete lining of the shafts resulted in flooding the underground workings.

At one of the leading mines of the Lens Coal Mining Co. which we inspected the French engineers said the water was not more than 50 feet below the surface, and this particular shaft was nearly 1,500 feet deep.

Before there can be any thought of purchasing coal-extracting machinery for use underground the mines must be pumped dry of water. This work alone may take a year in the case of certain mines. The French engineers hazard no guess as to the condition in which the underground workings will be found after the water is pumped out.

PLANTS THAT MAY NOT BE REBUILT.

A point that must be given due weight by the French in planning the reconstitution of industrial establishments that have been destroyed is whether, in view of developments in the particular industry since August, 1914, it is economical to rebuild them on the old sites. The ability of such factories to compete must be taken into consideration. In many cases the owners of industrial plants located in the invaded section are dead. In that case the plants may never be rebuilt, or they may be merged into others created during the war outside of the war zone. Questions of this sort are coming up all the time, and their decision may delay rebuilding in many cases.

FRENCH LOSSES IN PRODUCTIVE AGENCIES.

The French Government recently published an estimate of the losses due to the war:

In farm implements, to replace the losses they would need about 51,000 side-hill plows, 33,000 other plows, 56,000 cultivators, 30,000 mowing machines, 115,000 farm wagons, 28,000 harrows, 50,000 rollers, 18,000 hoes, 36,000 seed drills, 13,000 fertilizers, 16,000 beet extractors, 21,000 winnowing machines, 18,000 horserakes, 32,000 reapers and binders, 53,000 root cutters, etc.

With regard to the cattle lost, it is very hard to get at the exact figures, but in 10 departments in 1913 there were 607,000 horses, whereas in 1915 there were only 242,000, or a loss of 60 per cent. Of cattle of all kinds, there was a loss of 850,000, or 55 per cent; of pigs, there was a loss of 380,000, or about 55 per cent.

The loss in wheat amounts to about 1,300,000 acres. The loss in hay amounts to about 850,000 acres.

The total damage to the soil, to live stock, to crops, to forests, tools, etc., is estimated at $2,000,000,000.

Before the war France used 59,407,000 tons of coal a year, with an addition of 9,166,000 tons more in coke equivalent. Of this, France produced about 40,844,000 tons and 5,357,000 tons of coke equivalent, the rest coming from abroad. Of this amount, 27,398,000 tons of coal came from the Valenciennes Basin. In all, something over 70 per cent of the total coal supply of France came from the invaded regions, and very much the best quality of coal at that. About 140,000 men were employed in those mines in the invaded regions out of 203,208 coal miners for all of France. This means, with their families, three-quarters of a million people were largely dependent on the coal mines. Over $200,000,000 of machinery has probably been destroyed.

Before the war the total production of iron ore in France was about 21,918,000 tons, of which 19,639,000 tons came from the Briey and Longwy Basins in the Meurthe-et-Moselle; that is, 90 per cent of the total, of which 16,500,000 tons was in the hands of the Germans. The miners who were employed in these invaded mines, with their families, represented at least 150,000 people out of employment. It is interesting to know that just before the war the total of iron production of the Germans was 35,941,000 tons. In the United States it was 63,000,000 tons. Over half a billion dollars' worth of machinery has been destroyed, including that of steel and iron mills.

The textile industry consisted before the war of about 7,530,000 cotton spindles throughout France, of which 4,500,000 were in the region invaded by Germany and of which almost all were either destroyed or carried back into Germany and France. Out of 2,365,000 wool spindles, 2,000,000 were in the invaded districts. Out of 550,000 linen spindles, 500,000 were in the invaded regions and destroyed or removed. The same is true of looms, of which there were 140,000 in France, and over 81,000 of these were in the invaded districts. Over $120,000,000 of machinery has been destroyed.

Out of 210 sugar refineries in France, 140 have been destroyed by the Germans. Out of 3,000 brush factories, 2,000 have already been destroyed. Over $25,000 of machinery has been destroyed.

Electric power stations, totaling 300,000 kilowatts, have been destroyed with an equipment loss of $50,000,000.

Breweries have had over $25,000,000 of machinery destroyed.

In machine shops $100,000,000 of machinery has been destroyed. In foundries, etc., $60,000,000 of machinery is gone.

None of these damages include land or buildings. Furthermore, almost all of this machinery costs three times as much to replace today, so that it can safely be said that $4,000,000,000 worth of machinery will be needed to replace that destroyed or carried away. This includes the stock and raw materials damaged and damage done to the mines.

Before the war France manufactured 3,000,000 tons of cement a year. In February, 1918, she was manufacturing only 400,000 tons, which amount since increased and has later diminished through the difficulty of securing coal; a good proportion of this was in the invaded departments.

DEVASTATION IN THE WAR ZONE.

Edward de Billy, Deputy High Commissioner of the French Republic, in an address at Baltimore on December 28, stated that though France had regained Alsace and Lorraine, even this was outweighed by the losses.

Resorting to figures, he declared that 26,000 factories in the French districts occupied by the Germans were destroyed or stripped of their machinery; that thousands of miles of farm land, devastated by shells, was made unfit for cultivation; that the net loss in ship tonnage, through sinkings and enforced curtailment in production, was 670,000 tons, and that the money cost of the conflict, in appropriations and public debt, aggregated 158,000,000,000 francs, or $31,600,000,000.

1,400,000 MEN KILLED.

"Besides 1,400,000 of our young men who were killed or died of wounds or illness in this war, we have a great number whose physical ability has been seriously impaired. Add to these the number of our prisoners who came back in such a terrible physical condition as to render them unfit for any sustained effort, and we come to a total loss, for the work to be started in France, of about 2,500,000 men, who were mostly among the youngest, ablest, and strongest, as well as the most spirited, of our people—a terrible loss for a country of less than 40,000,000 inhabitants.

"Our agriculture has perhaps suffered more heavily, if possible, than any other branch of our economic activity. The number of cattle, which in England increased by 4 per cent, has in France decreased by 18 per cent. The production of milk has decreased by 63 per cent. The number of sheep has decreased in France by 38 per cent. The number of pigs has decreased by 40 per cent. The soil of France is also in an impoverished condition, having been for four years mostly tilled by very young and elderly men, below or above the age of military service, and by women whose physical strength was not equal to the splendid spirit they have shown in this war.

"The part of France occupied by the Germans," he said, "produced four-fifths of our woolens and included 80 per cent of our weaving industry. During the four years of their occupation the Germans willfully and methodically destroyed all that was in their power to destroy. They not only requisitioned, as at Roubaix and Tourcoing, where they commandeered stocks of wool worth 300,000,000 francs—requisition is one of the rights of war, and of that we can not complain. But what is against all right and against all international law and agreement is the destruction and stealing of property; and this is what the Germans did.

"As to our cotton industry in the north, the German invasion has cost us 2,100,000 spindles and 13,200 looms, and in the east 125,000 spindles and 6,905 looms. This robbery was not carried on in cotton and wool factories alone. Iron works, machine works also, were looted, the useful equipment—engines, rolling mills, machine tools, even structural steel—having been methodically taken away and set to work again in the iron works in Germany. Mines were flooded, the surface plants dynamited, the workmen's dwellings destroyed.

"Taxes have been raised to an unprecedented level. While in 1914 the total of our national budget was slightly above 4,000,000,000 francs, the taxes will have given in 1918, without the invaded regions, which were, as you know, by far the richest, over 9,000,000,000 francs. In 1917 the civilian population in France paid in taxes $38 per capita, as compared with $9 paid in 1916 by Americans.

"France before the war had a public debt of 34,000,000,000 francs. The interior debt has increased during the war by over 100,000,000,000, the last public loan having produced 27,000,000,000. We have received from Great Britain and the United States loans amounting to 25,000,000,000 francs.

"So that France starts on this new period of her history with a burden of public debt increased on account of the war by more than 125,000,000,000 francs, a figure which will certainly be further increased in order to liquidate the war expenses.

"I had to give you these figures in order to make you realize the seriousness of the situation in which France stands. We are all ready to face our problems with the utmost confidence and will to succeed, but we are aware that they are grave problems.

"First, while the whole world jumps into peace work and resumes trade, we have a part of our territory which is unable to produce. We can not maintain our place in the markets of the world. We can not get our own supply of coal. We are obliged to maintain restrictions in order to protect our industry while in course of rehabilitation, and as long as a normal order of things is not reestablishd.

"Secondly, in order to get from outside markets the raw materials and finished products we need, we depend largely upon foreign ships.

SHIPS THE BIG ITEM.

"Thirdly, trade and shipping are closely connected. We have to rebuild our foreign trade, which has been stopped during the war on account of lack of tonnage and lack of industrial production.

"Fourthly, one of our best assets is our colonial empire. We have pacified and established our rule in vast countries, whose natural supplies are enormous, and whose populations are willing to work, and are loyal, as they have shown by giving us a total contribution of 918,000 men during the war, of which 680,000 were fighters and 238,000 workmen in our war factories. With her possessions, France is actually the fourth of the great countries of the world as regards territory, the fifth as regards population. But we must develop these possessions. In order to perform that duty we want ships. And again, our merchant fleet has fallen to almost nothing. So in order to fulfill her duties France has two great objects to achieve—to rehabilitate her devastated regions and to build ships."

THE DEVASTATED ZONE.

In a cablegram received in Washington on the first day of 1919 Mr. Hoover told of the wanton destruction wrought by the German Armies in northern France. He stated that the work of rehabilitation had been made so difficult by enemy outrages that the whole region would have to remain for a time under the care of the Commission for Relief in Belgium.

"The entire industrial life of the region," he said, "has been destroyed by the Germans. There is scarcely a single factory that can be operated without a very large portion of new equipment. The coal mines are totally destroyed, and the network of railways in this region has been rendered almost hopeless of reconstruction for many months.

"The German method of destruction was to bend every single rail by exploding a hand grenade under it, rendering it useless for all time. The Grand Canal du Nord, which connects this section of France with the Belgium canal system, and is the natural entrepôt for goods for Antwerp or Rotterdam, was itself practically the fighting line for months, and is so badly damaged that it will take fully a year for its complete reconstruction."

Discussing the general conditions, Mr. Hoover stated that the relief was based upon the allowance of food to the value of about 35 cents a day to the destitute, those having any resources or employment being required to pay. The whole extent of destitution was not yet known, but appeared to include fully 60 per cent of the people. His cable added these details:

"The population of this area at the moment of the retreat was about 1,500,000, there being also about 300,000 refugees in Belgium, who are returning, and some 500,000 refugees in France, all of whom are anxious to return to their native soil.

"The destruction of some 20 principal towns and literally hundreds of villages renders the return of these refugees a stupendous problem. Every effort is being made to restrain them from going back until some systematic provision for shelter can be completed, but they evade all official urgings, and the roads are a continuous procession of these pitiable bodies. Thousands of them reach their villages to find every vestige of shelter destroyed, and finally wander into the villages farther back from the acute battle area, which are themselves already overcrowded to a heart-breaking degree.

"In order to remedy this situation to some extent the Commission for Relief in Belgium has obtained the services of 150 volunteers from the American Navy and is taking over a large amount of second-hand barrack material from the Navy and Army. Those barracks are in course of erection adjacent to the destroyed villages under the superintendence of the Navy volunteers."

REBUILDING THE RAILWAYS.

In the whole zone of their retreat—speaking only of the one line from Paris to Berlin beyond Compiègne—the Germans blew up all the bridges with vast quantities of explosives, which destroyed not only the arches and metal flooring but the piles and abutments to their very foundations. They blew up the switches and even the tracks for dozens of kilometers at a stretch, either by putting a bomb under every other joint, thus making every rail useless, or by tearing the rails from the ties with a sort of plow dragged by a locomotive, which put the road into such a state that nothing can be done but clear the ground completely and replace the wreckage with entirely new construction.

"While they were in the very act of negotiating the armistice—that is, up to November 10—the Germans continued this work, and—still speaking only of the line from Paris to Berlin—it was in these very last days that they blew up, among other works, three of the large bridges by which the line crosses the curves of the Sambre between the French frontier and Charleroi.

DESTROYED 1,731 BRIDGES.

"This systematic destruction extended to 1,731 bridges, of which 371 exceeded 10 yards in length; it included 338 railway stations, almost all the telegraph and telephone lines, waterworks, warehouses, etc. It may be said that by means of slow mines this destruction still continues. Recently there was an explosion in our station at Seclin that cut our road with a chasm 25 feet in diameter and 10 feet deep. In this regard Belgium has suffered less, or at least has suffered in a much less extensive region, corresponding to the much smaller distance over which the enemy was driven back by force before the armistice.

"The devastated area in France covers approximately 6,000 square miles, in all about 2 per cent of France, with a total population in normal times of about 2,000,000 persons. This is about equal in area to Rhode Island and Connecticut.

"Along the route of the German retreat during the last four months in the Somme, the Aisne, and the Oise region the devastation is complete. The area southwest of Ham, which before this time had been only partly destroyed, was wholly laid waste. Cities like Ham, Noyon, Nesle, Roye, Soissons, Dormans, and Fismes are almost completely destroyed.

"In the Marne region 258 communes are damaged, including a total of 3,500 buildings entirely destroyed and 12,000 destroyed in part. In the Meuse region 59 commnunes are damaged, with about 1,800 buildings completely destroyed and nearly 700 destroyed in part. In the Vosges, 53 communes were damaged, with a total of 1,256 buildings completely destroyed and nearly 2,000 partially destroyed.

"In the Marne and Meuse regions nearly all the destruction occurred during the battle of the Marne along both sides of the line, where the fighting was heaviest. The destruction by shell fire was intense. This makes a belt about 150 miles long, wherein the destroyed area is anywhere from 5 to 10 miles wide.

"North and east of Nancy it again is very serious, almost all of it done by shell fire. In this area are included cities like Luneville, Gerbeviller—which was systematically burned—and a part of St. Die. Thence the line runs down to the border of Alsace, where buildings, and especially those in the town of Thann, were destroyed."

Mr. Hoover, in speaking of the devastation in Belgium, says:

During the four years of occupation there has been a great diminution—probably more than one-half—in the total number of cattle and hogs. It can be said almost literally that horses have disappeared out of Belgium, there probably not being 15 per cent of the original animals left.

Investigation proves that industrial and residential destruction in Belgium varies greatly in different localities and with different industries. For instance, out of the steel furnaces in Belgium, 35 or 40 have been deliberately destroyed by the Germans in their determination to end the Belgian steel industry. Many of the textile mills have been put out of commission, either through deliberate destruction and removal of machinery or by removal of the copper and brass parts and electric motors. Some of the textile mills of the more antiquated type of equipment apparently did not appeal to the Germans, and they can be gotten into action at an early date. The Germans seem to have focused themselves on the modern equipments.

COAL INDUSTRY SAVED.

The glass industry has been but little interfered with, and the stern promise of retribution by President Wilson seems to have saved the coal industry except for very few mines, although actual explosives and wires were laid in place for the destruction of a large number of the mines. The President's warning seems to have created a sudden change of heart.

There are some 300,000 French refugees in Belgium, driven out of northern France by the Germans. They have been cared for out of the meager stores of the Belgians and by the commission for relief in Belgium. They are, however, like homing pigeons in their resolve to return to their native villages. As there is no transportation, the roads southward into France are a continuous stream of these pitiful groups of men, women, and children, pulling their carts and trudging through the cold and wind toward their destroyed homes.

THE WILD CAT MARINES IN BATTLE.

Maj. Frederick Palmer, the distinguished correspondent, has written a vivid description of the Battle of Belleau Wood, and by his kindness and through the courtesy of Dodd, Mead & Co., I am permitted to publish it.

[Copyrighted 1918 by Dodd, Mead & Co.]

After having been drilled all summer, the regiment of marines which had come with the first convoy in June was withdrawn from the First Division. Although this was most depressing to every officer and man in that it meant that they would not be among the first in the trenches, the service to which they were assigned was in one sense a compliment to qualities which are as inseparable from them as their gallantry. The marines have traditions, associated with ship's orderliness, which are kept up by competent veteran noncommissioned officers, that make them models in soldierly deportment. An isolated squad or platoon, from the very nature of their training, keeps to form when doing guard duty or police work. Pride of corps sticks to a marine sentry or messenger though he is separated from any commanding officer.

From all directions our widespread organization was calling for details of this dependable character, and the marines were chosen to meet the demands. Marines acted as couriers across the Channel; they guarded our construction projects and our property; kept order on piers and in laborers' quarters; acted as police in Paris and at the ports, carrying out provost marshal's instructions with polite firmness in keeping with the impeccable neatness of their uniforms. In their hearts they were wroth, but they were too proud to allow it to influence their correct deportment.

Somewhere between the duties of the Army and Navy the sea soldiers who had survived from the days of the three-deckers have kept a place for themselves. In strict military logic, they have a place neither in a modern navy organization or in a modern army organization. From time to time efforts have been made to legislate them out of existence, but they have the trick in practice of keeping a place for themselves on the quarter deck and making one in all expeditions overseas owing to the friends they gain and their conduct whether charging machine guns or policing an ammunition dump. They think well of themselves in order to insure that the rest of the world will think the same.

Talk to them of being absorbed into the Army and they exhibit a willingness to be agreeable by absorbing the Army if that will serve the purpose of doing away with the anomaly of a separate military organization in France, with its own recruiting and replacement system and pay department. They had to go into the Army uniform under duress of necessity when no material for their own forestry green was forthcoming, but though in khaki they kept their globe and anchor insignia on their collars. When I asked a Marine sentry in front of one of our Army offices in Paris how he liked his work, he said:

"Very well, sir. It will fit me for a job after the war. I can wear a striped waistcoat and brass buttons and open cab doors in front of a New York hotel." His ingrowing misery lest he be kept at his peaceful assignment was natural but groundless. He would have his fill of fighting; for the Marines were kept in mind as one of the factors in the consummation of a plan. After the withdrawal of the Marines, the First Division was brought up to full strength as a complete regular division composed of the Sixteenth, Eighteenth, Twenty-sixth, and Twenty-eighth Regiments of Infantry, and the First Artillery Brigade of the Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Artillery Regiments.

On the 3d of June the German confined his attacks for the most part to the northward of us, but was evidently feeding in machine-gun groups on our front with a view to future mischief. On the early morning of the 4th we took over from the French a 12-mile front, with the Third Brigade, holding the Fourth from its left to the west of Belleau Wood. The Twenty-third Regiment, and the Marine Battalion and the Fifth Machine Gun Battalion which had been sent to fill the gap at Colombs were returned to the division, which now became a united family holding its own sector. We might do as we pleased, then, in that 12 miles of battle line, with no reserves between us and the Marne; and this meant we would not leave the Germans to do the attacking.

GERMANS' EXCELLENT POSITION.

From Hill 204 all the way to our right the Germans had the advantage of observation. Our roads, particularly, were under the watchful eyes of German balloons. German aviators scouted our positions all too freely. I saw them flying so low over our Infantry that the iron crosses on their wings were visible to the naked eye. They dropped bombs in broad daylight. The country is uneven, with many woods and the usual opens fields between woods and villages. In front of the Marines the Germans held the important tactical point of the village of Bouresches and the railroad station, and they had filtered into the adjoining Belleau Wood and around it as an ideal cover for machine nests. This Bouresches-Belleau line was excellent for the purpose of the enemy if they were to stabilize their positions and cease to advance, or as a jumping-off place for continuing their offensive.

The spirit of rivalry between the Third (a regular brigade) and the Fourth (the Marines) was very pronounced. No regular was going to admit that any quarter-deck soldier was in his class; and no Marine—he considered himself as belonging to a corps d'elite—was going to allow any question that he was not a little better than any regular to get abroad, if he could help it. Marine officers might not have had the schooling in tactics of the regulars, but being plain Infantrymen, with no expectation of developing into Joffres or Hindenburgs, they considered that at least they were not afraid to fight. People had said that the Marine Corps was an anachronism and ought to be eliminated from our armed forces. Its honor and future were at stake there before Bouresches and Belleau Wood. If it were to get more recruits as a small organization, which is hardly accepted by the Army and not, perhaps, altogether by the Navy as a little brother, it must be worthy of those recruiting posters at home.

On the 4th, the first day that they were in the front line, the Marines repulsed a German attack. At dawn on the morning of the 6th, the second day after they were in the line, they made an attack in conjunction with the French on the left to rectify the line in the direction of Torcy, and they went through machine-gun fire and shell fire to their objectives, doing it all according to pattern. This might have been enough for a day's work, but it was only an introduction to what was to follow.

MARINES DISREGARD RISKS.

The way to act in an active sector was to be active, according to Gen. Harbord's idea; and the obvious place for a first offensive on our line was in front of the Fourth Brigade, to the regret of the Third Brigade. At 2 p. m. an order was typed off at brigade headquarters for an operation beginning at 5 p. m., which was to take both Bouresches and Belleau Wood. There was a brief, raking artillery preparation of the wood and a concentration on Bouresches, which was to be stormed in the second phase after Belleau had been won.

In the name of the months that they had drilled, of the hardships endured, of the wearisome vigils of a harassing trench sector and of their corps, the Marines could have only one thought—success. Senior officers could not consider the niceties of the craft in not exposing themselves. They must put their personal weight and influence into this, their first attack. Every man was too preoccupied to think of risk. With the jauntiness of parade and the offensive zeal which had been long nursed became a burning desire set on the goal of that dark clump of trees and undergrowth ahead, they advanced into the wood.

At the very outset they met machine guns' fire, and out of the wood after they were in it came the persistent rattle of rifle fire, varied by veritable storms of machine-gun fire. Wounded began to flow back from the various ravines. Calls came for Stokes' mortars from the hidden scene of that vicious medley, along with the report that Col. Catlin had been wounded a half hour after the attack was begun. The machine-gun positions in the outskirts of the woods had been taken, but they were only the first lot. I have been through many woods where German machine gunners had ensconsed themselves, and none that I remembered afforded better positions for defense against any enemy in the wood or against one approaching it from our front.

HOW GUNS WERE HIDDEN.

Not only was the undergrowth thick but there were numerous rocks and ravines and pockets, all of which favored the occupant. There was nothing new in the system which the Germans applied, and which the allies also apply; but not until troops go against it for the first time do they realize its character. Its formidability is dependent upon the stoutness of heart of the defenders, their craft, and the number of their guns. With the thicket so dense that it prevents a man being seen even 50 feet away, a weapon with a range of 3,000 yards is easily screened. Each gun has its zone of fire, in relation to the others, to sweep every square yard of the ground, and fire is held until it will have a maximum effect. There is no flanking any gun when the supply of guns is sufficient, for hidden guns are waiting to turn their blasts on the effort, and guns, furthermore, are placed in such a manner as to give both lateral and plunging fire.

Crafty veteran soldiers might have decided, as soon as they had developed the character of the defenses, that the cost of going on was too high, and a veteran, crafty staff, accepting the dictum of experience, would have adopted more arduous measures. Such woods as these had been many times submitted to hurricanes of shells that had uprooted all the young trees and left only the limbless, slashed trunks of old trees standing before they were taken, particularly in former days before we came to open warfare tactics.

A CASUALTY EVERY MINUTE.

When they could locate a gun our men concentrated their rifles upon it. The crackle of bullets passing about the gunners' heads, even if they were not hit, might stop them from firing, but meanwhile some other gun was cutting the twigs around the heads of the marksmen. The wounded crawled back behind rocks or into ravines or to any place where they could find a dead space. The instinct of our men, caught in such a mesh of fire which was every minute causing a casualty, was to come to close quarters, and they wanted to go free of packs, of blouses, shirts open, rifle in hand, with their faith in their bayonets. Hot cries accompanied the flashing drive of the cold steel through the underbrush. Many bayonets might drop from the hands of the men who were hit, but some bayonets would "get there." And that was the thing—to get there.

We have always fought in this way. It is tradition and our nature. "We go to it," as we say. German gunners ran from their guns in face of such assaults; others tried to withdraw their guns; others were taken in groups huddled in ravines as youth, transcendent in its white rage of determination, bore down upon them and gathered them in, or, again, drove the bayonet home into gunners who stuck to their guns until the instant that forms with eyes gleaming leapt at them. Our young platoon commanders had the task of leading all to themselves in the thickets among the tree trunks, as they always have in such fights, while senior officers wait on the result. When night came we had to yield some of the ground which we had taken or to remain without cover in the face of the blasts, but we had securely established ourselves in a portion of the wood.

HOLD WITH CAPTURED GUNS.

With captured German machine guns, men whom we could not reach with food and water held their gains, taking food and water from the American and German dead.

Although the first phase of the attack had not been fully accomplished, it was determined not to hold back the other companies, which had been waiting under shell fire that only aroused their eagerness to advance, from undertaking the second phase. Theirs was a simpler task than that of their comrades who had stormed the wood. Artillery preparation in clearing the way was, of course, more serviceable against a village than against a wood, and neither machine gun nor shell fire delayed the precision of the movement across the open into the village where, with the avidity of their zeal and the supple quickness of their litheness and youth, and in the elation of their first experience of the kind, our men cleared the cellars of Bouresches of all Germans in hiding and gained their objectives. Then they set about with equal energy in preparing protection against the retaliatory bombardment which was bound to come. Bouresches was solidly theirs when morning came, and they proved it by withering a German counter attack with their rifle fire and machine-gun fire. The Germans covered the roads to their rear with their artillery in revenge. A lone man could not approach the town without being sniped and shelled for weeks to come.

Meanwhile the Marines were there in Belleau Wood cheek by jowl with the Germans, who were doubtless slipping more machine guns into that portion of the wood.

The Germans must be made to understand that this wood belonged to the Marines, while the Germans, to discourage further attacks on our part, began gassing the approaches both to Bouresches and Belleau. In that era a real "hate" was on. We had grim work in removing our wounded and burying our dead and dangerous work in bringing up wagons over shelled roads and forwarding rations to the men in the front line, with the Third as well as the Fourth Brigade. But Bouresches sent back assuring news from its isolation. The water supply was good. The men had hot coffee, and they caught chickens and killed a hog and a cow. Their messages were so very cheerful out in that village crumbling under shell fire that you might have thought they were having a holiday in a summer resort. Wasn't it their village, and wasn't it the first the Marines had taken?

Before our next attack on Belleau we gave it a more powerful artillery preparation, and we had learned afresh the lesson that guns will not reach machine-gun nests in the midst of congeries of bowlders. A machine gun is a small target when well placed, and a direct hit, or a very close hit, of a high explosive is required to put it out of action. Shells burst prematurely upon striking tree trunks and before reaching the earth.

When our men arrived at 5 o'clock on June 11 they found resistance at least softened. Some machine gunners who had not lost their nerve after the hour's artillery pounding stuck to their posts; others at the sight of our men breaking through the thickets threw up their hands; others went in hiding among the bowlders, no longer soldiers, but children frightened by the lightning. The nests that held us back formed islands in our progress which had to be cleaned up by special detail.

HOW PRISONERS WERE TAKEN.

Let it be repeated that the very irregular bow shape of Belleau Wood, no less than the character of the ground, favored the defenders in forming cross zones of fire. It was a strange and fierce business there in the dense brush, where men of the same squad could not keep touch with one another at times. Happily we had located some of the nests before we attacked, but those farther ahead we could locate only when they began firing or when we stumbled upon gunners who were still hugging cover after the bombardment, or simply had concluded that it was better to be a live prisoner than to die for the Kaiser. They were taken in groups and singly, taken standing behind trees and hugging the holes they had dug in the earth. Some were trying to retreat with their guns; others fled precipitately, and many kept serving their guns. It was a hunt of man-hornet nests, with khaki the hunter and the German gray the hunted. Our men fought even more fiercely than in their first attack. They wanted to finish the Belleau Wood job this time, but this was not to be, though we had taken 30 machine guns, 2 minenwerfers, and 300 prisoners.

After advancing to a certain point we met the machine-gun nest system working too thoroughly to permit of further effort except at unnecessary sacrifice. The colonel who had made the attack said that with further artillery preparation he believed that he could master the rest of the wood. When the guns had again done their duty his men, whose eyes glittered now at the very mention of Belleau Wood, made another attack with the ardor of men who have faith that one more fierce effort would do the trick. They took more prisoners and more machine guns. For a time the news that the runners brought back indicated the success was complete.

Now, the enemy, smarting under our success, began bringing up reserves and concentrated a terrific artillery fire on Bouresches, the wood, and all the neighborhood. The wood had become a point of honor with the Germans no less than with the Americans. They saturated it with a bombardment of yperite gas, which clings to the earth and the trees and burns flesh that comes in contact with it. As the Germans could hardly send their own men into this area for two or three days to suffer the effects intended for us, we withdrew all except a small maintaining force from Belleau. Meanwhile the Germans, with their reserves, made an attack in force on Bouresches. By all criterions this attack ought to have succeeded. Some Germans penetrated the edge of the village, and a good many of them remained there—dead. Our machine-gun fire and rifle fire drove all others who escaped back to their lines. At the same time, under cover of their artillery, the Germans had reinforced their machine-gun units which remained in the edge of the woods, probably thinking that as soon as the effects of the yperite were over recovery of the wood would not be difficult.

For 12 days now the Second Division had been in the line and the Marines had put all their physical and nerve vitality into the effort against Belleau. They had gone into the fight in the fettle of race horses. Glimpses of the approaches to the wood during an attack, when retaliatory shell fire descended on wounded and German prisoners alike, formed the most vivid picture of war that had yet been seen behind the American lines. The prisoners regarded their captors in a kind of wondering and tragic stupor. Their staff had told them that the Americans were untrained, a mob, negligible. Yet these Americans had charged straight at their machine guns and then leapt out of the thickets with furious abruptness. They were untamed, wild, refusing to consider the rules laid down by the German staff for their conduct. Captured German intelligence reports, contradicting German propaganda, spoke of them only as needing more training to be first-class shock troops according to the German conception—which was a real German compliment.

The battalion which had made two attacks that had all but finished the task, suffering from machine-gun fire, mortar fire, shell fire, and gas, had reached the stage of exhaustion when nature overwhelms will; when, although a man says, "I'm all right; as good as ever," his eyelids droop as the sentence is finished and the next moment he falls dead asleep. This battalion must have rest; and the remainder of the brigade, with all its spirit and energy responding to the driver's hand, must also have some relief from the strain.

The Germans had been strengthening their remaining strongholds in the wood, and particularly one stronghold among a congerie of bowlders in a very dense thicket, with every avenue of approach covered by its fire. Units of the Third Division were to try on June 21 and 22 to force their reduction, but fortune was not with the attempts. Some of the German machine gunners, it was reported, had put on American uniforms, which enabled them for a time to deceive our own men as to the progress of our attacking parties, with resultant ambushes.

The Marines were put back in Belleau, relieving the regiment of the Third. The Germans still had access to go and come freely to their strongholds in the north end of the wood. It was an old trick with the Germans, this holding the edge and approaches of a wood with the main body protecting them from shell fire. On numerous occasions it had been successful. Gen. Harbord was determined that it should not be successful on this occasion. The Marines made another effort with very small forces, which failed; but in this effort they gained the knowledge for the final one that succeeded when all their preparations were correct in every detail.

As one of the reports that came back said, "Our men went through them like a bunch of wildcats." There could be no better description of what happened. That last rush, after artillery preparation, had a catlike ferocity, which put all thickets and all machine-gun nests behind it and looked out into the open beyond the object of three weeks of straining muscle, sleepless vigil, and desperate courage. Once we were among them, the Germans who remained alive bent to the storm. The 200 prisoners taken in that little area was a further proof of the importance attached to the wood.

Our attacks on Belleau Wood had been justified by the result. In all we had taken 700 Germans alive out of the woods and, severe as our casualties had been, the prisoners exceeded the number of our dead without counting the numerous German dead, which, in the cold accounting of war, was an unusual accomplishment. We had also proved our mastery over the enemy. We had set out to take a position and we had taken it, which was of infinite value to the morale of a young army and of corresponding influence in weakening that of an enemy when he faced our troops. Forever the Marines will consider the Belleau Wood as theirs, and in recognition of their title the French changed the name to that of Marine Brigade Wood.

HELLWOOD.

By the kind permission of the Saturday Evening Post, I am privileged to publish excerpts from a copyrighted article by Mr. George Pattullo, giving a most vivid description of the marines in battle.

A wonderful thing has come to pass. A little force of Americans—a mere handful—has put new life into the allied armies and raised the drooping spirits of two nations.

Bouresches and Bois de Belleau of themselves would not stand out in war's chronicle as military feats, for both were small affairs in these days of human tidal waves, and, desperate as was the fighting, there have been others as desperate, and will doubtless be many more. But the stout blows that the Second Division delivered in the month of June, with the leathernecks as the head of the hammer, can not be measured by their toll of boche dead and prisoners, by their capture of ground or guns or material; they must be gauged by their moral effect, and that has been tremendous.

I have never seen anything like it. The German offensives had been sweeping forward like a flood, lapping up territory here, then swerving to lap up there, but always coming on, so that their whole battle line drew inexorably nearer to Paris. The British had suffered cruel losses; the French were fighting with their backs to the wall. And American aid—where was it? On that they had banked for a year; on that they had built all their hopes.

For months and months the poilu had been fed abundantly with promises of American support and what the glorious allies from overseas would do when they got in—and all he had seen of them was in the training camps or in quiet sectors where the only activity was intermittent shelling, an infrequent raid, or minor operations carried out under French tutelage. Meanwhile the Germans drove against the allied front again and the poilu had to do the fighting. Where was this American aid? Was it to prove as illusory as the Russian? Small wonder that Jacques grew skeptical and angrily contemptuous of the newspaper propaganda which endeavored to stiffen the nation's morale by still more roseate pictures of what the United States would do in the future. It was always and always the future! When would they come in force and help bear the brunt?

Hope deferred maketh the heart sick. They had almost despaired of us. It is my firm conviction that our Army did not enter seriously into their calculations for this emergency; certain it is that the average French and British soldier had given over expecting substantial aid in the 1918 crisis. We saw their spirits go down, down, down.

And still the German hordes pressed on toward Paris. They veered and swirled; held at one point, they surged forward at another. Came word that they were in Chateau-Thierry. Men looked at one another in dumb foreboding. Where would they be stopped? And then suddenly the boche flood tide recoiled. The broad gap they had forced in the line was closed, and the magic news flashed throughout the army and nation that the French were counterattacking, that they were hurling the enemy back at critical points, and that the road to Paris was barred. How had it been done? An American force was mentioned in the first announcement, but Americans had shared in undertakings before, and the French remained unimpressed and apathetic until the full story of the part the Second Division had played came out several days later.

Then they went wild. From the channel ports to the remotest villages the news ran like a prairie fire. The Americans had stopped the boche—they had beaten him. In the darkest hour, just when it seemed that Hindenburg had opened a road to Paris and picked German divisions were developing the success, the Americans had smashed into them, and fighting in their own way, in the open, they had thrown back superior numbers, wresting from them positions that were essential to further advance. And they were holding those positions. Beating off all counterattacks they had reestablished the broken line.

Vive l'Amerique! The French let out a yell, gave a hitch to their braces, and went into the fray with fresh ardor. After all their disappointment their ally could fight! Not only could he fight, he was a bearcat at fighting; he asked nothing better than a tough job. That was the great, outstanding fact to the poilu. And suddenly, too, this ally began pouring men into France by the hundreds of thousands, until all the villages and valleys and roads were choked with stalwarts in khaki, and every passing train showed them grinning cheerfully through the windows. Instantly the whole French Nation rose to a frenzy of enthusiasm. Six months ago American popularity had fallen to low ebb; to the soldiery the overseas force were "Boy Scouts"; the French had grown to feel that America in the war threatened to prolong it without lifting any of the burden.

The First American Division was holding a portion of the Montdidier front. It was certainly a he sector; I was up there with them, and I know. What the communiques described as fairly active artillery fire took its toll of dead and wounded by day and by night. Now, holding the line under constant shelling is the toughest work soldiers have to do. The sum total of losses over a period of a month will usually exceed those suffered in a heavy attack, and the strain on the nerves is tenfold greater. This staunch old division, which has been the keystone of this man's army, naturally expected to be relieved. They had taken Cantigny by an assault that was a gem of precision, and had stubbornly held it gainst bombardment and counterattacks. Therefore it cheered them mightily when it was whispered that the Second Division was behind and would shortly take over. Officers from the Second even came up to make a reconnaissance, a step preliminary to a relief. Then the situation to the southeast became critical. The boche offensive was sweeping forward. His original intention had been to advance his front only as far as Fismes, on the Rheims-Soissons line, but success in the center so greatly exceeded expectations that the German command decided to develop it into a push for Paris, and swiftly threw an enormous mass of men into the breach. Already they were in Chateau-Thierry. Unless the enemy was speedily stopped the capital would be brought under his guns. And then what? In this emergency it became a question of what reserves to employ. The French generalissimo decided to send an American division.

The Second Division expected to move. They didn't know where, but they sensed a fight. The first orders were to break out at 6 o'clock on May 29, so they made all ready. Then they were to leave at 10 o'clock. Next came word that the start would not be made until the morning, so they bivouacked that night. It was 4 o'clock on the morning of May 30 when they climbed into their trucks and headed for the great battle. The men were jubilant. They had enjoyed a fine rest, in a fat land of green trees and fields of yellowing grain and burnt-almond-colored clover—a fair, quiet land of beautiful chateaux and well-ordered villages, of rich pastures grazed by sleek cattle. A considerable number of the men had been evacuated with grippe, but they were in first-class shape, and up on their toes for a whack at Heinie. Hadn't most of them been doing police work and construction jobs and other such things along lines of communication most of the time since arrival in France? They had. But now they had the chance to show what was in them! The long caravan of trucks took a route that brought them very close to Paris. In every town and village they threaded the people ran out to huzza and shower them with flowers. The population of this region had never seen American soldiers in any numbers, and here were camions pouring through the streets hour after hour, all loaded to the guards with big, husky, rollicking men in khaki, who laughed and joked with them and stuck flowers in their buttonholes, and behaved for all the world as though bound on a picnic. And with them went guns and horses and mules and machine-gun carts beyond count.

The inhabitants guessed what all this activity meant—the Americans were going into battle. So they came running from their houses to run beside the trucks. Old grandfathers saluted and waved their hats; women threw roses or kept pace beside the wheels to talk and wish them "bonne chance"; the children scrambled wildly everywhere, shrilling "Vive l'Amerique!" half frantic with joy. It was a long, hard trip. Just before reaching Meaux they encountered the first of the refugees. Beyond that, from Meaux northward, the roads were crawling with them—an unbroken stream of heaped carts and plodding peasants, of bleating sheep, and swaying, rumbling cattle, weary unto death.

They saw toothless, doddering octogenarians in that line, and also babes at the breast. They saw there bedraggled, tear-stained mothers and strapping, broad-backed girls, sullen from fatigue and hate. Men long past the prime of life urged the tired horses forward, their women and children either perched amid the mass of mattresses and bedding and chairs and mirrors, of bird cages and rabbit hutches, of crucifixes and plaster figures of Our Lady, with which the carts were piled, or trudged along in the dust with the family dog and the cow. Some of the children wailed; some took it as an adventure. The very old just rocked in the carts, silently rumpling and rumpling their aprons. Up the road came the men, camion after camion, mile on mile. They passed this saddest of all processions under a pall of dust. The refugees stared at them apathetically, without enthusiasm, apparently without interest. They were sunk in the lethargy of despair. What did it mean to them now that soldiers from beyond the seas were going into the maelstrom up there? All was lost—homes, property, everything made precious by a lifetime's association.

THE REAL STORY OF CHATEAU-THIERRY.

The bulk of the division were in the trucks fully 30 hours. Some battalions lost their means of transportation while still far from the front, and had to bike it; but the American soldier has grown hardened to that. They reached some little towns behind the battle front at last and bivouacked. For bedding they had ponchos and one blanket to a man. The nights were cold, but that was nothing new to them. The men could hear the artillery booming in the distance like a heavy surf, and in the darkest hours of the night boche avions came droning overhead to drop bombs on adjacent villages. Yet the noise of battle was less than they had anticipated.

Up to this time the resistance offered to the German thrust had not been sufficiently determined to stop them. The plan of the French was to delay the enemy as long as possible by rear-guard actions until the arrival of reserves in sufficient strength to stabilize the situation. Therefore the Americans were to take up support positions on which the French would fall back, and then these positions would become a new front line. Such was the plan. "Why not stop them where they are?" inquired the American commander. Which was all very well,, but how was it to be done? The French were plainly dubious about intrusting an enterprise of such importance to what they regarded as untried troops. To be sure, a regiment of the Americans had captured Cantigny; they had shown dash and courage and tenacity; that and other divisions had some fine performances to their credit. But the Battle of Cantigny belonged to the established trench order of warfare. It had been elaborately prepared, and French staff work had contributed to its preparation. It was rehearsed under the eyes of a French general, and French tanks and flame projectors and much French artillery had contributed to the success of the attack.

But this was different. Here was open warfare, whose aspect changed from hour to hour, a style of warfare demanding the highest form of military skill and initiative. They never doubted the pluck and willingness of our men, which had been proved on numberless occasions since last November, but they did entertain serious doubts of the ability of the American staff and unit commanders to swing it, solely because no American staff had so far been permitted to undertake an operation on its own. Consequently they demurred. Their proposal was to brigade the Americans among seasoned French troops. Then the allies could exact what toll they might while falling back. "Let us fight this in our own way, and we'll stop 'em," declared the American commander. The situation was growing hazardous; a few more gains and the boche could train his heavy guns on Paris. The French general consented. The Second Division could go in as a division, fight it out in their own way—and heaven have them in its keeping.

That is another reason why the battles for Bois de Belleau and Bouresches have such tremendous significance. They were fought in American fashion, under American leadership, with American artillery and machine guns, with American staff work to direct. It was the first time strictly American methods were employed against the Hun. And you know who won, don't you?

Thus the leathernecks, the Fifth and Sixth Regiments and the Sixth Machine Gun Battalion and the Second Engineers and two regiments of infantry, the Ninth and Twenty-third Army, together with the machine guns and all the artillery of the Second Division, found themselves on the edge of battle. They moved into support positions back of the French on June 2, one battalion, the Second, Fifth Regiment Marines, on a line from Hill 142 to Les Mares Farm and Bois de Veuilly; two other battalions, the First and Second of the Sixth Regiment, from Bois de Veuilly to Triangle Farm. There one of the infantry regiments joined on. That made a front about 7 kilometers wide. Almost immediately the boches made another strong push, and the French opposing them were forced slowly back. They began to filter through the Americans, whose support positions soon became the front.

About 5 o'clock in the evening of June 4 the enemy attacked anew toward the American left, where it joined on with the French. They advanced through a wheat field in platoon columns, in perfect order, flushed with many successes, confident of victory. And then the Americans opened up. They showered the oncoming waves with shrapnel until the fields seemed to be sprouting thousands of magnificent white daisies. Machine guns and rifle fire raked the German ranks. The leathernecks took careful aim before every shot. Unhurried, unflustered, they worked their weapons as though on the target range. French observers were amazed; they had never seen such rifle shooting. That soldiers should sight carefully in the heat of battle was something new in European warfare, where the rifle has grown to be something on which to stick a bayonet.

No troops could stand against that fire. The boches wavered, came on again. Why lie about the enemy? In mass formation they fight like brave men, none better. Twice they hesitated, stopped; twice they resumed the advance. Then they broke. They broke and started to crawl off through the standing grain. The Americans could see the wheat sway as though stirred by a stiff breeze, and they whipped those areas with bullets. What the leathernecks have they hold. That night their positions were intact, so they decided to improve them. They pushed out small posts. Followed several days and nights of heavy bombardment. Sleep was out of the question, and they had nothing to eat but "monkey meat," as they called the tinned, stringy Argentine beef, and bread and water. Not once during all the punishing work that followed did this battalion have a hot meal.

The situation was still precarious. The necessary withdrawal of the French had led to the abandonment of strong points, whose possession by the boches threatened our entire line. Heinie held Bouresches and the Bois de Belleau; he also had several mounts, which he used for machine-gun strongholds. Among them was Hill 165. On June 5 the Americans charged the position. They put the guns out of action, and then the boches counterattacked. They were beaten off. The American line now ran through the Bussiares Wood and along the edge of the Bois de Belleau. Next day came orders to move forward and take Bois de Belleau and the town of Bouresches, in order to run a straight line to Triangle Farm, where the command was dubious of the salient which existed.

The Bois is probably named after the town of Belleau. It stands on high ground, a jungle of trees and underbrush covering rocks and deep fissures. Somebody formerly used it for a game estate, for there is a hunting lodge in the northern corner of the wood—or there was. The artillery has probably torn it to shreds ere this.

Estimates are that fully a thousand boches occupied this fastness, and hundreds of machine guns were placed amid the rocks, up in trees, behind the piles of cut wood, in ditches and crevasses. The strength of the position was greatly underrated before our attacks were launched. Neither the number of machine-gun nests nor of enemy infantry was suspected, and the first assaults on the Bois did not succeed. Only one platoon, under Second Lieut. L. F. Timmerman, jr., succeeded in gaining the wood. Timmerman is a mere boy in years, but he dauntlessly advanced his small command beyond all other elements at this point, and led them in a bayonet charge against a stronghold. The enemy outnumbered them about 2 to 1, but they captured 2 guns and 17 prisoners. North of the Bois the Americans encountered a stiff resistance. Twenty boche machine guns were mounted on a plateau, and they turned a deluge of fire upon the attackers. Our men were held up. They took cover where they could find it and sent back word to the artillery to blow the plateau into kingdom come. The artillery did so. They did a beautiful job. When the Americans gained the crest by a swift dash it was to find the position destroyed and its defenders wiped out. But they were still outside the wood.

A CHORUS OF 200 GUNS.

Save for these small gains, the first operations against the Bois yielded no results. The Americans renewed the attempt next day, only to find their path barred by apparently impregnable machine-gun nests. During 48 hours they attacked and retreated, employing rifles and grenades. One company—the Eighty-second—lost all its officers; Maj. B. W. Sibley and Lieut. Bellamy reorganized it and charged under a hot fire. All to no avail. The troops were finally pulled out and 50 batteries of artillery got the word to wipe Bois de Belleau from the map. "Fini for that place," they promised, and turned loose a chorus of 200 guns. They pummeled it mercilessly, with such success that a small force of our troops was able to clean up a corner of the wood without much loss. But we are running ahead of the story. We left the Americans headed for Bouresches. Here they had better fortune; they took the town. It was a beautiful, sunny day. The air was sparkling. Millions of poppies flared amid the grain; the fields glowed like gorgeous crimson carpets. A short bombardment preceded the attack. Our artillery pounded Bouresches furiously with heavies and light stuff, and then a company of leathernecks—Ninety-sixth Company, Sixth Regiment—went forward in platoon waves, with companies of infantry on their flanks. These waves were made up of 12 men each at 5-yard intervals, with about 60 feet between waves. Automatic-rifle men and hand grenadiers composed the first and third; the second and fourth were made up of rifle grenadiers and riflemen.

Mark this: It was the American style of fighting throughout. There was no slow walk behind a curtain of fire, which is the regulation method of attack in trench warfare; the men had no barrage to screen them. They advanced by short rushes. A quick dash, and then down on the ground for cover—the sort of thing our soldiers have been taught for generations. They had to cross a little valley and a wheat field. A 3-inch gun and scores of machine guns immediately opened a withering fire on them. Men were dropping fast, but about 25 penetrated into the town. Then ensued one of the fiercest struggles of the entire series in this sector. The boches had machine guns planted at every coign of vantage—in the doors of cellars, on roofs, behind piles of débris. The leathernecks went after them; they went after them with grenades and rifle fire and the bayonet. They cleaned up the town and sent back word that Bouresches was in their hands, with the exception of the railroad station in a hollow beyond.

GO-GETTERS IN THE FIGHT.

It now became necessary to consolidate the captured positions and to get relief to the sorely pushed fore holding them. Another company was sent forward, which arrived in Bouresches about 9.45 at night. With them went two companies of Engineers, who showed themselves equally good at digging in or fighting. They did magnificent work.

The next thing was to replenish the ammunition supply. Second Lieut. William B. Moore, a former Princeton athlete, and Sergt. Maj. John H. Quick, medal-of-honor man, a veteran who has always been in the thick of every trouble he could reach, volunteered to take a truck load into the town. With 20 soldiers for escort they started. The road was pitted with shell holes, swept by artillery and machine-gun fire. Yet, despite the fact that they were in full view of the boches, the party carried their precious cargo into Bouresches without loss.

So much for Bouresches. They had not yet won Belleau Wood. It proved to be a much harder nut to crack. The task was given to a battalion which went in with 958 combat men and 26 officers, and they came out with 7 officers and 340 men. That tells the tale of itself—but they held the Wood. I have mentioned above how they captured a fine jumping-off place on June 6, consisting of a ridge in front of the Bois. Between them and the enemy was a stretch of fields, dotted with clumps of bushes; there was a considerable area of high wheat at their left. Poppies everywhere, flaming crimson in the sun. "We'll smash Bois de Belleau to smithereens!" the Artillery promised. "By the time we get through with it there will not be a blade of grass left." So at it they went. They pounded the position for a solid hour with 50 batteries, both heavies and light. The Bois became a crashing, thundering inferno. Yet it was not wiped out, not by a long shot. The leathernecks discovered that it still held not only quite a few blades of grass but also plenty of trees and woodpiles and boche machine guns and boche infantry.

CHARGING THROUGH THE POPPIES.

The moment arrived. They charged across the fields, all among the flaring poppies. A perfect hurricane of fire greeted them. Numbers of the enemy had got inside our barrage with machine guns and worked them with disastrous effect on the advancing waves. But the leathernecks had orders to take the Bois, and they were going to take it. They rushed the machine guns and put them out of action; they bombed and bayoneted and killed the gunners. And now they were on the edge of the wood. One ear-splitting yell and they plunged into it. After that it was plain Indian fighting, with this difference, they had machine guns and grenades and such other modern improvements on the musket and the knife.

The Bois was a trackless jungle. Nobody knew what he would strike back of the next tree, and a woodpile, a crag, or a crevasse in the ground might hold sudden death. Therefore the leathernecks advanced as the forefathers of our Nation did against the redskin—from tree to tree, from rock to rock, now pausing to shoot, now dashing upon an enemy group to bayonet them. It was practically every man for himself, or, rather, each group for itself. In that impenetrable fastness it became impossible for officers to maintain touch with all the elements of their commands, so that the battle developed into a duel between individual initiative and carefully prepared defense—between American aggressiveness and German discipline.

There wasn't much discipline left among the boches when the leathernecks got close to them. They stuck to their guns pretty well so long as their elements remained intact. Just so long as they thought they had the advantage and could beat off the Americans they fought furiously. They showed here, as on innumerable occasions, that no troops in the world excel them in mass prowess. But the minute a group found itself isolated, with a bunch of red-necked Americans charging full toward them with bayonets at the poise, they wilted. Up went their hands. They came tumbling out of their shelters and holes bleating "Kamerad." That has been their record in nearly every fight, and seems to be typical of the breed; they fight like wolves—all together or not at all.

Numbers of them played 'possum. They dropped to the ground and pretended to be dead, and then when the Americans had swept past they rose and hurled hand grenades at them. The ruse swelled the boches' casualties amazingly; our men don't take prisoners of that kind.

I know of only one instance of a boche standing up to the bayonet. Nearly all of them broke and fled at the first sight of the steel. But there was one who was made of sterner stuff.

A leatherneck rushed at a German with the bayonet and the latter stood his ground. For a few minutes the two men fought desperately, straining every muscle. The American tried several thrusts; they were parried; he lunged and missed. Then, impatient of the delay, he abruptly shifted and swung the butt, crushing his adversary's skull.

It took some tall fighting, but they swept the enemy from Bois de Belleau. Belleau means "beautiful water." But the men of the Second Division have another name for the place. To them it will always be Hellwood. The boys tell me that scores of the enemy ran away with scarcely any clothes on. Some took off their boots and fled in their socks; why I don't know, unless they thought it would improve their speed.

You ought to see the booty now in possession of individual leathernecks. They've got some souvenirs that no bank in Wall Street could buy. In the collection are all sorts of articles stolen by the boches from the French civilians, and trinkets and cigarettes taken off British captives in a previous offensive. The boches had hidden amid their belongings old-fashioned frock coats, plug hats, women's dresses, babies' shoes, silverware, clocks, English watches, and French paper money—all of it pilfered.

Well, they dug themselves in and stayed there and fought off the enemy's counterattack for five days before being relieved. They were constantly shelled and gassed, but they stayed there. A 50-millimeter gun, which they dubbed "Quick Dick," played on them with direct fire, but they stuck it out. Quick Dick was located only about 600 yards distant, on the side of a ridge, and he earned his name because the shells exploded almost before the Americans heard the discharge of the piece. Boche avions came over Bouresches and the Bois at night and dropped bombs on the defenders, but they stayed there. The enemy tried to filter in on their left through the wheat fields, but they beat him off. And all the time they were living on "monkey" and bread and cold water, and not much of that. Not one hot meal did they get. All the while they went without sleep; between May 30 and June 18 hardly a man removed his clothes or his shoes.

Of a detail of 45 men sent back for chow, only 3 returned; the others were put out by shells, machine guns, or gas. Another detail of 30 was dispatched for ammunition; 6 came back. The carrying parties for wood and water fared almost as badly, and the wounded had to be gotten out under the same punishment. But the leathernecks stayed there. What they have they hold. The commander of this battalion tried new tactics to secure prisoners and weaken boche resistance. Convinced that the enemy had been fed by their command with stories of the brutal deaths they might expect should the Americans take them prisoners, on the theory that men who believe that would rather fight than surrender, he sent out soldiers from his command in the dark hours of the night to shout to the Germans in their own language that they would be spared and treated humanely if they gave themselves up.

Quite a number of the enemy accepted the invitation. One American soldier came in with 65 prisoners, who had voluntarily left their own lines to surrender. Another battalion commander was not so successful in this ruse. A few of the enemy came in, but others only pretended to give up, and then, when the Americans advanced to take them prisoners, opened fire. And what had become of all the inhabitants of this hell-swept area? The majority had fled, but I can tell you of the fate of two of them.

On the night of June 6 a company of leathernecks found an ancient couple still living on a small farm near Montgivrault Grand. It was the date of the attack on Bouresches; there was heavy fighting all over that region, and the shelling was terrific.

Both had long passed the allotted span of threescore and ten. They were feeble and doddering, but they would not leave their home. Though death threatened them every minute, they preferred it to facing an unknown world penniless and without friends. So they stayed. The soldiers fed them as best they could and tried to provide for their safety, but they themselves were on their move into battle. Consequently they were obliged to leave them behind when they passed on. On their return some days later nobody was about the place. They hunted and hunted; they shouted. No response; the farm was deserted. They never saw the old man again. He had disappeared. But they found the poor old grandmother. She had hanged herself with a ribbon to a rafter, and they buried her reverently, those battle-weary soldiers, there beside the home she would not leave. That's war.

WITH ODDS OF FIVE TO ONE.

The American division was opposed at all times by two German divisions and sometimes by three. The boches had the One hundred and ninety-seventh, the Two hundred and thirty-seventh, and the Tenth in the line when our troops relieved the French. Before a week elapsed they were so badly cut up that the German command was obliged to throw in the Twenty-eighth and the crack Fifth Guards Division, both of which had been in training for the offensive in the vicinity of Noyon, but had to be diverted to this sector. It was an unconscious tribute to the Americans that the division which crossed the Marne first in 1914 should have been chosen to "stop them," and guards had strict orders that the Americans must not succeed at any cost. But a short while later the Twenty-eighth were asking for relief, and the guards had their fill.

To have used up five enemy divisions is a pretty fair contribution to the great battle for one American division. "These Americans," remarked the general in command of the French corps—"these Americans are peculiar. They always want to do a thing their own way. All you have to do is to tell them what you want—not how it should be done—and they'll do it."

As for the boche command, it was obliged to belittle the American effort in order to continue the hoodwinking of the German people, which has been led to believe that we are negligible as a military factor. Therefore, they made light of our achievements, reporting severe repulses of the Americans. But a well-known German newspaper let the cat out of the bag. After deriding our men as soldiers, it naïvely concluded: "Furthermore, one is forced to the conclusion that the attack by the Americans was made only under French command, for alone they would not be intrusted with such a hard task. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the Americans there—probably one division—did not make this attempt alone, but were put in among the French front line."

That is the enemy estimate. Among the allies there are those who say merely that the Americans performed well in a series of hot local engagements—and there are those who say that the American division saved Paris, just as the Canadians long ago saved Calais.

The testimony of the civilian population of the region that lay between the boches and the capital is significant. In a letter to the commanding officer of the American forces on the Marne the mayors of Meaux and the neighboring districts said:

"The civilian population will never forget that, beginning in the month of June, when their homes were threatened by the invader, the Second Division victoriously stepped forth and succeeded in saving them from the impending danger. The mayors who were eyewitnesses of the generous and efficacious deeds of the American Army in stopping the enemy advance send this heartfelt expression of their admiration and gratitude. Let us leave it at that."

FOLLOWING THE TANKS TO ST. MIHIEL.

[By Philip Payne. Mr. Payne was a correspondent for months on the western front. He was an eyewitness to the battle he here describes.] (Published by permission of Treat 'Em Rough Magazine.)

It had been called No Man's Land for the past four years.

On one side of the barren waste the French had crouched for months and months, fighting with stubborn fury to keep the Germans from grasping more of the precious soil of France. They had succeeded, and the campaign in that fair sector of the land had resulted in a stalemate.

The Germans were on the other side of the devastated area, an area where the shattering shells had taken the place of the peasants' plows which had tilled the soil for centuries.

With all the thoroughness that characterizes the Teuton, a wonderful system of defenses had been constructed in that sector. Several hundred yards in front of the German trenches there were entanglements of barbed wire; sharp-pointed steel stakes; trip wires, which would explode mines when touched by the foot of man; and last, but by no means least, concrete "pill boxes," with solid walls from 3 to 5 feet thick, and with slits in them through which a stream of bullets could spray death into the ranks of any so foolish as to try and break through.

Back of the first line of German trenches came more of the obstructions I have just described. Behind all this system of defense, a system that was considered by its makers to be absolutely impregnable, was one of the fairest parts of France. For four long years, since the Prussian hordes had started to goose step across Europe on the march that was to have made the world bow to kultur, this soil had been in alien hands. The very thought made the French warriors boil with anger. The homes of many of those poilus were in German hands. Often they gazed across that span of land. They longed for the day when they would get the order to attack, but that day was a long time coming. Foch had looked over the land and knew that he did not have the men to sacrifice to regain it.

A GIGANTIC STEEL WEDGE.

Like a gigantic steel wedge, part of the German Army was thrust into the side of bleeding France. St. Mihiel, Hattonchatel, Vigneulles, and scores of other prosperous places were occupied by the hated enemy. From grim old Mont Sec, on one side of the wedge, the Germans looked down on the forces of the allies. On Mont Sec the French had sacrifived 15,000 lives in 1914 to hold back the German avalanche. It was commonly reported that the mountain had been made into a second Gibraltar by the enemy.

When the latter part of the summer of last year approached, Hindenburg and his aides found need in other areas for some of the divisions that had been confronting the French in that sector between Toul and Verdun. The Prussian chieftain had absolute confidence in the system of defenses he had planned. He knew that Foch had investigated and had decided it would cost too many human lives to cross the barren belt. He left it to the care of about three German divisions, which were supported by a large number of Austrians. Hindenburg was sure the French would not attempt an attack. He was right—the French wouldn't, but the Americans would.

In August, when most of the French pulled out under cover of night from the St. Mihiel sector, the Americans went in there. It was a "quiet sector," they were told—a place where the men of the First, Second, Forty-second, and Twenty-sixth Divisions could get a much-needed rest after the struggle they had been through at Chateau-Thierry and on the Ourcq and Vesle Rivers.

The doughboys in those crack shock-troop divisions were told they were being sent there for a rest. Down in their hearts those fighting Yanks knew better. "Any time they send us any place there's goin' to be sumthin' doin'; I'll say so," said a doughboy with the marking of the First Division on his shoulder. Mr. Doughboy had guessed right.

Gens. Pershing, Petain, and Foch had looked over that land again; and they'd decided the time had come to take it back to the bosom of France.

DAME RUMOR A BUSY PERSON.

Dame Rumor is a busy person in France, or she was in the days when Le Guerre raged. The cafés and boulevards of Paris heard that the Americans were going to start the grand offensive near Toul. A month before the drive started Paris had heard of huge American cannon which would drop shells into Metz. Oui, la, la, the Americans were going to give the boche a taste of what Paris had suffered when the "Big Bertha" bombarded that city daily. Paris liked the reports of the proposed American offensive. In the cafés and on the boulevards, where Louis and Gaston gathered to sip their vin blanc, they mouthed over the reports. Les Americains have a million soldiers there; 5,000 aeroplanes and hundreds of big guns, said the rumor mongers. Paris listened and believed. Since Chateau-Thierry and the Bois de Belleau Paris would believe anything about the Americans. Nothing was impossible with those wild Yanks.

In France there were many German spies. They heard these rumors. Some American officers on leave in the French capital talked a little; perhaps more than they should have. The spies gleaned a few facts. Reports got back through devious channels to Hindenburg and the other leaders. Hindenburg had confidence in his defense system in the St. Mihiel sector. Pooh! Those verdamnt Yankees could never break through there. To make sure, however, he sent two more German divisions down there. August faded away and September came, and still no drive had started. Paris began to scoff at the rumor mongers. Rains—miserable, drizzling rains of the ground-soaking type—began to fall steadily. Hindenburg's henchmen brought to him more reports of activity behind the American lines, but the Prussian war chief scoffed. The Americans couldn't start any drive in that sort of weather. It would be impossible to move the artillery. He needed all the men he could get, so he started to move the two divisions back to a more active sector.

WHEN HELL BROKE LOOSE.

Then, shortly after midnight, September 11, hell broke loose—hell in the form of some 2,500 pieces of artillery which the Americans and French had placed along the St. Mihiel sector. At 5.20 on the morning of September 12 the Americans went over the top. That night Paris was electrified by the published report that the Yanks had gone through the "impregnable" boche defenses and were sweeping on to St. Mihiel. Already scores of French villages were in the hands of "Les Americains." All France heard the glad news the next morning. Reports came back that the American losses were astonishingly light. France wondered how even those Yanks had taken that ground so quickly with the sacrifice of so few lives.

THE TANKS WERE THE ANSWER.

Under cover of darkness the unwieldly steel-clad monsters had been brought up to a position near the front lines.

When the barrage—a barrage that was described as one of the most wonderful ever laid—was lifted that eventful September morn, the tanks lumbered into action, and 50 yards behind the lumbering leviathans the doughboys swept on.

Even at this late day Gen. Pershing has not revealed the number of tanks that took part in that drive. From personal observation I should think that each battalion of infantry had 8 of the machines assigned to it. With a total of about 10 Yankee divisions taking part in the drive, and about half that number in action while the others were in support, I should judge that at least 360 of the big tanks and scores of the baby variety were used.

Over these elaborate defenses the tanks crunched their way, leaving in their wakes masses of tangled barbed wire; sharp steel stakes driven into the mud instead of into human flesh, and the mines attached to the trip wires exploded with slight damage before the infantrymen reached them. And the pill boxes on which Hindenburg placed so much faith—what of them? The tanks had swept right up to them and wiped their crews out of existence. Some of the professional gloom dispensers, without which no army is complete, argued that the operation of the tanks would not have been so successful in the St. Mihiel sector if the Germans had not failed to back their outer defense system up by more artillery.

Be that as it may, the tanks were successful there. Army men who know what they are talking about told me that the tanks saved at least 10,000 American lives when they brushed aside or, to use a better expression, trampled down the Prussian obstructions.

DEFENSES LITERALLY PULVERIZED.

The day after our tanks and Infantry had made "no man's land" some man's land again, I walked over the ground. I was amazed at the multitude of defenses the Germans had prepared, and still more amazed at the manner in which the Yanks had gone through. Barbed wire, trip wires, steel stakes, and concreted trenches seemed to have been literally pulverized.

I do not believe official figures have been given out to show the exact number of American casualties in the St. Mihiel drive. From what I was able to learn on the field there I do not believe that more than a thousand American lives were sacrificed. I dread to think of what the toll would have been but for the tanks. Don't think that the men of the tanks did all of the "treat 'em rough" stuff there. Very distinctly I remember seeing two tanks lying where they had been struck by 77's. The boche gunners had scored direct hits in those two particular cases, and twisted masses of steel were all that remained of those tanks.

On another occasion I was driving one of H. Ford's well-known brand of machines over a road that had been laid through a swamp. A tank had slid off the edge of that road into the swamp, and for once the caterpillars couldn't pull it out. The members of the crew were using language that wasn't exactly nice.

I drove the flivver over to the edge of the road and looked at the tank and its crew for a moment. Then I said, "Do you fellows want me to tow you out?"

Immediately I was extended an invitation to go to a place where woolen underwear is not needed. But to get back to the more serious part. All America knows now that Mount Sec fell on the second day of the St. Mihiel drive. As rumor had reported it, the doughboys who swarmed up its sides found the place a veritable Gibraltar.

How, then, did it get captured so quickly, you ask?

Simply because the tanks had smashed the defenses in front of it and on either flank—defenses which were as elaborate as I described in an earlier part of this story. The main force of Germans had to withdraw from the mountain or be surrounded and have to stand siege. They knew the latter step would mean capture in the end, so the majority escaped and left a handful to hold the heights.

By kind permission of Maj. Greene, Three hundred and second Engineers, I am permitted to publish these letters:

PRAISE SPURRED THE GALLANT SEVENTY-SEVENTH—MAJ. F. S. GREENE SAYS MORE CREDIT AND LESS CENSURE CARRIED DIVISION OVER "IMPOSSIBLE" DRIVE TO SEDAN.

SPIRIT DROPPING OFF.

The Seventy-seventh, I believe, was always a little above the average. We were well disciplined and a well-drilled outfit when we left Camp Upton, but during our training period with the British I fancied that I detected a slight falling off in the spirit of the men. While in the Baccarat sector I became convinced of this, and looking for a reason I realized that since leaving the States the division as a whole had not received one word in orders that might be construed as a compliment.

Note that this applies to the entire division, not to the Engineer Regiment. When we took over the Vesle sector I believe our spirit—I will not say morale—was at its lowest. We had been worked hard from the moment of landing on French soil; we had done both ill and well; always when a mistake had been made the division heard of it in strong words; silence only followed our good work. This state of affairs continued for about two weeks after our arrival on the Vesle.

During this time we had been in two "shows," as the English put it, and had suffered heavy casualties. Then there came a marked change as sharp as it was sudden. We advanced, and an order was published commending the conduct of the men. Immediately the spirits of the division rose and when a further advance was ordered the boys went about the dangerous business with a dash that was new to us.

FACED BATTLE CHEERFULLY.

Again their work was commended, and again the men showed instant response. So it continued, whenever possible a word of praise—when censure was necessary it was given in moderation—until by the time we had reached the Argonne the boys were ready and anxious to undertake any task that might be demanded.

Their push through the Argonne Forest, considered next to the impossible by the French, has become historical, and before many days the second phase of that offensive—the drive from Grandpre on the Aire to Sedan on the Meuse—will be recognized as one of the great offensives of this war. The endurance, the privations, the dangers that the boys of the Seventy-seventh faced cheerfully during this drive can not be exaggerated. Every yard of that advance was resisted by an enemy who has no equal in rear guard warfare, no superiors in the handling of machine guns and artillery.

I had time to study the second phase of this drive, an opportunity to get a bird's-eye view of the entire engagement, for while I did not rejoin my regiment until a few hours after hostilities had ceased I rode over the field from the starting point to the finish. I know how difficult was the terrain for making an advance and what meager cover it afforded for the men.

LEADERSHIP WON BATTLE.

As the shell-scarred miles of that advance slipped past me and I saw the uncounted numbers of wrecked trucks, limbers, and guns, the sad total of dead, both horses and men, my wonder grew at the speed and the fortitude our boys had shown. Only a gallant, dashing body of troops could have done it, troops animated by the highest spirit and by absolute confidence.

It would have been an impossible task for soldiers whose morale had, day after day, been lowered by a constant stream of criticism. What had brought about this remarkable change in our men? What had made this drive possible? There is but one answer: Leadership, leadership in which they had confidence, under a commander whom they respected and admired. The name of this leader is Gen. Robert Alexander, who took over the division on the Vesle and who, by his ability as a leader wrought such a remarkable change in every unit of his command.

This man has erased the words "Fall back!" and "Retreat!" from his copy of the drill regulations and has written the word "Forward!" in their places. When an objective is to be reached he spares neither animal nor man, officer nor soldier, but neither does he spare himself. He is always on the go; one is likely to meet him anywhere at any time during the day or night, anywhere except at the rear.

ALEXANDER SET EXAMPLE.

It was the example he set, his utter disregard of either personal comfort or danger, as well as his words of praise that put the dash into his men. He says he is proud to be in the division and every officer and man in it will tell you that we are proud to have Gen. Alexander as our commander.

We are a lucky outfit, for one of the first moves the General made was to appoint Col. C. O. Sherrill as his chief of staff, another sign of his gift of leadership, for he hit upon the right man for that difficult job. They made a rare combination. Both are drivers, both are optimistic in face of the most adverse circumstances, and between them they will send, or I hope lead, a division home that New York has every right to be proud of. "An organization is what its head makes it," and Gen. Alexander has made the Seventy-seventh Division.

Another letter of Maj. Frederick S. Greene, dated "In a famous forest, October 6":

When the record of this war is finally written I believe that this division will be noted for the number of precedents it has set in military tactics. Hardly a day passes that we do not succeed in doing something that the day before a military expert would have pronounced impossible.

The night before our initial attack in this sector I talked with one of the cleverest French officers I have yet met. When asked what he thought of our chances of driving the boche out of his wonderfully strong position—a position he took up four years ago and has improved steadily ever since—this captain shrugged his shoulders doubtfully.

"It will be difficult," was his answer, given in a tone and manner clearly showing that he really meant impossible when he used the word "difficult." By noon the next day, just five hours after our boys "went over," the enemy was 3 kilometers behind his network of trenches and going well. And what a 3 kilometers those were. Heavy forest, with dense underbrush covering the ground, and terrain just one deep ravine after another, separated by ridges whose slopes stand nearly vertical. When you consider the strength of those trenches, the profile of the ground, the denseness of the underbrush, and remember that that drive was made by men who, before going to Camp Upton, had seen no trees except in Central Park—this may be put down as precedent No. 1.

The second day after the attack our flank was considerably bothered by a string of machine-gun snipers. A major of Artillery, who hails from Yonkers, sought and secured permission to take a 155-millimeter howitzer out to the front and "plow up the landscape." He brought it up over one of the worst roads that ever crossed a torn and shredded no man's land. It slid into a crater—of course, it was raining, and the mud was knee deep. I put an entire company of Engineers at his disposal and hauled it out after two hours' hard work, and that huge gun was finally parked right on the front line. That is precedent enough, but the story goes further.

The gun was really out of our sector, there being no roads at all for us, and the division on our left fell back during the night, with the result that by morning there was our 6-inch gun complacently resting in the very middle of no man's land. That major from Yonkers, using his head, had taken a platoon out with him to protect his gun in the event of just such an emergency. So the major and his gun did not fall back with the troops about him; instead, he got into action, fired 110 rounds of that heavy stuff at our friends the snipers, and drove them off. Then he waited for the Infantry to come up again. The boche were so amazed at this unheard of proceeding that they hurried an aeroplane over to see if it could really be true. Jerry came, and for once in his life flew low, astonishment making him reckless; then he dropped a bomb harmlessly a hundred yards from the gun and flew back to tell the Kaiser about precedent No. 2.

But by far the most remarkable precedent was established by the commanding general of one of our brigades. A battalion had been cut off and surrounded by the boche; their position was desperate, and it looked any odds that they would either have to surrender or be exterminated. I fancy some account of this battalion's four days and six nights in the woods will be published in the States before this reaches you, but there is one side-light or spot-light incident that may escape the notice it deserves. This general was ordered to send out a second battalion, which was to endeavor to cut its way through and rescue the surrounded one. Instead of sending out this relief, the general took it out, assuming direct command himself and marching at the head of his small party, for a battalion these days does not measure 750 men. Straight to the front he took his men, crossing one cliff and climbing down in the ravine beyond, every foot of the journey a fight against nature and most of the march a fight against the enemy, who used every weapon he had—gas, rifle and machine-gun fire, hand grenades, and Austrian 77s.

The general put up the hardest counter fight any man could, but the wire underbrush and machine guns proved too great a resistance for his party to overcome, and he was forced to return.

Any other man would have called the attempt a day's work, but not this general. He assembled a fresh battalion, or rather a part of a battalion, and started out once more, but again was forced, on account of casualties, to retire. I am not allowed to mention the number of casualties, but I can say that on both these trips the general lost over 30 per cent of his men in killed and wounded.

I was at his headquarters shortly after his return from the second expedition. He was tired, worn, but not downhearted, and it was under his direction that a party working in on the right flank finally reached and rescued the cut-off battalion.

Why the general was not killed is only due to the luck that follows the brave. His clothing was clipped by bullets more than once and shell splinters whizzed close by his head time and time again.

The act of this general has had a wonderful moral effect upon his men. It was a desperate undertaking, as any man who took part in it knew. I asked one soldier how he got through.

"I can never tell you, sir. We just said to ourselves if our general can take such a hell of a chance, I guess we can, and we went ahead." And how the news spread! Every man in the brigade was proud of that act. You could hear such remarks as, "Hear what our general did? He went out to the line just like any lieutenant, took things just like the men did, and got away with it. Some general, eh?"

I wish I could tell you that general's name, but I may say he was born in Brooklyn and is well known to most New Yorkers, and that he was the most prominent figure at Camp Upton when, and a few months before, we left there.

When we have a general who, knowing the necessity, cheerfully undertakes the duties and dangers of a second lieutenant, I think that the Metropolitan Division should change its name to the Precedent Division.

THE RIVERS OF FRANCE.

[By H. J. M.]

The rivers of France are ten score and twain,
But five are the names that we know.
The Marne, the Vesle, the Ourcq, and the Aisne
And the Somme of the swampy flow.

The rivers of France, from source to the sea,
Are nourished by many a rill,
But these five, if ever a drought there be,
The fountains of sorrow would fill.

The rivers of France shine silvery white,
But the waters of five are red
With the richest blood in the fiercest fight
For freedom, that ever was shed.

Five rivers of France, see their names are writ
On a banner of crimson and gold,
And the glory of those who fashioned it
Shall nevermore cease to be told.

The Seventy-seventh Division.

OF
HON. ISAAC SIEGEL,
OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 25, 1919.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, the story of the Rainbow Division, which included the Sixty-ninth Regiment of New York National Guard, now known as the One hundred and sixty-fifth Infantry, has been so well described by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], on February 12 last, that one could hardly excel it.

The story of the Twenty-seventh Division has been told at great length by the senior Senator from New York, Senator WADSWORTH, and now the story of the Seventy-seventh Division, which was made up from boys who were drafted in the city of New York, is to be told. It is a record which has made every New Yorker and every American proud. This division is the only American division that fought its way through the Argonne Forest, and distinguished itself from the moment that it arrived on the other side and was given the opportunity to show its laurels.

I had the extreme pleasure of being with this division during the latter part of July last, at Baccarat. There Gen. Duncan and Maj. Wilson, both from Kentucky, and Gen. Evan M. Johnson all told me that when the time came they were certain, using that word advisedly, that the boys from New York City, who had been taken from shop, factory, office, and subway and composed of all the nationalities which make up the big cosmopolitan city of New York, would astound the world. They did astound the world in the Argonne Forest fight, and the large number of distinguished-service crosses given to the men of this division tell their own tale.

The story of the "Lost or Lone Battalion," as it has been called, is one which has already gone down into the world's history to be repeated by generations yet unborn in all the years which the Republic will endure. It is the gallantry of these men under the most trying condition and the display of such extraordinary courage at a time when the enemy surrounded them that has most thoroughly established in the minds of all who love this country that in a time of future emergency we have nothing to fear.

Both the New York World and the Brooklyn Eagle have written the story of this division. The World account is by Cyril Brown, the famous war correspondent, and, therefore, I have selected his account of what this division did. It is as follows:

HOW THE SEVENTY-SEVENTH SWEPT THE ARGONNE.

CAMP UPTON DRAFT DIVISION, ORDERED TO ATTACK REGARDLESS OF LOSSES, SMASHED GERMAN DEFENSES AND NEVER GAVE UP A POSITION ONCE OCCUPIED—THEIR WORK IN FRANCE NEARLY FINISHED AND WITH A RECORD OF PROUD ACHIEVEMENT THE SEVENTY-SEVENTH HOPE SOON TO START HOMEWARD.

[By Cyril Brown, New York World staff correspondent with the American Army of occupation.]

CHAPTER I.

FROM HOME TO BATTLEFIELD.

HEADQUARTERS SEVENTY-SEVENTH DIVISION,
CHATEAU VILLAIN,
Chaumont Training Area, January 20.

"Who won the war?" The Seventy-seventh, alias the "Liberty Division," now marking time in the mud of "sunny" France and impatient to get home, claims its full pro rata share in the division of honors, and backs up its claim with the following record:

The Seventy-seventh was the first National Army division (composed wholly of men inducted into military service by the draft boards) to reach France.

The Seventy-seventh was the first National Army division to have the responsibility for even a quiet sector thrust upon it.

The Seventy-seventh was the first National Army division ordered into an active part of the line.

The Seventy-seventh was given the post of greatest honor in the final victory offensive—the critical hinge of the Argonne Forest; and it was the only American division to fight its way through the Argonne.

The Seventy-seventh scored the greatest continuous gain, 59½ kilometers, between September 26 and November 11, in the Argonne-Meuse offensive.

This summarizes the Seventy-seventh's record. Its chronological history falls into seven distinct acts, working up to a dramatic climax, as follows:

FROM TRAINING TO TRIUMPH.

1. Camp Upton, Long Island. Raw draft recruits licked into shape and shipped to France, looking no better and no worse than any other National Army outfit.

2. In the Pas de Calais. Training behind the front under British auspices.

3. In the Baccarat sector, Lorraine. Learning the fine points from the French in a quiet front sector and then modestly trying it on the boche on its own hook.

4. On the Vesle. Inauspicious debut in a real battle; mediocre, still amateur performance.

5. Advance to the Aisne. The Seventy-seventh "comes back" and finds itself, emerging with the professional look of a combat division.

6. The Argonne Forest. The Seventy-seventh more than makes good; it earns the title of "Conquerors of the Argonne," with three congressional medals of honor thrown in.

7. The whirling finish to the Meuse. The Seventy-seventh would be going yet if it hadn't been for that armistice.

The formal opening of the Seventy-seventh Division for business dates back to August 27, 1917, when the first batches of rawest recruits arrived at Camp Upton; and, though bunches of recruits and replacements kept arriving ever after right up to the armistice, this initial outfit is voted by experts to have been the most heterogeneous assortment of unlicked civilians ever gathered under the roof of any division. It was an all-New York outfit, and included specimens of every race, creed, and class, including Chinamen and East Side gangsters. It was a typical haul of the draft law dragnet in New York City.

This miscellaneous personnel was organized into the One hundred and fifty-third Brigade, composed of the Three hundred and fifth and Three hundred and sixth Infantry Regiments; the One hundred and fifty-fourth Infantry Brigade, composed of the Three hundred and seventh and Three hundred and eighth Infantry Regiments; the One hundred and fifty-second Field Artillery Brigade, composed of the Three hundred and fourth, Three hundred and fifth, and Three hundred and sixth Field Artillery Regiments; the Three hundred and second Engineer Regiment, the Three hundred and second Sanitary Train, and the minor divisional elements.

In the course of seven months it was licked into fair average shape by its commanding general, Maj. Gen. Franklin J. Bell, and his staff and hard-working line officers, until it looked good on parade down Fifth Avenue, and, with the usual polishing and tuning up in France, looked ripe for the real test of battle.

RUSHED THROUGH ENGLAND.

After the usual rumors and false alarms the Seventy-seventh began sailing from New York March 27 under its new acting commander, Brig. Gen. Evan M. Johnson, and sailing continued until April 1. The divisional convoy collected in Halifax, whence it sailed, nine ships in line, led by an American cruiser.

After 14 days at sea the coast of Ireland looked good to these ex-New Yorkers. The division was landed in Liverpool April 12, and its acquaintance with England lasted no longer than a day. The Seventy-seventh was hustled into dinky English trains and reached Dover on the night of its landing.

Quartered in barracks in Dover for its one night in England, the division was hustled across the channel the next day, arrived in France April 13, and was billeted in alleged rest barracks at Calais, where the Seventy-seventh got its first sniff of real war—the first impression made by the sight of ruined buildings bombed by boche aviators.

At the rest camp the Seventy-seventh immediately began getting ready for business by turning in its Springfield rifles and drawing British Enfields in return, preparatory to field training under British auspices. Also the blue barrack bags, containing two outfits per man, were turned in; but gas masks and steel helmets were added to the equipment instead.

MONTH'S INTENSIVE TRAINING.

From Calais the Seventh-seventh was hustled in box cars to the vicinity of Eperlecques, in the Department of Pas de Calais, where it got together May 6 for one month's intensive training under the British Thirty-ninth Division. The command of the division was now taken over by Maj. Gen. George B. Duncan, Brig. Gen. Evan M. Johnson resuming his former command of the One hundred and fifty-fourth Infantry Brigade.

Here the Seventy-seventh became gradually acclimated to the new climate of the front, training within earshot of the heavy artillery duel at Ypres and Mount Kemmel, and being targets for the nightly boche bombing raids, which inflicted the division's first eight casualties from enemy fire.

The New York doughboys eagerly absorbed British combat methods but balked at British grub, being a repetition of jam and tea supplemented by meat for dinner and cheese for supper.

Also, the doughboys from Broadway and adjacent alleys discovered that the cost of living, as supplied by canny French peasants and shopkeepers, soared with the injection of the American soldier's pay into circulation.

Small groups of officers and noncoms of the Seventy-seventh went regularly on Cook's tours to the fighting front and came back with tall tales and much useful information, particularly about the dangers of gas. These military tourists were most impressed by the colossal amount of shell fire.

The Seventy-seventh was beginning to feel its oats when, about the middle of May, the rumor spread that the division was to be sent into line. The division now enjoyed its first hike to the trenches; but the first training turned out to be 20 kilometers (12½ miles) behind the British line.

The Seventy-seventh now spent three days in almost sleepless field maneuvers, attacking, being attacked, and counterattacking, all without casualties—all against an imaginary enemy, with plenty of real ones only 20 kilometers away. After a few days' rest the One hundred and fifty-fourth Infantry Brigade, under Brig. Gen. Evan M. Johnson, was thought good enough to be sent into the area back of Arras, where it acted the part of a super as reserve to the British Second and Forty-second Divisions. Here the brigade became acquainted with and accustomed to "enemy fire searching the back areas" and nightly air bombardments.

Much as they loved their British pals and the British Army lingo the men had picked up, the pride of New York were darned glad, for grub's sake, when orders came to take over an American sector.

June 19 found all elements of the Seventy-seventh reunited after its scattered training course and ready to jump into the Baccarat sector in Lorraine, held jointly by the Forty-second (Rainbow) Division and the Sixty-first French Division. This was also the division's first encounter with French soldiers. In relieving the Rainbow Division in the Baccarat sector, the Seventy-seventh felt particularly proud of the fact that it was the first National Army Division to take over part of the front line.

The relief of the Rainbow Division was completed between June 19 and 26, but the boche apparently knew that the boys from Broadway were coming, for, as credibly recorded, from a German captive balloon floated the message, "Goodby, Forty-second—hello, Seventy-seventh!"

"HOUSE WARMING" WITH GAS.

Those who interpreted this message as an attempt on the part of the Teuton to fraternize were wrong, for the German artillery only waited until the relief was about completed, and at 4 a. m. on June 24 the boche gave the Seventy-seventh an unwelcome housewarming with mustard and phosgene gas, particularly specializing on the most densely billeted villages of Migneville, St. Maurice, Nouviller, and Badonville, but also distributing his random favors throughout the Seventy-seventh's new front area.

The Seventy-seventh, however, took to gas like ducks to water; and as a result of approximately 3,000 rounds fired, only 180 casualties resulted, of which only 100 were due to gas and all those, as investigation revealed, were due to removing gas masks prematurely rather than to tardiness in getting them on.

The Baccarat sector, south of Strassburg, is on a line between Luneville and St. Die, and the Seventy-seventh was given the part extending from Herbeviller on the left to a point east of Badonviller on the right. The so-called La Blette, Montigny, Ste. Pole, and Badonviller subsectors were held, respectively, by the Three hundred and fifth, Three hundred and sixth, Three hundred and seventh, and Three hundred and eighth Infantry from left to right. Each of those subsectors constituted a battalion front, with one battalion lying in support and one in reserve, the battalions rotating in turn in the front line, the front-line trick averaging from a week to 10 days. An expected complimentary attack on the part of the Germans on July 4 did not materialize, though the whole division was on the qui vive.

Under French tutelage, the Seventy-seventh had made such good practive that between July 15 and 18 the Sixty-first French Division was withdrawn, leaving the Seventy-seventh in supreme and sole command of the Baccarat sector. At this time, too, the divisional artillery showed up, thus dispensing with French artillery support and making Baccarat literally an all-American sector.

The division remained in the Baccarat sector until August 4, when it was relieved by another American novice division—the Thirty-seventh. Except for snappy patrol work in no man's land and enthusiastic artillery practice, the Baccarat sector was as peaceful as an armistice; the activities of the Seventh-seventh here were in the nature of practical laboratory work in modern fighting, and the Seventy-seventh served its apprenticeship at a relatively small cost. Its bag was small—three prisoners captured, no officers, no rifles, no guns, no machine guns, and no ground gained. There was nothing much doing in the Baccarat sector except acquiring experience, which, on the first real battle test, proved to have been insufficient.

BITTER BATTLE EXPERIENCE.

Nothing but bitter battle experience can turn a draft division into an elite combat division, and this the Seventy-seventh got on the Vesle in large doses, swallowed it, survived, and improved in fighting form until it classed with the best of the regular outfits. The Seventy-seventh had the potential "goods"; the "Hell-hole Valley of the Vesle" consolidated the "makings" of a crack division into the finished product capable later of doing the impossible—conquering the Argonnes.

Relieved from the quiet Baccarat sector, the Seventy-seventh got in action August 3 without knowing whither, the infantry hiking to Charmes, the artillery to Bayon, both for entrainment. On the eight-hour train ride the men began to "get warm" to the knowledge that they were heading into real war as they wormed their way along one of the main lines of communication. Detrained, the infantry was hustled in camions via Fere-en-Tardenois, the artillery in forced night marches via Chateau-Thierry to the relief of the battle-worn Fifty-second French and Fourth American Divisions. The Seventy-seventh was given no time to be shown around and get acquainted with its new premises; the old tenants pulled out as the new moved in.

A French division held the sector on the Seventy-seventh's left, while the Twenty-eighth (Pennsylvania) Division was on its right. Opposing the Seventy-seventh were the German Seventeenth, Thirty-ninth, and Two hundred and sixteenth Divisions and the Fourth Guard Division; nothing was wrong with the morale of those opponents at that time. They were still boche fighters of the old school; a tough proposition for the New York Guards to stack up against on their battle debut at odds of 4 to 1.

By August 11 the infantry was all in the Vesle line, but the last of its artillery did not get into position until the 17th. The Seventy-seventh found itself hurled into the hottest kind of a hole; the dog days (and nights) were superheated with all the "stuff" the Germans had—and the Germans at that time were prodigal in sending it over. The front of the division ran parallel to the Vesle and extended from Mont Notre Dame and St. Thibaut through Ville Savoye in the direction of Fismes. The artillery was posted in the area behind Hill 210. The Germans had as yet unbroken strangle hold on the north bank of the muddy, sluggish Vesle, which, though averaging only 30 feet wide and 10 deep, proved, on account of its high, straight banks and steep ridges on both sides, a formidable obstacle.

FIERCE HAND-TO-HAND WORK.

Here the Seventy-seventh, on its first appearance in battle, was discouragingly hung up for three weeks, with little to record except casualties, "beaucoup" enemy gas, the monotonous repetition of enemy barrages, and superactivity on the part of patrols, with bursts of fierce hand-to-hand fighting.

"Baccarat was only a boxing match, but the Vesle, that was a real fist fight," is an epigram attributed to one of the Vesle Valley graduates.

Night after night the Three hundred and second Engineers heroically worked at repairing the bridges over the Vesle, under heavy shell and machine-gun fire. The Seventy-seventh succeeded in pushing outposts across the Vesle and maintaining them in the outskirts of Bazoches and Chateau du Diable.

One typical bit of heroism on the Vesle, singled out of many, deserves special mention. During an important change in the line a Chinese, Pvt. Sing Kee, of the Three hundred and seventh Infantry (now color sergeant of his regiment and decorated with the distinguished-service cross), was operating the message center in Mont Notre Dame, when the Germans bombarded it with gas shells. And though all hands, including Sing Kee, were gassed, he stuck to his post and continued to operate the message center for 24 hours.

SEVEREST POSSIBLE STRAIN.

For three weeks the New York division was subjected to the severest possible strain—that of holding an artilleristically superactive sector without the incentive of scoring an inch of advance. The only diversion during this period was the brilliant but bloody raid on Bazoches—unique in the record of the Seventy-seventh, because it was the only time in all its offensive operations that the division was forced, through no fault of its own, to yield up an objective once gained.

Bazoches, lying deep in a pocket on the German side of the Vesle, was credibly reported to harbor only a relatively weak force of Germans, and the mission accordingly was to take and hold the village of Bazoches by working around it, attacking simultaneously from front and rear and flanks. The tactical plan was brilliantly conceived, placing one platoon of infantry and two machine guns at the extreme northern corner of the village, one platoon of infantry with two machine guns in the northwestern end of the village, one platoon of infantry southwest of the village, south of the railroad, one platoon south of the railroad, southeast of the village. Company G and machine guns of the Three hundred and sixth Infantry were selected for this job. They were ordered to mop up the village thoroughly, while Company E of the Three hundred and sixth was to move up in support.

The attack on Bazoches started at 4.15 a. m. The first platoon and machine guns, followed at 30 yards by the second platoon, forced its entrance into Bazoches at the worthwest corner, placed a machine gun and proceeded to mop up. Shortly after 6 a. m., one platoon of Company E, Three hundred and sixth Infantry, attempted to reinforce Company G but found the German fire too heavy to retain their positions.

The inevitable German counterattack got under way, and nothing further became known of the subsequent movements and fate of the first two platoons to enter Bazoches. While these first two platoons were fighting their way into the northwest portion of Bazoches, the third platoon made progress from east to west in the northern part of the village, thence proceeding to the eastern edge and south as far as the railroad, mopping up in transit.

REST WERE "CASUALTIES."

With daylight the third platoon dug itself in on the railroad and signaled "objective reached." At 6.25, after the enemy had bombed this platoon from front and both flanks, Lieut. Gregory retired across the Vesle, crawling to battalion headquarters, accompanied by four men, the rest being reported as casualties.

The fourth platoon, after entering the village according to plan, proceeded in a southwesterly direction through the center of the village and dug itself in along the railroad track. It was subjected to fire from three sides, and had no news of the other platoons. About 10 a. m. Capt. Bull, in command of the raid on Bazoches, who was with the fourth platoon, decided to withdraw from the village.

These were the simple facts of the raid on Bazoches, but there attaches to them an importance out of all proportion to the size of the operation and the price paid for temporary success and failure.

The raid on Bazoches proved a combination milestone and turning point in the Seventy-seventh's history. Bazoches could be seen into, smothered in barrages and easily counterattacked from the dominating heights on three sides. It could be taken, but it could not be held. It was untenable so long as the heights were in German hands. The way to take Bazoches and hold it was to capture the heights first.

Bazoches taught the tacticians of the Seventy-seventh a lesson the sooner learned the better, and which probably saved the Seventy-seventh heavy casualties in future offensive operations of greater magnitude. As a practical lesson in tactics, Bazoches was well worth the price of several platoons. But over and above this even more important, the experience of Bazoches precipitated a rapid process of transformation within the Seventy-seventh, from which it emerged less than three weeks later, on the Aisne, a full-fledged combat division of the finest fighting temper and efficiency.

The name Bazoches still awakens bloody memories in the Seventy-seventh, though in no sense a defeat. The division was given ample opportunity to forget it, however, in the exhilaration of its first victorious advance. Shortly after the Bazoches episode Maj. Gen. Robert Alexander took command of the Seventy-seventh, replacing Maj. Gen. George B. Duncan. Under the new leader the Seventy-seventh "found its soul," as a veteran member phrased it, and was molded into an irresistibly efficient attacking organism. Not a foot of ground once gained was lost again from the Vesle to the armistice.

FIRST ADVANCE.

On September 2 signs were reported of an impending enemy retirement. Columns of smoke rose above villages in the German line next day. The Seventy-seventh, on its toes, jumped the barrier of the Vesle September 3 and pressed hard after the retreating boche, fighting a sharp and successful engagement with his rear guard on the heights above Haute Maisons. The Seventy-seventh, in its eagerness to advance—the first advance in which it had ever participated—outdistanced its right and left flanks.

On the morning of September 4 it resumed its advance and continued each succeeding day to gain ground consistently in the general advance to the Aisne, until, on the eve of a major attack, for which it had made all preparations, it was suddenly relieved by an Italian division under Gen. Garibaldi, in the night of September 13. In its first advance the Seventy-seventh had clocked off a gain of 12 kilometers (7½ miles) against stiff German rear-guard resistance. The division of New York recruits had emerged from the "hell-hole valley of the Vesle" a veteran division, equal to the best and adequate to the toughest assignment. It received a breathing spell of only two weeks before being turned loose in the Argonne Forest.

CHAPTER II.

THROUGH ARGONNE FOREST.

The climax of the Seventy-seventh Division's brief history is the conquest of the Argonne Forest, a performance of such sustained brilliance in the triumph over seemingly unconquerable obstacles that it can not be beaten by the record of any other American division. To the Seventy-seventh belongs the peculiarly dramatic credit, after its discouraging and very mediocre début in battle, of having pulled itself together into a combat division of the first water and of having "found itself" just in time for its greatest finish fight, emerging thence in the championship class.

It was a new Seventy-seventh in everything but name, pulled together into fine fighting form by the powerful personality of its new commander, Maj. Gen. Robert Alexander, stung into new fighting efficiency by its bad mauling on the Vesle, and, above all, animated by a new divisional spirit—"one fighting organism animated by a common soul"—which left the Vesle-Aisne sector on the nights of September 16–17 and 17–18, proceeding by camion to the vicinity of Civry-en-Argonne, where the troops were disembarked and placed in temporary billets. The Seventy-seventh Division now formed part of the First Corps of the First American Army.

The Seventy-seventh had the distinction of being picked to perform what neither the French nor the Germans had dared during four years of war—an offensive operation in and through the Argonne Forest—and while numerous American divisions are justly claiming premier honors for the success of the Argonne-Meuse offensive, the Seventy-seventh enjoys the undisputable, sole credit for having been the only division which actually fought in and through the dark Argonne Woods.

As a battle ground the Argonne Forest is absolutely unique. There was nothing else like it on the whole west front. It is a region of continuous dense woodland and thickest underbrush, a succession of hills and ravines, of brooks and swamps, with few roads, and those few invariably commanded by the wooded heights. The Germans held all of the Argonne except the open woods in the south, and in four years of virtual armistice they had fortified the Argonne Forest by every means known to scientific ingenuity into an impregnable fortress, which, perhaps, only Americans would have been daring enough to tackle.

German artillery commanded the few roads of approach and every treacherous ravine. German machine guns swept every forest path and insignificant trail and every hill slope. German machine guns were further posted thickly in echelon, so as to form interlocking bands of fire, long chains of machine-gun fire barrages. The trees were interlaced with barbed wire, with successive defensive systems running miles back. The Germans, too, had been prolific in their use of cement. In four years they had constructed systems of reinforced concrete trenches; the terrain was dotted with cement "pill boxes." There were blockhouses, tree-top "fortresses."

Above all, the Germans had four years of experience in Argonne Forest guerrilla warfare and a perfect knowledge of the terrain, reinforced by lookout towers, concealed observation posts, an elaborate telephone system, and a narrow-gauge railway system for bringing up troops, ammunition, and supplies.

TOUGHEST NUT TO CRACK.

No sane German ever dreamed of an attack through this fortified forest. It was the toughest nut which any American division was given to crack.

The French and the German lines, close together, ran—and had run for four years—from La Haraizee through to La Four de Paris, and thence eastward through La Pas Court Choisse to the northern border of the forest on the Aire River. The Argonne Forest in German hands was approximately 22 kilometers long and from 7 to 9 kilometers wide. The problem of the Seventy-seventh Division accordingly was to attack the Argonne on a 7 kilometer front and to drive straight through it for its entire length of 22 kilometers, emerging on the Aire.

During the night of September 23–24 the Seventy-seventh Division moved into the second line in the Argonne Forest, the French continuing to hold the first line so as to mask the American enterprise from the enemy right up to the last moment. The artillery of the division reached the new sector on the night of September 24–25 and went into position.

The enemy now appeared to suspect that something was doing and showed all the usual signs of nervousness. The German patrols became superactive and attacked three nights in succession, but found only the French, and were invariably driven off without penetrating the American secret in the Argonne. The German artillery, too, searched the rearward lines of communication with high-explosive and gas shells.

But everything possible had been done, and done successfully, to conceal the nature of the enterprise from the Germans. Allied air supremacy kept the boche planes from coming over. Troop movements took place at night and in utmost silence. American Artillery observers during the period of preparation wore French uniforms. No English was spoken over the telephones. The Artillery was not permitted to indulge in practice shooting or "registering."

The initial attack was scheduled for 5.30 a. m. on September 26. During the night the Seventy-seventh moved up from the second line and the French withdrew. At midnight the last French outposts were relieved. The Seventy-seventh was on its toes for the attack.

The division had to attack on a front of seven and a half kilometers. Accordingly, all four Infantry regiments were in the front line. This disposition was not ideal and not at all what the commanding general would have liked. But no other disposition was possible, as the frontage to be covered was so extensive.

The line-up was as follows: The Three hundred and eighth Infantry Regiment on the extreme left of the line, then the Three hundred and seventh Infantry, then the Three hundred and sixth Infantry, then the Three hundred and fifth Infantry on the extreme right of the line. The Seventy-seventh Division had on its left the First French Division and on its right the Twenty-eighth (American) Division.

There was also organized a Franco-American force, intended to act as a combat liaison group on the division's left flank. This combat liaison, consisting of the Three hundred and sixty-eighth Infantry of the Ninety-second (American) Division, was to have advanced in conjunction with the left of the Seventy-seventh Division, but failed to do so, and in consequence the left flank of the division was exposed during the whole period of the Argonne Forest drive.

There was yet another handicap to the initial attack. It was impossible to get the Artillery through the dense woods along the entire front of attack. The Artillery was tied to the few roads traversing the forest.

Even so it was necessary to fell some half a hundred trees in order to provide a field of fire for each battery. In order not to advertise the attack to the enemy, the trees were sawed nearly through and wedged, but not toppled over until just before the beginning of the Artillery preparation.

For the opening barrage the 75s of the Three hundred and fourth Field Artillery Regiment were placed on the road running east from La Chalade across the ridge, where they were reinforced by some French 6-inch guns; the 75s of the Three hundred and fifth Field Artillery Regiment were placed on the north and south road in the northeast sector of the Bois de Hauts Batis; and the heavy 155s of the Three hundred and sixth Field Artillery Regiment were placed on the roads in the vicinity of Le Rond Champ and Croix Gentin.

The artillery was given the task of pounding and cutting 16 distinct avenues through the enemy wire for the passage of the attacking infantry. Four of these avenues were to be cut at La Fille Morte and four at Taille Rongard, on the front of the One hundred and fifty-third Brigade, comprising the Three hundred and fifth and Three hundred and sixth Infantry. Three avennes were to be cut through the enemy wire east of La Four de Paris across Ravin Intermediaire to Rau des Meurissons, and one to the north of Rau des Meurissons. Two lanes were to be cut to the east of La Haraizee, and two more south of Rau de la Ferme aux Charmes.

ARTILLERY JOB WELL DONE.

At 2.30 a. m., September 26, the artillery preparation began and continued three hours. At 5.30 a. m., on schedule time, the infantry attack was launched. The artillery had done its job well of cutting those 16 avenues for the attacking infantry, and as the infantry went over the top the 75s placed a rolling barrage 500 meters ahead of the infantry, while the 155s placed a protective barrage 500 meters ahead of this barrage. For the next 25 minutes both barrages were advanced by 100-meter jumps, 100 meters every 5 minutes. This, too, was the initial progress made by the infantry attack.

Worth recording is this address of the commanding general to his infantry officers on the eve of the attack:

"I don't believe we will find very much opposition in the first or even second line. Such opposition as we find will be confined to machine-gun nests. We have all had opportunity to see the aeroplane photographs of the ground we are going over. It is very densely wooded and it is probable that it is very difficult to get through, and that along paths you will find such machine guns as are warranted there. You will find machine guns on the paths and drains. We shall have to work around them and cut around them through the bush. I can not go into detail on the work of the artillery and you don't care about that. I will tell you where it is going to be. It is hard to draw up a definite plan on account of the terrain and the difficulty of registering fire. You all realize that the closer up you get to that barrage, which is to precede you by 500 meters, the more protection it is for you. If you lay behind and it passes on, before you get there the enemy is up and using his weapons. Keep as close to it as you can. The limit of 500 yards was put on it for reasons that I have carefully considered. It is not necessary for you to stay back there."

All four regiments attacked simultaneously, abreast—all four similarly disposed, with one battalion in the front line, one battalion in support, and the third battalion forming either divisional or brigade reserve. Their opponent was the Second Landwehr Division, but little opposition was encountered in the enemy front line.

WALKOVER BEHIND BARRAGE.

The Seventy-seventh had a walkover behind the effective rolling barrage through those 16 avenues blasted through the enemy wire, and an average gain of 2 kilometers was scored on this first day. On the night of the 26th the division's line had been established on the ridge north of the road running from Four de Paris over Barricade Pavilion to Carre des Meurisons; thence south of St. Huberts Pavilion, parallel to the Biesme River.

The second day of the attack brought the real thing in the way of fighting. From now on there was no more easy going, as the German defense unfolded itself. The division renewed the attack at 5.30 a. m., September 27, after a half hour's artillery preparation.

Unfortunately, liaison with the French division on the left and the American division on the right could not be satisfactorily established and maintained. In fact, throughout the Argonne Forest operation both flanks of the Seventy-seventh continued exposed. And whereas, according to plan, the French and American divisions operating immediately to left and right of the Argonne Forest were to have advanced steadily ahead of the Seventy-seventh, thus squeezing the Germans out of the Argonne Forest by a double flanking process, leaving the Seventy-seventh to harass the retreating Germans and mop up the Argonne; in reality, as it turned out, the inability of the adjacent First French and Eighty-second American Divisions to make progress according to schedule, put it squarely up to the Seventy-seventh to push the Germans out of the Argonne Forest by persistent line bucking frontal attacks, without the help of squeezing pressure on the German flanks.

On September 27, while the Three hundred and eighth Infantry on the extreme left managed to push steadily ahead, the Three hundred and seventh, adjoining it, encountered the first serious resistance from the heights on its right front above Rau de la Ferme Aux Charmes. The Three hundred and seventh had run into the first of the system of enfilading machine-gun nests defending the whole plateau south of Bagatelle. The Three hundred and sixth and Three hundred and fifth Infantry soon ran up against the same enfilading machine-gun fire proposition. From now on it was hand-to-hand fighting, and cleaning out individual enemy machine-gun nests patiently, systematically, one at a time. The Seventy-seventh had to nibble its way through the machine-gun-nest-infested Argonne Forest.

Typical of the character of the wilderness fighting which ensued in the Argonnes was the advance of Companies B and K of the Three hundred and sixth Infantry. Separated from the rest of their regiment with which they had begun the attack on the morning of the 27th, these two companies at first found easy going down a deep ravine containing 100 abandoned enemy dugouts showing every evidence of hasty flight. In high spirits they marched Indian fashion in single file up the opposite slope to meet the unknown.

WALKED INTO TRAP.

On the crest of the hill they were halted by strong barbed wire, but no sign of a living enemy. While inspecting the wire they were startled by a red rocket, the signal for the cleverly hidden boche to open fire from the front and flanks. Companies B and K had walked with high spirits into a man trap, but, characteristically, they fought their way out of the trap by advancing through it. A sergeant and six men of Company B located a gap in the wire, crawled through it, and cleaned up two enemy machine guns. Wire clippers now went into action. In three minutes both companies were through the German line and in the German trench system.

A hand-grenade attack by invisible boches quickly followed, but did not dislodge the two American companies. A second German attack, this time behind a blue smoke screen, followed. It was beaten off by American rifle fire.

A third German attack followed from the left flank and took K Company by surprise. The Germans gained a foothold in the left end of the trench and proceeded to make it hot with hand grenades.

With the slogan "Up and at them!" Company K counterattacked. The Germans took cover in the bushes.

They now tried a trick play, 30 or 40 advancing with hands up and yelling "Kamerad."

Companies B and K fell for it, but never again as long as the Argonne drive lasted.

"The 'Kamerad' kids, on reaching the trench, tossed in hand grenades, inflicting heavy casualties. After that we simply let 'em have all we had," a veteran of the Argonne is quoted.

MONOTONOUS AND COSTLY.

Just as these two companies had gained a precarious foothold in St. Huberts Pavilion and were fighting off incessant German counter-attacks other units to right and left were having about the same experience. This was characteristic of the advance through the whole Argonne—daring thrusts all along the line and wherever a foothold was got inside the enemy's defenses a grim holding on until the rest of the line got up—a monotonous and costly operation, which had to be repeated day after day and many times a day. During the 27th attacks were made against the strongly intrenched positions of Abri de St. Louis, Four de Zube, and St. Huberts Pavilion. The Three hundred and fifth Infantry assaulted Abri de St. Louis four times before the German resistance was overcome. The Three hundred and sixth Infantry assaulted the trench position in the Four de Zube three times before the enemy was finally driven out.

This second day's fighting closed with a satisfactory average advance of the division's line of 1½ kilometers, except in the center, which was held up. The engineer and railroad dump of Barricade Pavilion was the biggest in the day's booty.

The Seventy-seventh now continued its advance from day to day, attacking each morning with monotonous regularity and continuing to attack and advance during the day. Steady progress was made each day. The positions occupied were firmly held. No position, once occupied by the division, was ever given up—a remarkable record.

Fighting on the morning of September 28 opened auspiciously. For several hours the advance of the Infantry met no effective opposition. After overrunning the first enemy line of resistance on the jump-off on the morning of the 26th no formal organization of the terrain was encountered until the morning of October 1, when the enemy's second formal line of resistance was reached, running along the crest of the Bois de Naza, extending thence westward into the trench system running north and southeast from the Bagatelle Pavilion.

The advance to this second main line of resistance was, however, made against skillfully improvised defenses, with German machine guns covering every opening through the thick forest. And, unfortunately, it was impossible to use effectively the Artillery for supporting the Infantry advance. From now on the Infantry had to rely almost entirely on itself.

On the morning of the 28th St. Huberts Pavilion and Abri St. Louis were passed and mopped up. The Three hundred and seventh Infantry bagged the Bagatelle Pavilion. The Three hundred and fifth Infantry stormed Abri du Crochet. At 2 o'clock the Three hundred and seventh gained contact with the enemy's second organized line of resistance north of Bagatelle, checked it, and dug itself in 300 meters south of Depot des Machines.

KILLING BOCHES SINGLY.

On its right the One hundred and fifty-third Brigade, comprising the Three hundred and fifth and Three hundred and sixth Infantry, found better going and pushed steadily ahead. It enjoyed the sport of tracking, hunting down, and killing individual boches. With finger on trigger the men stole stealthily through the underbrush, with eyes peeled for skulking Germans. There was a touch of Indian warfare about it. And how keen on the hunt were these New York doughboys was indicated by some of the bodies, which showed anywhere from a dozen to 50 bullet holes.

On September 29 the One hundred and fifty-fourth Brigade (Three hundred and eighth and Three hundred and seventh Infantry) made a record gain of 3 kilometers to the heights bordering the Abri du Crochet, incidentally capturing in transit one of the famous German de luxe rest areas. The American discoverers found here in the heart of the Argonne, honeycombing the hillsides, mammoth model bomb and shell proof dugouts accommodating 50 men each. For the German officers there were even more elaborate dugouts of concrete, with concrete and log roofs 20 feet thick. Outside they were ornamented with carved oak trimmings and looked more like Swiss cottages or swell hunting lodges than dugouts. The bedrooms and living rooms were done in oak paneling, and all were equipped with running hot and cold water, bathrooms, and electric light. The furnishing of the officers' rest dugouts was luxurious, and outside there were gardens in bloom. An open-air beer garden with band stand, a bowling alley, concrete swimming pool, chapel, library, officers' casino, and large theater were other features of the German rest resort that fell into American hands.

FLED FROM THEIR FEAST.

Germans taking the rest cure here had interrupted it abruptly, for the victors found plenty of wine, cigars, and food on the premises, tables set, and every other indication that the patients had deserted on the spur of the moment, saving only their skins and the clothes on their backs. Those of the Seventy-seventh lucky enough to pass through here made adequate use of the spoils.

While the left wing was gaining 3 kilometers on the 29th, the right wing clocked off a good kilometer and a half advance to a position southwest of the Depot des Machines; but the center was hung up and could book little progress. The enemy resistance was stiffening as the divisions got near the second organized German line of defense.

On the 30th the right wing, the Three hundred and fifth and Three hundred and sixth Infantry, devoted its activities to house cleaning, consolidating positions, perfecting liaisons, bringing up supplies and ammunition, and re-forming for the inevitable assault on the supposed Kriemhilde Stellung ahead.

The One hundred and fifty-fourth Brigade, on the left, made the customary morning attack, but without success. The Three hundred and seventh Infantry's attack without artillery support failed to gain. It attacked again in the afternoon, aided by thermite from Stokes mortars, and pushed the enemy off the hills north of the Depot des Machines. The enemy retreated 1 kilometer to his main line, where he held. Also, a fresh enemy division, the Seventy-sixth Landwehr Division, was identified.

The Seventy-seventh was now bucking the line against two known enemy divisions.

On the morning of October 1 the division was in contact with the main German defensive system all along the line. All day the entire division attacked the entire front of the German position, but was stopped at every point. It was the first time since the kick-off on the morning of September 26 that the Seventy-seventh had been checked on its entire front.

Night brought the commanding general's insistent order to attack all along the line in the morning and to break through, regardless of cost.

The crisis of the Argonne operation had come; the immediate sequel was to be the story of the "Lost Battalion."

CHAPTER III.

"LOST BATTALION'S" STORY.

The inside story of the so-called—and miscalled—"Lost Battalion" marks the crisis of the Argonne Forest fighting. And the following account is authoritative, based on official records not heretofore available to the public.

The crisis week of the Seventy-seventh Division began on the morning of October 2. On that crucial day the Seventy-seventh's brilliant seven days' continuous fighting advance had come to a standstill. There was no hopeful local progress at any single point. On this memorable morning the Seventy-seventh found itself very literally "up against" the strongest conceivable enemy system of defenses, running across and along wild, deep ravines, densely wooded hills, and through the typical mad Argonne tangle of trees and underbrush.

This enemy line of greatest resistance ran along the ridge of Bois de la Naza, thence across the Ravine de Charleveaux, whence it extended over wooded hill and dale to a ravine trench system south of La Palette Pavilion. The critical impasse of the Seventy-seventh on the morning of October 2 reminded you of the old problem about "What happens when an irresistible force meets an immovable body?"

For the Seventy-seventh there was only one answer: The enemy line must be broken, regardless of cost. The success of the whole Argonne Forest operation was at stake and depended on immediately breaking the enemy line preliminary to resuming the old continuous advance.

The division was accordingly ordered to attack at 12.50 p. m. on its entire front, regardless of losses. The elements of the division were further ordered, if successful in breaking through the German line, to advance regardless of flank protection and to hold their objectives until the rest of the line caught up with them.

"LOST BATTALION'S" FEAT.

The division attacked on schedule time, supported by a barrage and by a simultaneous attack by the French holding the Binarville sector west of the Seventy-seventh. But the attack ran into murderous enfilading fire from cleverly concealed machine guns which apparently left not a loophole on the entire front. The determined attack, regardless of losses, seemed to be a failure.

When the situation cleared a slender ray of success appeared. The "Lost Battalion" alone had succeeded in breaking through the German line. At all other points the division had been held up. Elements of the First and Second Battalion of the Three hundred and eighth Infantry, reinforced by sections of Companies C and D of the Three hundred and sixth Machine Gun Battalion, all under the command of Maj. Charles S. Whittlesey, and later reduced by casualties to the famous "Lost Battalion" had found Achilles's Heel of the impregnable German line—its one vulnerable spot.

This was the Ravine de Charlevaux, on the extreme left of the division's line and running through the center of the Three hundred and eighth Infantry's sector. The one undefended spot of the German line was in the bed of this ravine, and by a process of infiltration through the underbrush along the eastern bank of its slender stream Maj. Whittlesey's force, now comprising Companies A, B, C, E, G, and H, of the Three hundred and eighth Infantry, with the added machine-gun detachments, succeeded in breaking through the German line and alone reaching its objective, the so-called Charlevaux Mills.

Without support of any kind on either flank this solitary band of unconscious heroes had reached—and intended to hold—a position deep within the enemy's lines. On their left the French attack had made no progress and had been held up in front of La Palette Pavillion. On the right the Three hundred and seventh Infantry had been able to make no progress either, and had been checked in front of the Bois de la Naza.

BEYOND REACH OF RELIEF.

At this time the "Lost Battalion" had no way of knowing that it was far in advance of the checked elements on both its flanks. It only knew that it had broken through the German trench and wire system, losing about 90 men, but capturing two officers, 28 privates, and 3 machine guns. It confidently expected support in the form of reinforcements; and, as a matter of fact, the Third Battalion of the Three hundred and seventh Infantry actually did attempt to follow it that same night, but only Company K succeeded in slipping through and reinforcing Maj. Whittlesey in the morning. The torn ends of the broken German line quickly reached out behind Maj. Whittlesey's force and succeeded in effecting a junction, thus preventing the coming up of further reinforcements.

To the layman it might look as if Maj. Whittlesey's band of heroes had blundered with their eyes open into a mantrap. But nobody had blundered. Maj. Whittlesey had specific orders to break through the Charlevaux Mills and hold it until the rest of the line got up, which left him no discretion for avoiding a possible mantrap by retreating or, once in, trying to fight his way back.

While the commanding general's orders were inspired by higher considerations than those of tactical soundness, this was one of those battle crises where success could not be achieved according to book rules, where the only chance of success lay in a bold tactical measure of theoretical unsoundness. "Break through at all cost and then widen the breach in the process of rescuing the 'Lost Battalion,'" summarizes this crisis maneuver.

That night Maj. Whittlesey took up a position near the crest of the hill south of La Viergette-Binarville, close to the Bois de Buirrone and about 500 meters east of the Charlevaux Mills. He and his band did not know until morning that in the night the Germans had been superactive, digging trenches, running barbed wire entanglements, and posting machine guns in his rear, across the path of his advance, and thus repairing the break in the German line which his force had made.

COMPLETELY CUT OFF.

Without knowing it, he was that night completely cut off from the division and entirely surrounded by Germans, his force forming a small American island within the German system of defenses.

Knowing nothing of this, Maj. Whittlesey's dispositions for this first night of isolation were admirable and, as subsequent events proved, almost miraculously perfect.

Casualties had reduced his command to 600 effectives, including the machine gunners. These "babes in the Argonne Woods" were now hopelessly "lost" in a deep "pocket" formed by the junction of two steep ravines with slender streams meeting at right angles. On four sides they were hemmed in by steep, densely wooded slopes.

In the darkness Maj. Whittlesey led his men, struggling through the morass, across the brook and junction of the two ravines, and up the tangled slope almost to the crest. In front and about 100 yards from the crest the Binarville-La Viergette road hugged the slope.

With the utmost difficulty funk holes were dug in the stony ground of the hill slope. Also, the men had no blankets or overcoats. And lastly, they had already eaten up their reserve rations in the course of their advance. But this night they were to enjoy their last quiet, restful night. Not until morning—the morning of October 3—did they discover the true character of their desperate position.

E COMPANY SURROUNDED.

At daybreak, October 3, details were sent to the rear for rations. At the same time Company E, under Lieut. Wilhelm, was sent back to attack from the west of the ravine from which the original attack had been launched, in order to assist reinforcements in getting through and up. But at 10 a. m. only 18 men, led by Lieut. Lenke, returned and reported to Maj. Whittlesey that E Company in going back had been surrounded, and that Lieut. Wilhelm had ordered him to save his platoon. Lieut. Wilhelm later succeeded in fighting his way back with a very few survivors of Company E.

For the first time Maj. Whittlesey and his band now realized beyond a shadow of a doubt that they were cut off in the rear. This disquieting information was supplemented by patrols who quickly returned and reported Germans to right of them, Germans to left of them, and not a ghost of a chance of establishing liaison either with the French, who were expected to come up on the left, nor with the Three hundred and eighth Infantry, scheduled to advance on the right.

Half an hour later came confirmation that the isolation of the "Lost Battalion" was complete. Two runner posts in the rear had been attacked and scattered by the Germans; the battalion's rearward line of communication by runners no longer functioned, and an attempt was made to report this ominous fact to regimental headquarters by carrier pigeons.

Knowing their situation, but also knowing their orders to hold, the "Lost Battalion" now prepared for its death struggle. Maj. Whittlesey disposed his forces in the form of a hollow square on the slope of the hill, with machine guns posted on the corners, prepared to meet an attack from any point of the compass. Then the agony of waiting began.

There was only one relatively bright spot in their position. The German artillery could do the "Lost Battalion" relatively little damage. The German artillery opened fire at 8.30 a. m., but few of the shells got home because of the battalion's peculiarly lucky position on the steep back of the hill near the crest. The shells from the German field guns and howitzers whizzed right over the crest of the hill and over the heads of the "Lost Battalion." More disconcerting was the fire from a German trench mortar 600 yards in the battalion's rear. A platoon sent back to silence this mortar was driven back by murderous machine-gun fire from the rear.

At dusk of the same day, October 3, enemy voices were heard on the left flank, and Cossack patrols, drawn in, reported large groups of lurking Germans seen through the trees. In the growing darkness the voices drew nearer, and the commands could be clearly distinguished; also the frequent ejaculation "Amerikaner."

It was uncanny to be able to eavesdrop the preparations for an impending attack without knowing from which of four sides it might ultimately be launched. Clarity was brought by a daring scout, who returned and reported massed Germans on the 20-foot-high cliff which overhung the road cut into the slope of the hill on which the front of the "Lost Battalion" rested.

German commands could now be heard in front, at the rear, and on the left flank as the Germans came into position for a concerted attack. The "Lost Battalion" was cautioned to be "steady," as the supply of ammunition was very limited.

HAIL OF GRENADES.

Suddenly from the top of the cliff the men heard the German command, "All together, now." A hail of hand grenades nicknamed "potato mashers" followed. The hand-grenade attack lasted 10 minutes. The men of the "Lost Battalion," however, were models of steadiness and fired not a shot, though ready to fire at word of command.

Again the German command "Everything in readiness" was heard from the top of the hill, heralding the second attack. But it was never pulled off, because the "Lost Battalion" now received the eagerly awaited order to "commence firing," and the boches were "caught in the act," out of their holes, in erect positions ready to toss their potato mashers. The effectiveness of the American rifle was proved by the cries of the wounded Germans in the woods above the cliff. No more German commands were heard that night. During this second night the disheartened enemy confined himself to occasional bursts of machine-gun fire. The diary of the "Lost Battalion" also shows that by October 4 the effective strength of the battalion had been reduced to 520.

There is also one regularly recurring rubric in the "Lost Battalion's" diary: "Forlorn hope" patrols and runners who never returned—sent out day after day on the long chance of breaking through to regimental headquarters.

FIRST PANGS OF HUNGER.

October 4 is notable, because this day the men of the "Lost Battalion" first began to feel the pangs of hunger. Also, at 4 p. m., the Germans tried their second big attack. Again their preparatory movements could be heard through the trees and underbrush on all four sides. But this time the Germans tried a trick. On the right of the battalion English speaking boches called out in the vernacular, ordering the Americans to get ready to retreat, as it had been decided to retire from the entire position.

One American outpost on the right actually fell for the trick, designed to demoralize the "Lost Battalion" and make it an easier prey. This doughboy, in perfect good faith, was caught by an officer crawling out of his hole and putting on his pack preparatory to leaving. Orders were quickly spread throughout the battalion to be on guard for Teuton trick plays.

The German attack this time was from all four sides; rifle and machine-gun fire from rear and both flanks and hand grenades from the cliff in front.

The Germans again tried a trick play. The order "Gas masks!" was shouted, but with such an obvious Teuton accent that it elicited the spirited American mass reply, "Gas masks, hell!"

There was no rest for the "Lost Battalion" that night. The American rifle fire had taken the heart out of the German attack, and after the failure of their tricks the Teutons showed no longing to come to close quarters. But their fire and hand grenade throwing kept up all night, answered by American rifle fire whenever the men heard a profitable sounding target. For the supply of ammunition was pitifully limited.

The last stand of the "Lost Battalion" now assumed a touch of grim Homeric humor. The boche, apparently feeling sure of his prey, commenced jeering the little band in English, and the men retorted with volleys of unprintable epithets. The Germans from now on made a practice of trying to "get the goat" of the "Lost Battalion" by shouting orders in English to the men, who, in turn, told the boches plainly, both in the vernacular and in unprintable German, just what they thought of them.

BATTLE OF CURSING.

The intermittent rifle and machine-gun firing was accompanied by continuous volleys of choicest invectives on both sides, the Americans, however, clearly having the best of it in quantity as well as quality of rhetoric. The psychological effect of this form of warfare on the men was to enrage them and fill them with a burning desire to kill as many of the jeering boches as possible; and vocally venting their feelings undoubtedly did much to keep their morale at the sizzling point in the face of famine and seemingly certain death.

The diary of the "Lost Battalion" for the next three days is a monotonous agony of waiting and starving, fighting and dying. One day was like another. It was hardly worth while, or possible, to keep a record of the successive German attacks. Organized German attacks were frequent and the harrassing was continuous. From one thing the battalion did not have to suffer—from thirst. A spring was discovered on the permises. And from these premises, its formation on the hill slope, the battalion did not budge an inch in any direction for five days.

There being nothing to eat there were no regular meal times to help pass the time. But there was plenty of rain. There was little sleep or rest. Continual alertness was the price of safety. It was sure death to stand up by day. There was nothing for it but to hug the ground from daybreak till dusk. And this ground, the battalion's camping ground, was gradually, ruthlessly torn up by enemy trench mortars and raked by grazing machine-gun fire.

Pitiful, too, was the plight of the wounded. Of the medical detachment there were only two survivors. They were forced to make their rounds crawling and to keep close to the ground when giving first and last aid.

For the seriously wounded there could be no help. Even the lighter wounded had to suffer excruciating, prolonged tortures, since the supply of bandages had run out, and the newly wounded could not be dressed until the old bandages had been removed from the dead. The living lay among the unburied dead—necessarily unburied—for burial by day would have been suicidal; also, the men were kept too continuously busy beating off the boche to bury their dead; and as the days wore on they became too weak from hunger to dig graves by night. The raw, bleeding battlefield held by the "Lost Battalion" had all the makings of a hell hole.

In spirit the "Lost Battalion" men were very much like shipwrecked mariners in a small boat lost at sea, scanning the horizon for a rescuing vessel. Though exhausted by hunger and exposure and fighting, their morale continued unimpaired; they seemed never to give up all hope of being rescued by their comrades of the Seventy-seventh. They were victims of some cruel false hopes and false alarms.

HOPES OF SUPPORT DASHED.

The first of these illusory thrills was on October 4, when the "Lost Battalion" heard firing to the south. During the night the firing seemed to draw nearer, and hopes were keyed high that the division had effected a break through and that relief was near. But daylight disclosed no sign of rescuers, far or near.

Heartbreaking, too, was the fact that although huge white panel cloths were spread on the ground, and our aeroplanes were repeatedly sighted, there was no assurance that the "Lost Battalion" had been located. For all the battalion knew, it might really have been "lost."

Some assurance that the division really knew of the plight of the "Lost Battalion," as well as its exact position, came on October 5, when the division's artillery, which in the morning had been placing its heavy fire far to the rear of the "Lost Battalion," suddenly jumped its barrage forward, over the heads of the heroic band, and laid it on the crest of the hill just in front of the battalion's position, incidentally breaking up a German mass attack as it was about to be sprung. This unexpected American barrage was a life-saver and seemed to the exhausted men almost like an act of Providence, though full credit was given to the solitary American aeroplane which had winged over their heads without dropping any sign of recognition. However, the men now figured out that their comrades knew they were there and were coming to their rescue.

The remnants of the "Lost Battalion" now took on a new lease of life, but of short duration. After hopes had been raised to the highest pitch by the sight and sound of the miraculous barrage, the artillery firing suddenly ceased, and at night, when it resumed, the firing seemed fainter and farther away than ever. The reaction of futile, false hopes was terrible to bear. On the morning of October 5 the battalion had numbered only 375 effectives; by nightfall heavy casualties suffered from the raking, merciless German machine-gun fire had still further reduced its fighting strength.

NO FOOD IN FOUR DAYS.

Sunday, October 6, the enemy continued his systematic machine-gun fire and trench-mortar bombardment, but the survivors of the "Lost Battalion" were almost exclusively absorbed in the vacuum of their stomachs. With few fortunate exceptions they had not had a mouthful of food in four days.

The story is told of one man who on this day found a piece of bacon rind in his pocket, which he had used for rubbing a wound in his hand. He divided this piece of bacon rind with his funk-hole mate, and both ate it greedily.

Famished men with sufficient strength crawled out of bounds at night and went through the boche dead in search of food, occasionally retrieving a small piece of hard, black bread. American aeroplanes, now flying more frequently overhead, dropped food packets—tantalizingly, invariably, out of the battalion's reach.

On Sunday, October 6, the effective strength of the "Lost Battalion" had been reduced to 275. Both machine-gun officers, Lieuts. Peabody and Noon, were killed during the day; only one machine gun out of nine was still working, and machine-gun ammunition was almost gone.

Monday, October 7, saw the soul crisis of the "Lost Battalion." From none of the men had come a suggestion of surrender. The subtle temptation now came from the enemy. In the morning a patrol, nine strong, went into the woods to try and recover a food parcel dropped by one of our aeroplanes. Outnumbered and overpowered by a German outpost, five were killed, four wounded and taken prisoners.

GERMAN TEMPTATION.

One of these, a private of Company H, was sent back to the battalion with a note from the German commanding officer, reading:

"SIR: The bearer of this present has been taken prisoner by us. He refused to give the German intelligence officer any answer to his questions and is quite an honorable fellow, doing honor to his fatherland in the strictest sense of the word.

"He has been charged against his will, believing that he is doing wrong to his country, to carry forward this present letter to the officer in charge of the battalion of the Seventy-seventh Division, with the purpose to recommend the commander to surrender with his forces, as it would be quite useless to resist any more, in view of the present conditions.

"The suffering of your wounded men can be heard over here in the German lines and we are appealing to your humane sentiments to stop. A white flag shown by one of your men will tell us that you agree with these conditions. Please treat the bearer as an honorable man. He is quite a soldier. We envy you."

Maj. Whittlesey, Capt. McMurtry, and Capt. Holderman read the note in turn. Maj. Whittlesey ordered the two white panels, spread on the ground for the purpose of attracting the attention of American aeroplanes, to be removed, so that not even a suspicion of a white flag of surrender might show on that hillside.

The news of the German note, tempting the "Lost Battalion" to surrender, quickly spread among the men, but not a man was in favor of it. Prostrate on the ground, in many cases too weak from hunger to stir, they had life and spirit enough left in them to call over to the boche to "Come over and get us," amplified with some choice but unprintable epithets.

LAST, HARDEST FIGHT.

In the evening unmistakable American musketry and machine-gun fire, unmistakably coming their way, sounded like sweet music in the ears of the "Lost Battalion." But they had to put up one last and hardest fight before the approaching relief became effective. The Germans tried a last farewell, desperate assault, this time with liquid fire. But, like all their innumerable previous attacks, this one, too, was smeared by the survivors of the "Lost Battalion," and as the last Germans were beaten back and disappeared men of the Three hundred and seventh Infantry were coming up on the right while patrols of the Three hundred and eighth were reported advancing from the south. The agony of the "Lost Battalion" was over. On the morning of October 8, 252 survivors of the original 679 returned from the "pocket," leaving the dead to hold the position.

CHAPTER IV.

SUPREME TEST.

The supreme test of the Seventy-seventh Division began on the morning of October 2, lasting five critical days and trying the mettle of its morale as it was never tried before nor after.

The heroic story of the "Lost Battalion" was only an interlude in the epic fight through the Argonne. And while the "Lost Battalion" was fighting and starving and dying the entire division continued the attack, day after day, for five days, pursuant to standing orders to "break the enemy line, regardless of cost, and push forward without regard to flank protection."

All attacks along the line on October 2 failed, with the exception of the temporary break through of the "Lost Battalion." On the morning of October 3 the general attack was renewed, the purpose being primarily to advance, and, secondly, to reestablish communication with Maj. Whittlesey's detachment. But owing to the difficulty of the terrain, the inevitable absence of adequate artillery preparation, and the thick character of the country no appreciable progress was made during the day either to left or right.

In the morning the One hundred and fifty-fourth Brigade on the left made a determined attack to break through to Charlevaux Mills, but the enemy held at all points. Two subsequent attacks in the course of the day failed to make any impression on the enemy line. Equally determined attacks by the One hundred and fifty-third Brigade on the right had no better luck. In an attack at 4 p. m. the Second Battalion of the Three hundred and fifth lost 5 officers killed and over 200 men killed or wounded, indicating the desperate character of the fighting.

HEARTENING PRAISE.

This day, however, brought a heartening communication of commendation from the chief of staff of the First Army Corps to the commanding general of the Seventy-seventh Division reading:

"The corps commander has directed me to extend to you and to the entire Seventy-seventh Division a most cordial expression of his gratification at the steady, solid progress made since the beginning of the operation now under way.

"The difficulties of the terrain are fully understood, and the amount of ground gained is noticeable, while your supplies and communications are thoroughly satisfactory."

Continued failure to gain at any point—a fine test of morale—merely served to increase the fighting spirit of the Seventy-seventh. The fighting gained in violence. On October 4 and 5 five determined attacks were launched by the One hundred and fifty-fourth Brigade against the position in front of them. The brigade commander, Brig. Gen. Evan M. Johnson, personally led the attacks, but without success. This lack of success was not due in any sense to incorrect direction of these attacks, but was brought about by the extreme difficulties of the terrain, the lack of adequate artillery support, due to the impossibility of observation of fire, and the close proximity of the opposing lines.

On October 6 a battalion of the Three hundred and seventh, reenforced by the elements from the One hundred and fifty-third Brigade, finally succeeded in working its way up the ravine south of the Bois de la Naza, while as a ruse the Three hundred and eighth Infantry and the remainder of the Three hundred and seventh made noisy demonstrations along the entire brigade front to divert the enemy's attention.

That ruse was partly successful, and the relief expedition made good progress before it was discovered and checked by close-range mass machine-gun fire from the Bois d'Apremont on the right flank. Simultaneously on the afternoon of the 6th, nine companies of the One hundred and fifty-fourth Brigade bucked the enemy front line so consistently that by evening they had the boche beginning to give ground.

GERMANS ON THE RUN.

But there was no let-up in the attack. The Seventy-seventh had reached the pinnacle of its fighting power and by the morning of October 7 it had the Germans on the run all along the line. The Three hundred and eighth Infantry on the extreme left encountered no resistance and pushed ahead. The Three hundred and seventh Infantry reached the Binarville-La Viergette Road. The "Lost Battalion" was relieved. The pursuit of the retreating Germans was pressed sharply. Under this fierce pressure the Germans abandoned their entire main line of resistance, the One hundred and fifty-third Brigade alone scoring an advance of 2 kilometers.

The Seventy-seventh had triumphed over the crisis; from now on it was relatively a walkover—a promenade through the remnant part of the Argonne.

The division continued its advance on October 8, meaning that, though machine-gun resistance was to be found everywhere, as was to be expected, enemy organized positions were not further in evidence. Best of all the dark Argonne Forest opened up; there were now breathing spaces for tactical maneuvers. For the first time since the Argonne drive began, the men saw sunlight and patches of blue sky, patches of fields and opening vistas.

By October 9 the division had broken out of the northern edge of the Argonne Forest, having completed a task unique in the annals of the American Expeditionary Force. The enemy had exploited the five-day holdup of the division to bring up reinforcements, and on this day elements of three fresh enemy divisions were spotted—the Forty-first and Forty-fifth Reserve Divisions and the Fifteenth Bavarian Division. But they came too late. During October 9 and 10 the division scored an average advance of 10 kilometers (6¼ miles). The Three hundred and fifth and Three hundred and sixth Infantry captured La Besogne and Marcq, while the First Battalion of the Three hundred and sixth annexed Chevieres.

The advance was continued October 11, the One hundred and fifty-fourth Brigade taking over the entire divisional front. The division was now able to profit by the open country by getting up its artillery, of whose services it had been largely deprived during the passage of the Argonne Forest.

By October 12 a new line of enemy resistance had, however been reached. Patrols attempting to enter Grand Pre on that day were driven back, while the Three hundred and second Engineers made repeated unsuccessful attempts to bridge the Aire under heavy artillery and machine-gun fire. One more tough assignment was reserved for the battle-worn Seventh-seventh—the taking of Grand Pre and St. Juvin.

MORE COMMENDATION.

The following corps communication reached the Seventy-seventh on this day, addressed to its commanding general:

"The corps commander directs me to inform you that he feels once more during the present operations called upon to express his gratification and appreciation of the work of the Seventy-seventh Division.

"This division had been in the line constantly since the night of September 25, under circumstances at least as difficult as those which have confronted any other division of the First Army.

"In spite of these conditions your command has pushed steadily forward on a line with the foremost, and to-day, after 18 days of constant fighting, is still ready to respond to any demand made upon it.

"The corps commander is proud, indeed, of such a unit as yours, and congratulates you on such a command."

During the night the Three hundred and second Engineers succeeded in bridging the Aire under cover of the division's artillery fire. At 8.30 on the morning of October 14 the Three hundred and sixth Infantry, supported by the Second and Third Battalions of the Three hundred and fifth, attacked St. Juvin, which the Eighty-second Division had previously failed to take in three attempts. Repeated attempts of the First Battalion of the Three hundred and sixth to force the passage of the Aire were smeared by the fierce enemy barrage, the battalion losing seven officers killed.

The Second Battalion of the Three hundred and sixth had better luck and got across the Aire east of Marcq, partly by wading, partly by scrambling across on planks, and three-quarters of an hour later it had fought its way into St. Juvin, closely followed by the supporting Second and Third Battalions of the Three hundred and fifth Infantry, for the grand mopping-up party, the bag including 500 prisoners, including two majors. Owing to the shortage of guards some of the prisoners had to be turned over to military police of the adjoining Eighty-second (American) Division. In the afternoon of the 14th the capture of St. Juvin was clinched by the storming of the dominating Hill 12 by Company D of the Three hundred and sixth Infantry and Company D of the Three hundred and fifth Machine Gun Battalion.

On October 15, emulating the exploit of the One hundred and fifty-third Brigade, the One hundred and fifty-fourth Brigade executed an attack against Grand Pre which resulted in its capture and occupation.

RELIEVED AND REFRESHED.

The Seventy-seventh Division was relieved by the Seventy-eighth Division during the night of October 15–16. The division, on being relieved, was concentrated in the vicinity of Pylone and Camp de Bouzon, where it received replacements, new supplies of clothing, and where also it was bathed. This was not a period of real rest for the worn division, however, as the rest camps of the division were always under enemy shell fire and nightly bombardment by enemy avions.

During the advance through the Argonne Forest the Seventy-seventh Division captured 631 prisoners, including 12 officers, 10 pieces of heavy ordnance, 150 machine guns, and $2,000,000 worth of engineer and railway material. The casualties of this operation, extending from September 25 to October 16, were heavy: Twenty-four officers and 537 men killed, 98 officers and 3,038 men wounded or missing.

CHAPTER V.

WHIRLWIND FINISH.

The Seventy-seventh—conquerors of the Argonne—had the satisfaction of putting up a whirlwind finish to the firing of the last gun of the war—a worthy close to their fine fighting history.

At the beginning of the great drive to the Meuse of the First American Army the worn Seventy-seventh had been pulled out of the line and replaced by the Seventy-eighth. For the next two weeks the Seventy-seventh was in supporting position, in the rear of the Seventy-eighth, on a line between Grand Pre and St. Juvin; and this brief respite from fighting was devoted to much needed refilling and reequipping. One brigade alone was short 3,500 men.

"Doping" the news was rife in the ranks during these two weeks. The collapse of Turkey and Austria and Germany's last desperate peace offensive kept all tongues wagging. But though the division sensed the beginning of the end the peace talk did not impair its fighting morale.

On the night of October 31–November 1 the Seventy-seventh was sent back into the front line, relieving the Seventy-eighth, and found its old front just where the division had left it. No gain had been scored in the division's absence. The division was ordered to perform the difficult feat of attacking immediately after effecting the relief of the Seventy-eighth, elements of which were left as a light screen in front of the Seventy-seventh almost up to the hour set for the attack, in order to deceive the enemy.

ATTACK ON KRIEMHILDE LINE.

The One hundred and fifty-third Brigade drew the post of honor in the front line, with the One hundred and fifty-fourth Brigade as divisional reserve. The Three hundred and fifth Infantry took up its attacking position in the Ravine aux Pierres, with the Three hundred and sixth stationed just south of St. Juvin. The Three hundred and seventh Infantry, posted at Pylone, had orders to follow the attacking brigade at a distance of 1 kilometer, while the Three hundred and eighth Infantry was held at Marcq. The division's artillery, which had begun to go into position on October 26, was posted with its 75 batteries between Marcq and Sommerance, while the batteries of 155s were posted between La Besogne and Cornay. This was the line-up of the Seventy-seventh for its attack on the famous Kriemhilde Stellung.

The enemy's rear-guard defensive tactics had undergone no change. At the beginning of its drive to the Meuse the Seventy-seventh's job was the old costly and thankless game of bucking the line against systems of machine-gun nests on every hillcrest and slope.

At dawn of November 1, after two hours of artillery preparation, the One hundred and fifty-third Brigade went over the top and carried its attack up the steep hill to Champigneulle, which was the center of a formidable trench system. Two companies reached the secondary objective—the road running from Champigneulle to St. Georges—while machine gunners broke the resistance from the trench systems southeast of Champigneulle and from Min Mohin. One of the advanced companies beat off three desperate counterattacks; but, on the whole, the first day's attack of the Seventy-seventh was not much of a success, yielding only a very slight advance.

An intercepted German army order signed by Gen. von der Marwitz confirmed the suspicion that the Germans were determined to fight to the last man at this critical point of their line. In his appeal to his partly demoralized troops Gen. von der Marwitz stated the ominous fact that if the American Army succeeded in cutting the Longuyon-Sedan Railroad the only avenue of escape for the Germans from the west would be cut off.

CHAMPIGNEULLES STORMED.

The second day of the attack, November 2, found the Seventy-seventh up to its best fighting form. A change of command had taken place in the One hundred and fifty-third Brigade overnight, Col. Vidmer now commanding. With both the Three hundred and fifth and Three hundred and sixth Infantry in the front line this time, the strongly fortified town of Champigneulles was stormed early in the morning in half an hour of actual fighting. Both regiments continued their advance. Verpel, four kilometers north of Champigneulle, was taken at 10 a. m. by elements of the Three hundred and sixth Infantry, and by noon the advance guard had penetrated to the north of Verpel.

The advance of the Seventy-seventh was speeded up to such a pace that the command undertook to send motor trucks to the front in order to carry the doughboys forward quicker. But the road conditions were such that the motor trucks could not catch up with the rapidly advancing Infantry. The drive of the Seventy-seventh to the Meuse was fast becoming a race for Sedan.

November 2 was a record day, for the advance continued all afternoon and until late in the evening. By night the Seventy-seventh had added Harricourt, Thenorgues, and Bar to its bag, while the German official communique said whimsically, "We have readjusted our position to a depth of 10 miles."

Fast as the Infantry of the Seventy-seventh sprinted across country the Germans ran even faster, and for a good part of November 2 contact was lost with the enemy. Late at night patrols succeeded in regaining contact with the enemy near Autruche. So fast had been the American advance in places that isolated captured German machine gunners actually mistook the advancing Americans for their own retreating rear guard.

November 3 the Three hundred and sixth Infantry continued the advance, with the Three hundred and fifth acting as brigade reserve. The Three hundred and sixth swept through the towns of Autruche at 9 a. m. and Fontenoy at 2 p. m. without encountering opposition. In the headlong rush a single platoon captured two German batteries which had remained in position between Fontenoy and Autruche, firing right up to the last minute, but failing to make their getaway.

"SOUVENIRS FOR YOU AMERICANS."

A touch of German humor was encountered in Autruche. One house bore a German painted sign, in English, "For officers only." On the mantelpiece of one of the rooms were found several German helmets and pistols and tacked to the wall the sign, "Souvenirs for you Americans." And under this legend, "We shall be home by Christmas and you won't."

At 3 p. m. the Three hundred and sixth Infantry passed through Pierremont in the direction of Oches, which proved a point of temporary enemy resistance, the advancing troops encountering high explosive shells and mustard gas and machine-gun resistance.

November 4 the difficult feat of a "running relief" was skillfully performed. Without checking the pace of the advance the One hundred and fifty-fourth Brigade relieved the One hundred and fifty-third in the front line, the latter following as divisional reserve. The fresh brigade gained a kilometer during the day, capturing the town of Oches, though unofficially it was captured by the interpreter of the Three hundred and eighth Infantry, who had gone ahead of the regiment to locate suitable regimental headquarters, and found only French civilians in the town, which had been hastily evacuated by the German.

The false report of the Kaiser's abdication caused loud cheers, but no let-up in the fighting spirit. Operations were even speeded up a bit on November 5, when, at 6.30 a. m., the entire division attacked in line, the One hundred and fifty-third Brigade on the right and the One hundred and fifty-fourth on the left.

White flags floating from the church steeple in the town of Stonne were suspected to be a German ruse, but turned out to have been hung out by the anxious French population as an appeal to the American artillery to spare the town. The Americans, on entering without enemy opposition, were hailed as liberators, and the grateful townspeople even offered the men of the Seventy-seventh food from their own scanty stocks. There was nothing much for the division to do on this day but to advance and mop up.

The direction of the division's attack now took a sharp turn to the northeast, following the course of the Meuse. At 10 a. m. November 5 the town of La Besaze was captured and 5,000 French civilians liberated.

RECORD ADVANCE.

November 6 the division made a record advance of 14 kilometers (about 9 miles) from the line Stonne-La Besaze toward Sedan. This was more than twice as great as the division's best previous record. The One hundred and fifty-third Brigade entered Flaba at 9.55 a. m. and, continuing to push its advance sharply, by 2 p. m. its patrols had reached Autrecourt, on the west bank of the Meuse, finding it unoccupied by the enemy.

By 4 p. m. the front-line battalions were established on the heights overlooking the Meuse. Patrols sent out to reconnoiter reported that all bridges had been destroyed.

November 7 the division pushed up to the Meuse preparatory to crossing, and with the reaching of the Meuse ended the actual operations of the Seventy-seventh Division. The One hundred and fifty-third Brigade had reached the Meuse only a few hours ahead of the One hundred and fifty-fourth Brigade, on its left, which had completed a brilliant advance through Raucourt, Meuse la Angecourt, and Remilly sur Meuse. At midnight, by the light of the burning town of Allicourt, fired by the boche, Sedan could be seen in the distance by the Seventy-seventh, bivouacking on the heights of the Meuse.

November 7 a reorganization of forces was ordered preparatory to a further advance—which never came off, frustrated by the armistice. The leading elements of the division were pushed up to the Meuse preparatory to a crossing.

ACROSS THE MEUSE.

In the morning the Three hundred and second Engineers started to erect a footbridge for the crossing at Villers, as the Meuse was found unfordable. At 3.45 p. m. the bridge was completed and, under heavy fire, two platoons of A Company, Three hundred and fifth Infantry, succeeded in forcing the passage of the Meuse and getting a foothold on the east bank. Repeated attempts to throw a bridge across the Meuse at Remilly sur Meuse were finally successful, and patrols of the Three hundred and seventh Infantry were pushed across to the east bank in the night at this point.

November 8 the Seventy-seventh Division was ordered to take over the entire corps front of 25 kilometers (15½ miles).

As the entry into Sedan had been allocated to the French there was no more work for the Seventy-seventh to do, nothing except to hold the watch on the Meuse and listen to the siren song of the peace dove. November 10 brought the Seventy-seventh its first authentic peace news.

The night of November 10 and the morning of the 11th are unforgetable by the Seventy-seventh. Its sector had suddenly become quiet. Solitary boche shells alone reminded them that a war was still on. A suspected attempt on the part of the Germans to fraternize was spotted in the night when the Germans were seen to be sending up red, white, and blue light rockets in quick succession. Not a man of the division was killed during the night and morning preceding the armistice.

At 11 a. m. on November 11 the fighting history of the "Liberty Division" was all over but the shouting.

CHAPTER VI.

WAR RECORD SUMMARY.

The Seventy-seventh Division arrived in France on April 13, 1918, and it is still here, though it has high hopes, alternating with fearful misgivings, of seeing again—soon—the Statue of Liberty, the divisional insignia (gold liberty embroidered on blue rectangular background), which it proudly wears sewed on its left sleeve. But, thanks to the common sense military censorship, the summary of its war record needn't wait for publication until the boys get back to Broadway and tell about it.

The "Liberty Division" suffered a grand total of 9,611 casualties (317 officers and 9,294 men), as follows: Sixty-nine officers and 1,299 men were killed in action; 10 officers and 188 men died of wounds received in action; 69 officers and 1,894 men were severely wounded; 82 officers and 2,889 men were slightly wounded; 71 officers and 2,297 men were gassed; 13 officers and 696 men are missing; 3 officers and 31 men were reported prisoners in Germany. The very small number of reported prisoners is notable. It indicates that the spirit of the "Lost Battalion" was the spirit of the whole division at all times.

The Seventy-seventh Division captured 750 prisoners (13 officers and 737 men), as follows: No officers and 3 men in the Baccarat training sector; no officers and 27 men on the Vesle; 12 officers and 619 men in the Argonne Forest drive; 1 officer and 88 men in the advance from the Aire to the Meuse.

The Seventy-seventh Division is credited with capturing 7,600 rifles, 18 pieces of heavy artillery, 14 piece of light artillery, 46 trench mortars, and 277 machine guns, yielding the following interesting analysis: No material of any kind in the Baccarat sector; 1,000 rifles and 25 machine guns on the Vesle, but no artillery; 3,400 rifles, 5 pieces of heavy artillery, 3 pieces of light artillery, 35 trench mortars, and 155 machine guns in the Argonne drive; 3,200 rifles, 13 heavy guns, 11 light field-pieces, 11 trench mortars, and 97 machine guns in the Aire-Meuse advance.

The Seventy-seventh Division gained a total of 71½ kilometers (about 45 miles), as follows: Nothing in the Baccarat training sector; 12 kilometers in the advance from the Vesle to the Aisne; 22 kilometers in the drive through the Argonne; 37½ kilometers in the advance from the Aire to the Meuse.

IN FOUR FRONT SECTORS.

The Seventy-seventh Division operated in four different front sectors (one quiet, three active), being in the front line for a grand total of 112 days, as follows: Forty-five days in the quiet Baccarat training sector; 35 days in the active Vesle sector; 20 days in the Argonne drive; 12 days in the advance from the Aire to the Meuse.

Some idea of the flealike mobility and frequent jumps of the Seventy-seventh Division may be gathered from the fact that its headquarters has moved twenty-seven times since the division came to France to date, and further moves are impending before the last jump home. On the arrival of the Seventy-seventh in France division headquarters were pitched at Cocove Chateau on April 15; it removed to Eperlecques, in the Pas de Calais Department, April 22, for the training period under British auspices; thence to Fauquembergues June 6 and Monchy Cayean June 8.

During the Baccarat training period division headquarters set up shop at Rambervillers June 16, thence removing June 21 to Baccarat, where it remained until the division was sent into the Vesle sector. During the Vesle operation division headquarters successively occupied the premises at Bayon (Aug. 4), Coulomieres (Aug. 8), Chateau Bruyeres (Aug. 10), Marcuil-en-Dole (Aug. 12), Fere-au-Chateau (Aug. 13), and Cave N of Ferme-des-Filles (Sept. 4). September 16 division headquarters moved to Coulonges preparatory to the Argonne drive; thence to Givry-en-Argonne (Sept. 18) and to Les Vignettes (Sept. 21). The beginning of the Argonne operation found division headquarters pitched in Pau, in the Argonne Forest, whence it advanced to Champ Mahaut, the luxurious German rest resort in the heart of the Argonne (Sept. 25).

October 12 saw division headquarters roughing it on an unnamed spot in the Argonne Forest, locatable only by its artillery coordinates. From here it removed to Chatel Chehery (Oct. 12), then back to Champ Mahaut (Oct. 16) for a two weeks' rest. On October 31, at the beginning of the advance from the Aire to the Meuse, division headquarters was back again in Chatel Chehery; next day (Nov. 1) it had moved again to Cornay, thence (Nov. 3) to Verpel; (Nov. 5) to St. Pierrepont, and thence (Nov. 7) to Raucourt—its armistice stand. On November 21 it had moved back to Les Vignettes; on November 30 divisional headquarters of the Seventy-seventh settled down for its most prolonged stay at Chateauvillain, in the Chaumont training area, where it still is at present writing.

OFFICERS AND MEN DECORATED FOR BRAVERY ON THE BATTLE FIELD.

The Seventy-seventh Division has gleaned its full share of honors. It includes three winners of the congressional medal of honor—Maj. F. R. Whittlesey and Capt. George R. McMurtry, both of the "Lost Battalion," and Pvt. Albert Peck, of Hornell, N. Y.

So far, 82 distinguished-service crosses have been awarded within the division, and further awards are confidently expected. Of the 82, 26 were won by officers and 56 by men. Of the latter, 11 sergeants, 9 corporals, 35 privates, and 1 cook secured the coveted cross.

For the Infantry of the division, the record is held by the Three hundred and eighth Regiment, with 23 distinguished-service crosses, closely pressed in second place by the Three hundred and seventh Regiment, with 21; the Three hundred and sixth Regiment is third, with 17; and the Three hundred and fifth tailender, with 8.

Four members of the Three hundred and second Engineers were awarded distinguished-service crosses; likewise two members of the Three hundred and fifth Field Artillery and two members of the Three hundred and sixth Machine Gun Battalion.

The full list of those decorated to date is as follows:

THE HONOR ROLL.

Col. George Vidmer, Three hundred and sixth Infantry; Col. Raymond Sheldon, Three hundred and seventh Infantry.

Lieut. Col. Creswell Garlington, G. S. 77.

Capts. William Mack, Three hundred and fifth Infantry; Bradford Ellsworth, Three hundred and sixth Infantry; Herman E. Stadie, Three hundred and sixth Infantry; Nelson M. Holderman, Three hundred and seventh Infantry; Weston C. Jenkins, Three hundred and seventh Infantry; James M. McKibbin, Medical Corps.

First Lieuts. Theodore S. Kenyon, Three hundred and sixth Infantry; Thomas C. Colley, Three hundred and eighth Infantry; Paul R. Knight, Three hundred and eighth Infantry; Andre de Coppet, A. D. The Seventy-seventh is agog with pleasant rumors that it will move from its present training area to the Le Mans area about the middle of February, there to get in shape for embarkation. The division confidently hopes to get home some time in March.

JOB FOR EVERY MAN.

Much of the division's present activity is in preparation for the home going and sequent break-up. A determined effort is being made to find a job for every man who needs and wants one, so that every man will be cared for when the division is finally disbanded.

The Seventy-seventh Division employment bureau has been organized under the auspices of the Seventy-seventh Division Association. A major, drafted from the line for the purpose, and a large force of khaki clerks run this novel employment bureau.

Forms have been sent to every man of the division asking him, among other pertinent questions, whether he wants a job or already has one. If he wants a job, the employment form contains blanks for answering questions regarding the registrant's qualifications, personalia, previous jobs held, and nature of occupation desired or preferred. The forms sent to every member of the division also contain the pertinent question whether the registrant is an employer of labor; and if so, if he has any jobs to give away and how many men of the division he could take.

The bulk of the replies are already in and indicate that a surprisingly large percentage—approximately 70 per cent—of the men do not need jobs. An astonishingly large percentage of the members of the division, too, have turned out to be employers of labor, who are in a position to employ more men. The ideal of the Division Employment Bureau accordingly is to place all of its men who need jobs within the division itself by bringing them together with members of the division desiring employees. The bonds within the division, woven by the war, are so close that men of the division anxious for jobs are in many cases taken care of by employers within their regiments, and in some cases even in their battalions.

Only when the possibilities of employment within the division itself are exhausted will the division association look outside for work for its members.

The Seventy-seventh counts many influential friends in New York capable of giving practical assistance to the Seventy-seventh's remaining unemployed when the division comes home, and it is probable that an emissary of the Seventy-seventh, a line officer, will be sent home in the near future to get in touch with the well wishers of the division in New York and to the benefactors of its various regimental associations, with a view to having an organization all ready and functioning when the division gets back to Broadway.

DIVISION HISTORY.

Another present first-line activity is the ambitious publishing project of the division. The Seventy-seventh is justly proud of its war record, and it was accordingly planned to work up, have printed, and distribute to every returning member of the division a pamphlet embodying the brief facts of its history.

Maj. O. J. Adler was drafted from his infantry battalion and placed at the head of the newly organized staff section known as "Division History." Maj. Adler toothcombed the Seventy-seventh for poetic, artistic, and literary talent and surrounded himself with an editorial staff, occupying a large office in Chateau Villain, which has so much of the smell and feel of a newspaper office.

The project of getting out a small pamphlet history grew with the enthusiasm of "Division History" until now the Seventy-seventh plans to get out a large, handsome volume of about 250 extra-size pages, illustrated with colored plates, and about 50 half-tone pictures, making not only a permanent souvenir of the "Liberty Division" but a valuable contribution to the American-history end of the world war. The Seventy-seventh "Division History" hopes to rush work on this volume so that it can be published simultaneously with the arrival of the division in New York.

Major casualties of Seventy-seventh Division total 2,692, including 1,275 killed.

The Distinguished Service Cross has been bestowed upon Maj. Gen. Robert Alexander for his fearlessness and courage in the Argonne Battle under the most trying conditions. The Twenty-seventh Division will receive a great reception when it returns within a few days in New York City.

The Rainbow Division will receive its most wonderful demonstration of approval right here in the heart of Washington when it comes back. The people in New York City are proud of what the gallant Sixty-ninth did. They are proud of the record of the Twenty-seventh Division, but they are just as proud of the dear old Seventy-seventh Division whom they love so much. Time can not efface the deeds of all of those men. Let America give proof to the world that she has gratitude in her heart for them when they return, and that all patriotic citizens make it their own personal business to see that these men are put back to employment as quickly as possible, and that everything is done to show our approval of what they were willing to do for us.

Many of those of the 10,000 of the Seventy-seventh Division who marched up Fifth Avenue on the 22d of February, 1918, will not return. They sleep temporarily in France, and the promise made by the Government to return their last remains to this country to those of their parents who desire them should be kept. A promise made by our Government should be kept.

OF

HON. MILTON H. WELLING,

OF UTAH,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 28, 1919,

On the bill (H. R. 16104) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, I did not feel at liberty to inject myself into the discussion of this question during a consideration of the point of order. The question of order was best left in the hands of those of larger experience and a more comprehensive understanding of the parliamentary procedure of the House.

The question of order was ably presented by those who believe in the continuance of the appropriation for the United States Employment Service. Incidentally most of the reasons for the adoption of the Gallivan amendment were presented during that debate. Under the leave of the House, I now avail myself of the opportunity of saying what I had expected to say providing the amendment had been in order, as I had hoped it would be.

The advocates of the United States Employment Service are anxious that that activity should be continued during the period of readjustment and reconstruction. The pending bill and the deficiency appropriation bill presented by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] on yesterday provide for the continuation of this service until June 30, 1919, only. The service is discontinued under the terms of the pending bill, because after July 1 no appropriation is made available for its continuation.

The ruling of the Chair denies the membership of the House the opportunity to vote upon the merits of the question of continuing this important service by holding the Gallivan amendment appropriating $10,000,000 for this service out of order.

It seems to me that the service should be continued for two very good reasons. During the period of demobilizing the armed forces of the Nation thousands of men will be thrown upon the labor market in congested demobilization centers. Discontent and hardship will inspire in the hearts of these men a spirit of bitterness and resentment. The labor market will be overcrowded at these points, while many other places will suffer because there is a lack of official information as to where men could be had. There will probably never occur in the lives of these men a more critical moment than the one that finds them released from the restraints of military service and confronted with the instant necessity of applying themselves to the problem of their future employment. Then if ever in the lives of these men they will appreciate the opportunity of going to some agency of the Government they have served asking, not for charity, but for the simple means of placing themselves in touch with the labor market of the country. The Government can in no way at this time manifest a saner desire to help these men than by offering them the chance of helping themselves.

Mr. Chairman, there have grown out of this war some good things which ought to become a permanent part of our domestic policy and system of government. The war has demonstrated the universal patriotism of the masses of our people. Those whose duty it was to serve at home have shown the same devotion as the men who have gone to the front with guns in their hands. There never was a time when labor and capital were more intimately associated, or more completely helpful to each other, than during the strenuous conflict through which we have just passed.

It is of the very first importance that this relationship should continue in the future. The men who toil must not be thrown back upon the old private employment agency of the past for his information of the labor market. That system has proved expensive and irritating in the past, and will be increasingly so in the future. In the State of Utah, where I live, the cost of placing men through these private agencies in the past has averaged $6 per man employed. Since the establishment of this service under the efficient management of the Department of Labor, the cost of this service has decreased to $1.57 per man employed. Why should a laborer be obliged to pay four times as much from his own pocket for the chance to work, when such employment can be furnished by the Government at the rate quoted?

This bureau was organized hastily and imperfectly during the war, and some mistakes were made. It is now the purpose of Secretary Wilson and Chief Densmore to correct these mistakes and curtail the cost of operation of these local agencies.

Mr. Chairman, I present to the Committee of the Whole a memorial adopted unanimously by the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the State of Utah, and transmitted to me this morning by the Hon. Harden Bennion, secretary of state:

SALT LAKE, UTAH, February 26, 1919.

Congressman MILTON H. WELLING,
Washington, D. C.:

Following memorial passed Utah House of Representatives to-day:

"To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

"Your memorialists, the House of Representatives of the State of Utah in legislature assembled, most respectfully petition as follows—that

"Whereas the Government of the United States has for some time past maintained a free United States Employment Service in Salt Lake, State of Utah; and

"Whereas such service has been of inestimable value in aiding our returning soldiers, sailors, marines, and other unemployed persons to obtain employment; and

"Whereas a continuance of such service will materially aid in furnishing employment for the unemployed within the borders of our State; and

"Whereas it has come to the attention of the Legislature of the State of Utah now assembled that there is a probability that the Government of the United States may discontinue the office of the United States Employment Service in the State of Utah: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That your memorialists respectfully and earnestly petition the Congress of the United States to continue to maintain the office of the United States Free Employment Service for the State of Utah in behalf and in the interests of the men who have rendered service to their country and other persons seeking employment."

Transmitted by—

HARDEN BENNION,
Secretary of State.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH,
OF ILLINOIS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, to eliminate as much as possible the many erroneous constructions placed upon the question of Zionism, by some deliberately and by a great many others because of their lack of knowledge of the subject, I take the privilege of printing the Aims of Zionism, as presented and promulgated at a meeting of the leading Zionists of America held in Washington yesterday, with the fervent hope that it will acquaint the American people with the high-minded, humane, and just aspirations of the Zionists.

THE AIMS OF ZIONISM.

DECLARATION PRESENTED AT A MEETING OF ZIONISTS IN WASHINGTON, D. C., MARCH 2, 1919.

To our fellow citizens, to the President, to the national authorities, to the Congress in session, and to the Christian churches at the National Capital—greetings:

The Zionists of the District of Columbia, mindful, as all Americans are, of the blessings of free American institutions, hereby reavow their whole-hearted support of our Constitution, and reaffirm their unqualified loyalty to the ideals which America stands for.

The reestablishment of a Jewish commonwealth, which the peace congress, in session at Versailles, has under consideration will not affect the loyalty of the Jews to the countries of which they are citizens.

We gratefully recognize that under the benign influence of a latter-day civilization the United States and its high-minded allies intend that justice be rendered the people of Israel, after they have been deprived of their home land for over 1,800 years.

Under Jewish national rule the foundations of our present civilization were laid and proclaimed.

The Pilgrim Fathers, when they landed on the bleak New England shores, carried in their hands the Sacred Book conceived and written on Jewish soil.

Modern Christianity long ago recognized in their Savior a son of Juda, born of a Jewish mother, the lowly but supreme expounder of the message "Peace on earth, good will to men," a message subsequently embodied in that sublime motto "With charity for all, with malice toward none," which Abraham Lincoln engraved on his matchless escutcheon.

It is the aim of the Zionists to again add to principles of human conduct by establishing in Palestine a government in which social justice shall reign, where every child shall be well born and where everyone shall be taught the tolerance of a broad humanitarianism, the blessings of education, and the sacredness of peaceful toil.

A Jewish university, which will soon rear its noble walls where the prophets of old pleaded for human rights and justice, will gather under its roof Jewish men of science, establish modern laboratories for research, and keep in touch with scientific progress as it develops in other lands.

Public schools will abound, and with musical modern Hebrew, which will be the language of the land, English or French will be taught to every child, in order to open and keep open to the minds of the future Palestinians whatever shall be wrought by human brains elsewhere, as shall be chronicled in foreign literature.

Farming under modern scientific methods, already flourishing in many scattered Jewish settlements, will again make of Palestine a land "flowing with milk and honey."

Jewish artists will in due time enrich the world with native productions, adding them to the storehouses of beauty and refinement so necessary and so dear to people of culture.

Finally will churches and the State exist peacefully, side by side, precisely as in the United States, in England, in France, and Italy, and we believe that those Jews who will reassemble on the shores of the Jordan and in the shadows of Lebanon, will show themselves worthy of the hope and the confidence which the power of the allies may place in them.

These are the aims of the Zionists, this their program, and for them they would bespeak the interest, the active sympathy, and the good will of mankind.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
HON. WILLIAM H. KING,
OF UTAH,
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Sunday, January 26, 1919.

The Senate had under consideration the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow in the death of Hon. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD, late a Senator from the State of Louisiana.

"Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate, in pursuance of an order heretofore made, assembles to enable his associates to pay proper tribute to his high character and distinguished public service.

"Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives, and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, we pay tribute to-day to the memory of one who was respected and honored not only by the people of his State but by a large circle of friends and acquaintances beyond its borders. My words will come haltingly as I speak of one for whom I entertained not only a profound regard but a deep and genuine affection.

I first met Senator BROUSSARD when we were both Members of the Fifty-fifth Congress. He had won notable political victories in his own State, and by the electorate of his congressional district he was commissioned to serve in a broader field, where his ability and genius and high qualities speedily secured for him a wide acquaintance and a national prominence. Soon after meeting him we became warm friends, and during the four years that I served in the House of Representatives it was my pleasure to be associated with him in a very intimate manner. He continued in the House for a number of terms thereafter and was then chosen by his State for service in this great legislative body. I met him frequently during the years of his service in the House and after he came to this Chamber, and during all of the years of our acquaintanceship my respect and affection for him increased. While we differed in our views upon many subjects, nothing ever occurred to disturb the cordial and deep-seated friendship existing between us.

It is somewhat difficult to describe the characteristics and qualities of this man, who had all of the charm and the chivalry which finds expression in the life and conduct of the true "southern gentleman." There was a courtliness and a frank desire to please and serve others that immediately attracted attention and won the admiration and respect of those with whom he came in contact. He always manifested the keenest interest in the welfare of the weak and the unfortunate. His heart went out in a spontaneous fashion in behalf of those, no matter how humble their situation, whom he believed to be wronged or the victims of any form of oppression or tyranny. Injustice in any form aroused bitter resentment and opposition in his heart. In combating what he regarded as a wrong or as an injustice he was relentless and indeed implacable.

He so loved life in all of its forms and the sunshine and the peace and the joy of friendships that controversies and battles were not voluntarily sought or entered upon, but when the occasion, as he believed, demanded that an issue be made, he met it with unflinching courage and fought to the end, asking and giving no quarter.

Children always attracted him; he loved their smiles and their ways. Their very weakness and need of protection appealed to his nature. I have known him to stop ragged urchins upon the street, attracted by their tears and by their smiles. They realized that he was their friend, and they evinced undisguised joy and pleasure in all that he said and in their association with him, whether brief or prolonged.

Reference has been made by the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] to the love that Senator BROUSSARD had for trees and flowers. Soon after my acquaintance with him I became aware of his passionate regard for the woods, the fields, and the flowers. He would often take me into the country surrounding this city. His happiness seemed to be complete when he was walking through the woods and pointing out the trees and their varieties and characteristics and directing attention to the birds and to the flowers and to the rich treasures which nature spread out to our view.

At times he seemed to be restless in the confinement which his congressional duties compelled. He was impatient to get into the country and to escape from the conventionalities common to urban life. He derived strength, spiritually and intellectually, from contact with nature and from association with wood and field and farm and river and mountain and the varied forms of life therein. Contact with earth, Antæus-like, gave him strength and also gave him deeper sympathy with all things that have life. It has often been remarked that men of the broadest vision, of the deepest sympathy for humanity, and who possess the fullest comprehension of the purposes and mission of life come from the fields and the farms and live in close contact with nature. The thought has often been expressed that those who have glimpsed more truly the future of humanity and the destiny of this Nation came from the soil and found their chiefest joy in the fields and woods and in association with nature's rich creations. I have sometimes thought that those who live near to nature have a schoolmaster that teaches sincerity and leads the faltering footsteps into the paths of truth. It awakens within those who find joy and happiness in the forests and streams and mountains and plains an intense longing for knowledge as to the cause and purposes of life; and it develops a faith, perhaps often blind and indefinable, and produces a conviction that life is an expression of vital and eternal forces, and that back of man is a power, infinite and immeasurable, which seeks man's welfare and development and the triumph of the ethical and spiritual over the dark and sinister forces of materialism which grapple with humanity and seek to drag men into darkness and despair.

It has sometimes been said that the conventional, the artificial, and unreal take deepest root in the cities, where the lines of separation between rank and class are more distinct. However that may be, the great movements which our country has witnessed—movements moral or that made for greater political freedom—have always found the most earnest and devoted advocates in the agricultural and rural sections of the land; and from the fields and farms, from the villages and hamlets, whenever required, there have streamed mighty hosts of free Americans whose hearts responded to the call of country and duty, and whose spirits were attuned to catch the first cries for justice and for the defense of national honor.

Mr. President, Senator BROUSSARD, in his public career, manifested the characteristics which became strongly marked in his youth and were in part the product of his early life. Chivalrous and brave, kind and generous, always ready for service and sacrifice, devoted to what he conceived to be his duty regardless of the consequences—these and other characteristics equally strong and manifest accompanied him in the active and vigorous life which he led.

We often hear it said that a man is brave and courageous; and courage is often spoken of as a common attribute of man. Speaking generally, probably this must be conceded. Nevertheless, when responsibility is placed upon men, and when every act is watched by a thousand eyes and every word and deed subjected not only to examination but often to bitter and unjust criticism and misrepresentation, we find the test for true courage and bravery. Men often shrink from battling against the tide of public opinion. They surrender convictions in the face of violent opposition and bitter criticism. It is natural to desire the esteem and applause of associates. Certainly it brings satisfaction to have the praise of friends as well as those who are within the wider circle in which we move. Senator BROUSSARD was essentially a man who gave friendship and who desired friendship. He had the natural instincts of the buoyant personality. I think the man who possesses the broad view of life desires friends and associates and the maintenance of the most friendly and, indeed, affectionate relations with all who come within the range of his activities. Such a desire is not an evidence of weakness but a manifestation of the truly human, as well as the divine, within us. The cynic and the misanthrope, the person dissatisfied with life and filled with envy and hatred, is not the natural or the normal man. He is something of an excrescence upon the social organism, and too often retards and stifles progress and is a sullen foe of the forces of truth and righteousness. Our departed friend loved the living, vital, pulsing things around him—not only the trees and flowers and the birds and the voices in the field and forest, but he loved humanity and saw in man an unfolding of the purpose of a wise and beneficent Creator. Life was not in his view a failure but a triumph, not a starless midnight but the glorious effulgence of a noonday sun. Man in his view was not made to mourn but to have joy and to achieve and to accomplish. If there are sorrows and pains in man's pathway, there are likewise joy and happiness and compensations. The preponderating forces are for truth and justice, for joy and happiness, for peace and progress, leading humanity from the plain to the mountain top of sunlight and glory.

While he recognized that there was evil and darkness in the world, he believed that the forces of righteousness and truth would dominate and in the end reign supreme.

When confronted with a situation calling for action he did not temporize or compromise. He did not balance the question to determine where the advantage or the disadvantage would lie, so far as his personal welfare was affected. He sought to apply the standard of justice to private as well as to public conduct, believing that there was an immutable moral law by which all human conduct would be judged. He sought to so live that his conscience might be keen to respond to the great moral issues of life. Though, as stated, he was broad and tolerant, and, indeed, sympathetic toward the views of others, he became adamant when he thought that the right was assailed or an injustice to the weak was being done. He was not dogmatic or bigoted with respect to ethical or political issues, although where a moral issue was presented he spoke with great feeling and his nature was aroused until he became a powerful protagonist of the cause which he espoused.

My last long visit or talk with him was on the occasion of the reception given to Marshal Joffre, who came as the representative of France to this Government a few months after our country had entered the war. At the reception I recall the animated conversations that occurred between him and Marshal Joffre and M. Jusserand, the French ambassador. Senator BROUSSARD was a brilliant French scholar, and the distinguished representatives of France were greatly delighted to meet him and converse in the tongue of their beloved land. After the reception was ended, we left the building together and walked for some distance, and then stood for more than an hour talking upon many topics. It was a beautiful night, and he called attention to the stars and to the beauty and glory of the night. He spoke of Joffre and of France and of the heroic struggle which was being made by the French people to defend their nation as well as the cause of civilization. He loved the French people and had unbounded confidence in their genius and greatness. He said that the French people could not be defeated because of the sacredness of the cause for which they were fighting and because they had found their soul and possessed a heroism which was the product of something superhuman.

He was then not well and showed physical indisposition. In some manner our talk took on a religious phase. He manifested no apprehension because of his illness, and indicated that he had no terror at the thought of what we call death, and manifested a profound faith in the immortality of the soul and in the life beyond the grave. Agnosticism was repugnant to him and the materialism of the hour found no abiding place in his heart. Life to him was not an accident. He could not view man as the mere product of blind evolutionary forces. He was not a monist, but a believer in an omnipotent, everlasting Father who guides and directs and holds in His hand the destinies of man and nations.

As I recall his words that night, as well as views expressed by him upon other occasoins, I have no doubt but what there was within his soul that trust and faith so simply and beautifully expressed by Cardinal Newman:

Lead, kindly Light, amid the encircling gloom,
Lead Thou me on!
The night is dark, and I am far from home,
Lead Thou me on!
Keep Thou my feet; I do not ask to see
The distant scene; one step enough for me.

His was a faith that was perhaps not the product of philosophical inquiry and scientific investigation. He believed in God and in His power and mercy without attempting an explanation of the faith and hope within him. He saw in the woods and in the fields and in nature's varied forms of life immortality, not death. The expression of Fouche, carved upon the gates of the cemeteries of France in 1794, that "death is eternal sleep," was abhorrent to him, and he regarded it as denied and disproven by the manifold forces cognized by finite man. I believe that he was truthful with himself, and that is the form of "veracity" which, as Huxley says, "is the heart of morality." Progress, development, growth—that is the mission and purpose of life and the destiny of man. His faith in the immortality of the soul was such as that, with Paul, he could exclaim, "Oh, grave where is thy victory! Oh, death where is thy sting!"

He had no sympathy with the materialism of the age and the efforts of men to destroy the verities of Christianity by the poisonous philosophy so prevalent in the land. As science reveals the conservation of energy, so he believed in the conservation and the indestructibility of life. Mrs. Browning's words, which portray the attitude of many toward life and its great problems, accorded with the views of our friend who has passed to the life beyond. She says—

For everywhere
We're too materialistic—eating clay
(Like men of the West) instead of Adam's corn
And Noah's wine; clay by handfuls, clay by lumps,
Until we're filled up to the throat with clay,
And grow the grimy color of the ground
On which we are feeding. Ay, materialist
The age's name is. God Himself with some
Is apprehended as the bare result
Of what His hand materially has made.

One of the greatest scientists and physicists of the age, Sir Oliver Lodge, after years of devotion to the profoundest questions which relate to humanity, affirms the persistence of life beyond the grave and the perpetuity of the living, vital, and intelligent ego within man. As I recall, he regards as demonstrable to the finite mind the proposition that life is eternal, and that man's individuality persists and continues untouched by the passing of the ages and indestructible by the forces controlling and upholding the universe. But, whether it may be demonstrated as a scientific proposition, it may be established that there is an intelligent and omniscient Power creating and guiding all. The history of humanity discloses that the human heart longs for communion with some power higher than that of man's, and seeks for guidance through the shadows of life from a source beyond this terrestrial sphere. And in all the ages from beyond the skies has come that light and spirit and faith that has illumined man's pathway, uplifted his soul, glorified his life, and opened his ears to the Voice that spake the truths for guidance and salvation.

Mr. President, this I feel was the faith of ROBERT F. BROUSSARD. Death did not bring annihilation. Buddhism, with its Nirvâna, which seeks through the door of life death and extinction, was a creed to him repellent. What a contrast there is between it and the Christian faith which teaches that through the shadow of the grave there comes life, everlasting, eternal life!

And so, Mr. President, our friend is not dead; he lives and in a wider sphere seeks growth and development and service and achievement. His life was rich in service, and his labors enriched his State and the Nation and added to the great reservoir of humanity's achievements. A strong, brave, chivalrous man has gone from our midst. His memory we will cherish in our hearts; his labors will live after him.

HON. DENVER S. CHURCH,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, Sequoyah, the great Cherokee Indian philosopher, was born as nearly as is known in the year 1770. He died near San Fernandino, northern New Mexico, in 1842. Sequoyah was a man of genius and exercised his gifts in numerous ways. He was a silversmith, blacksmith, and artist. His crowning achievement was the invention of the Cherokee alphabet.

This alphabet was the first thing of its kind among his people. It was a great success, and by it the Indians learned to write and read with but little trouble. It was employed by the missionaries and afterwards, in part, used in printing a newspaper called the Phoenix, the first newspaper ever printed in the American and Cherokee languages.

This alphabet brought hope to a dark and benighted land. When the names of the great Indian warriors are no longer remembered, and the strange, sweet stories of "Pisa," "The Enchanted Mountain," and "The Daughters of the Sun," together with other romances and Indian traditions are no longer told, the name of their old teacher, Sequoyah, will still stand forth as the conspicuous figure in Indian history.

Many men of birth, ambition, and opportunity have arisen in the past and performed valuable services for humanity, but Sequoyah was an Indian, born in a tent before the Revolutionary War, his mother a full-blood Cherokee. He was born in a land without a church, a schoolhouse, or civilization, yet he caused a light in the forest which enabled his people to catch glimpses of a different landscape and the outlines of a far-away horizon. Sequoyah's birth brought to his people the sunrise of their first day of civilization.

I am pleased to state that his worth was recognized during his lifetime by the Indians. Civilization, you know, has been in the habit of executing its chief benefactors. He was sent to Washington as a representative of the Cherokee West in 1828, and before this, in 1823, for the invention of the Cherokee alphabet he had been given by the Cherokee General Council a silver medal. His services were also recognized by Congress and an appropriation was made upon his representation. Money was furnished by the Government of the United States for the establishment of a printing plant, where the first newspaper ever printed in any Indian language was printed in Georgia, February 21, 1828.

In 1911 the State Legislature of Oklahoma authorized the placing of a statue of Sequoyah in Statuary Hall, here in the Capitol of the United States, he being chosen as one of the distinguished citizens of Oklahoma. This statue stands here today as the monument of love and affection of the two and one-half million people of the State of Oklahoma. One of the counties of Oklahoma is also named for him, and the place in the county where he once lived is regarded almost as holy ground. Societies and leagues for the benefit of the Indians throughout the country, in some instances, bear his name.

Science has also honored the old Indian teacher by naming the great redwoods of California for him, calling them Sequoia. But more pleasing than all this is the fact that the Government of the United States has also honored his name.

Over in my district in California, on the western slope of the Sierras, at an elevation of 6,500 feet, stands the greatest grove of Sequoia trees that can be found in the world. In this grove upwards of 12,000 of these ancient wonders toss their defiant branches to the sky. In 1890 the Government of the United States dedicated the 250 square miles on which these trees are found to a national park and, in honor of the old Cherokee philosopher and child of the forest, it was given the appropriate name of the Sequoia National Park.

If old Sequoyah could come back, riding his favorite horse, from beyond the Milky Way, down the wide road of the Indian dead, and halt on a wooded ridgeway opposite this great park empire—wild, rugged, picturesque as it is, and containing about one-half of all the Sequoia gigantea trees of the world—his old Indian heart would throb with joy and his bosom swell with pride as he beheld the matchless landscape that bears his name. The grandeur of the old red hills of Georgia, the land of his childhood, and the charming landscapes of Oklahoma and New Mexico would be far outclassed by a view of this great park. He would find it far more wonderful than his own early description of the enchanted island of "Okefinokee."

The word "Sequoyah" in Cherokee means "he guessed it." There is no other place on earth where one is filled with so much wonder as when strolling among these great trees. There is no way of solving their mystery except through a guess. They are found nowhere on earth except in this park, and within 200 miles of its boundary. They are acknowledged to be the oldest living things on earth. They are regarded by scientists as the scanty and sole survivors, with but slight variation, of an ancient order of forest trees which flourished extensively during the Cretaceous and Tertiary periods of the earth's life, contemporaneous with such huge animals as the dinotherium, megatherium, mammoth, and monster reptiles long since extinct. The average height of the Sequoia gigantea is about 275 feet, but some have been found to be as high as 325 feet. Their average diameter is about 20 feet, though in nearly every grove some are found with more than 30 feet diameter. Six-horse stagecoaches, with 15 or 20 passengers, have often been driven for a hundred feet or more upon the prostrate bodies of these fallen giants. In several trees ancient fires have burned a passageway through the great trunk, and wagon roads are constructed so tourists can drive through the very heart of the standing tree.

The largest tree in the Sequoia Park is the General Sherman. It has a base circumference of 102 feet at the ground. An authority has said that this tree would furnish two-rail fencing from 20 to 30 miles, or produce lumber enough to make one telegraph pole 40 miles in length, or supply a line of poles from Kansas City to Chicago.

Mr. Speaker, I believe these big trees are the most wonderful objects on earth. On viewing them one is filled with reverence and wonder. There they stand without kith or kin, survivors of another age from which all but they are gone. If they could speak what strange stories they would tell. They would give a history not written on tablets nor in books, but on circles, strata, petrification, and banks of ancient shells. They would give the mystery of the Golden Gate. But they can not speak. Oh, yes, they can; they speak in silvery tones to all who pass their way. In days gone by they have whispered and talked to me. When as a shoeless child I tried to climb their rough and rugged trunks, they spoke to me. And in after years when I camped alone amid their groves and heard the forest winds and saw the shadows change as the great moon drifted overhead, they spoke to me. And in wintertime far back in Sierras heights, when the snow was deep and fond memories constrained me to visit my ancient friends, I found them standing as they had stood through the ages, and there in solitude, clad in overcoats of snow, these sullen, sulky giants spoke to me. They taught me to love my fellow man. They taught me to be broad, generous, and true, too big to do a willful wrong.

Mr. Speaker, as the alphabet invented by the namesake of the great trees of California brought new hope and new destiny to the Cherokee, so all who visit the great Sequoia trees of California learn lessons and receive impressions that remain with them through life.

Gentlemen, there has been a bill prepared by the Park Service, that is now pending in this House, asking that the name of the Sequoia National Park be changed to the Roosevelt National Park, and that there be added to the 250 square miles that now constitute the park 1,350 square miles of territory. How anyone could possibly find it in his heart to want to rob old Sequoyah, the greatest North American Indian of all times, of the honor of having one of our national parks bear his name is past my comprehension. I am sure that the great Roosevelt would not have sanctioned it for a moment. Strange enough, the move comes from the Department of the Interior, which is the legal custodian of the Indians' property and rights. I have no fear that Congress will ever pass this bill. If it did, it would be an insult to every Indian and the friend of every Indian in this country. Col. Roosevelt during his lifetime never set his foot in the Sequoia National Park, and I am sure his memory can be properly honored if his name is connected with the Panama Canal or some other work that he aided by his great influence.

Is it possible after having driven the Indians from their ancient haunts and hunting grounds that we are not generous enough to permit a small portion of their ancient domain to bear the name of their chief benefactor? Having about exterminated the Indian, do we now propose to blot out his name forever? No; the American people will never permit the name of Sequoyah, the old Indian philosopher, to be blotted from the memory of man.

Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration was passed by the Senate. That body changed the name of the Sequoia National Park to the Roosevelt National Park and added to the 250 square miles that now constitute the park 1,350 additional square miles, making in all under the Senate bill a vast domain of 1,600 square miles.

The Public Lands Committee of the House amended the Senate bill by cutting out the added territory of 1,350 square miles, but left the name changed as it was when it came from the Senate.

The object of the Park Service in pressing this amended bill to passage is for the purpose of getting it into conference, where it is hoped by the service that the 1,350 square miles of territory eliminated by the Public Lands Committee of the House, or at least a large portion of it, will be restored in the bill.

Gentlemen, I want to call your attention to the fact that we now have more land embraced in our national parks than can be improved by the use of the money which is received through appropriations from year to year. Every year the estimates submitted by the Park Service are tremendously cut down by the Appropriations Committee.

As a matter of fact we have already too many, or at least enough, national parks. We have 18 that I can recall and 21 national monuments under the jurisdiction of the park service, a domain of more than 10,000 square miles, an acreage greater than the combined territory constituting the States of Connecticut and Rhode Island. If Uncle Sam keeps on, his playgrounds will be larger than the rest of his farm.

When we have not enough money with which to improve existing parks what is the use of creating more?

At this time when the American people are groaning beneath their burden of taxation, why spend our time in creating new parks which call for the annual expenditure of large sums of money to maintain them?

Mr. Speaker, one branch of the Department of the Interior is now asking for a tremendous appropriation for the purpose of starting new irrigation projects so that the returning soldier will have room on which to build himself a home, a most commendable enterprise, while another branch of the same department, the National Park Service, is asking to extend its domain over 1,350 square miles of mother earth and thus prevent the possibility of thousands of summer homes from being established. There is no better place on earth for summer homes than on this land which they seek to condemn.

On this 1,350 square miles it has been estimated by the Department of Agriculture that 2,000,000,000 feet of timber is now growing. Under the present administration of this land by the Forestry Department this timber is rapidly being converted into lumber and thus being made to contribute to the comforts and necessities of life. If this proposed park extension is made, this timber will be dedicated to perpetual waste and decay. They do not sell timber in our National Parks.

On this vast section of land under consideration, which amounts to 864,000 acres, 7,000 head of cattle graze and fatten during the summer months, and 30,000 head of sheep find there their summer range. The Park Service does not permit cattle to graze in our western parks except during war times and times of great distress. Sheep are never permitted in our parks. Durings the six years that I have been a Member of Congress I have almost worn out a typewriting machine asking that starving cattle, pinched by cold and stunned by drought, be permitted to pick up the feed that was wasting in the adjacent park. My supplications were generally without avail.

If the Park Service has its way in reference to this extension, the meat consumers of this country at this time of food and meat scarcity will be deprived of the annual increase of 7,000 head of cattle and 30,000 head of sheep.

You ask why this stock can not go to some other range? My answer is, There is no other range. All the ranges outside of the national parks are occupied by other stockmen. If they undertake to move their herds toward the north they will find themselves intruders on the General Grant National Park. If they go north of that park they will find their stock taken into custody by the keeper of the 1,125 square miles which constitute the Yosemite National Park. If they go still farther north in California they will find themselves in the Lassen Volcanic National Park, and if in despair they finally conclude to seek a place of refuge from the national parks of California and go into southern Oregon they will find their stock are feeding within the boundaries of the 250 square miles constituting the Crater Lake National Park. In this day of meat conservation the cattle and sheep industry in the United States is being, in a measure, strangled by the creation of national parks.

As a matter of fact, we do not need any more national parks or any more park extensions. We have more parks now than 1 in 10,000 of the people of this country have ever yet seen. The park authorities here in Washington have, in my opinion, more parks under their control than even they have ever thoroughly explored. I am somewhat of a mountaineer myself, and I state as my best judgment that there are at least 1,500 square miles in the Yellowstone, 500 square miles in the Yosemite, 500 in the Glacier, 200 in the Rocky Mountain, and at least 150 square miles in the Sequoia National Park as it now exists that the present park director has never set his foot upon. I predict if this bill goes through the House and gets into conference and this 1,350 square miles of territory which has been eliminated by the Public Lands Committee of the House is rewritten in the bill, and that it finally in that form becomes a law, that there will be at least 500 square miles of this added territory that Mr. Mather will never during his lifetime be close enough to see except through a spyglass. I do not say this because I would have you believe that the Director of the National Park Service is not capable and active, for he is, but I say it to impress upon you the fact that we have now more national playgrounds than we have time to enjoy or explore.

Even the Yellowstone National Park, next to the oldest one of our parks, with its 3,300 square miles of territory, has only been visited by a small per cent of our people. Have you ever explored it—this great wonderland, containing more geysers than there are outside of it in all the world, with its boiling springs, mud geysers, and petrified forests, with its lakes, canyons, and wonderful waterfalls? It has almost an unexplored wilderness where roam deer, elk, mountain sheep, bear, panther, and all the other animals that live in the great forest; besides this there are countless birds of rare plumage and sweet song that enchant and charm the woods.

And then there is Glacier Park in Montana, near by, with its 1,534 square miles of territory, most of which the tourist has not yet set his foot upon. It is a rugged mountainous region of Alpine beauty unsurpassed. It has 250 lakes, blue and deep, that are fed by glaciers. Besides this, 60 small glaciers add to the interest of this wonderful land. Peaks, canyons thousands of feet in depth, and mountain ranges add to the wonder of the landscape. Why not build trails and more roads and really open up this wonderland? The people have not seen it.

And the Rocky Mountain Park, in the heart of the Rockies, out yonder on the border of the West. It is close at hand. It has 400 square miles within its boundaries and mountain ranges and peaks from 11,000 to 14,200 feet in height.

And the Yosemite National Park, which contains 1,125 square miles of scenic wonder, its boundary but 40 short miles from the boundary of the extension proposed. In this park there is room for the recreation and amusement of the tourists of the world.

I might go on and mention the other national parks, but they are too numerous to mention. There are two national parks in my district, and all this vast domain proposed to be added is also located there. My district is also bounded on the north by the Yosemite.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion let me say I am opposed to both the change of the name of the park and also to the extension. To change its name is neither necessary nor fair; not necessary because there are many other ways of honoring the name of the deceased ex-President, and it is not fair to either one of the men who have passed away that the name should be changed.

Probably this country has never produced two more brave men than Theodore Roosevelt and old Sequoyah. They were firm, steadfast, unyielding, and brave. They were iron men of America. Either of them would fight for what he thought was right and what was his own. But both were too proud and honorable to even accept that which belonged to another. If Roosevelt were alive his voice would roar across the continent denouncing the thought that he would usurp the glory belonging to the old Indian. Were he alive the proposers of this change, in my opinion, would hardly be safe.

Sequoyah won his honors in a death grapple with conditions that were all against him. Naked and half starved, with bow and arrow he fought his way up and out of the wilderness. Cold, starvation, and privation were his only companions during the first 50 years of his life. To take away the honors achieved in such a struggle would be worse than to have stolen the wolfskin, his only bed in childhood, or the roots and meal from the bottom of the bin in the wigwam of his mother.

No friend of Theodore Roosevelt should press this bill, and all lovers of a square deal should assist in defeating it.

The extension proposed is as unnecessary as the change in name is inhuman. It will cause too many heartaches and bring no happiness in return, except to those who are eager to enlarge their power. The home builders of the country will suffer because it will prevent in time 2,000,000,000 feet of lumber from being placed upon the market. The cattle and sheep men who rely on this pasture will have to sell their flocks and herds and homes and go down out of the mountains. I love these sturdy mountaineers, and I hate to see them go. I know their trials, hopes, and fears, and for this reason I am opposed to the bill.

If this 1,350 miles of proposed extension is really added to the park it will act as a bar, and will keep people out of the section instead of encouraging them to enter it. The territory involved is now under the liberal administration of the Forestry Department, and there is every inducement for campers and tourists to enter it. There is free grazing, free hunting, free fishing, free camping, and no restrictions except to keep down forest fires. If it goes under the national park administration, it will be bombarded with petty rules. The trees will be heavily laden with signs telling people when to camp and where, and when to move and how. There is a different atmosphere in the parks from that in the forest reserves. In the forest reserves one feels at home, but in the national parks he feels like an intruder; like he was under deep and lasting obligations to the superintendent of the park for his visit.

Let me call your attention also to the fact that the territory under consideration is a great hunting ground. People from all parts of the country go to that region to hunt deer and bear, that are numerous in those mountains. All this will be done away, for guns are not permitted to be fired in our national parks. A person would be as much out of place in that section without a gun as one of the House reporters would be here without pen or pencil. People want firearms when they go camping, and a camp without firearms is like a knife without a blade. Campers will not go where they can not take guns.

The fact that hunting would not be permitted if this proposed extension were made would keep more people out of the territory than all the advertising of the park service would bring into it.

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely trust this bill will not become law.

Soldiers' Land Bill.

OF

HON. WILLIAM W. HASTINGS,

OF OKLAHOMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, everyone is proud of the record our gallant soldiers made in the war with Germany. We were forced into the war, but we knew in advance that the brave sons of America would uphold the historic traditions of our beloved country. They fought for the ideals of our country, in defense of our flag, for humanity, and for the liberty of the world.

Had we not entered the war Germany would perhaps have conquered Europe, triumphed over Great Britain, and in the end endangered the independence of our country.

Celebrations will be held throughout every county in the United States and in the large cities and towns commemorating the signing of the armistice. They will also be held upon the anniversary dates of the principal battles in which our brave boys were engaged. We can not honor them too highly, and it is not only a pleasure but a privilege to join with our other fellow citizens in these celebrations. However, this is not enough. We should do something more for the men who left their homes and loved ones and entered the Army and Navy, willing to make every sacrifice to defend the honor and glory of their country. The Congress did much in advance for those who went forth to defend us. Additional compensation was provided and provision was made for allotments, both from the soldiers' compensation and from the Federal Treasury, to be paid their loved ones dependent upon them. We provided compensation in lieu of a pension for those who suffered disability in the service, graduated in amount according to disability. We made it possible for the soldier and the sailor to take out insurance on a peace basis to the amount of $10,000 each. We provided for vocational training for the returned disabled soldier who is unable to follow his old trade. We made liberal appropriations for food, clothing, and equipment. We appropriated every dollar requested by the War and Navy Departments for military equipment and supplies of all kinds. We all rejoice that the war is over, and in these days of reconstruction many plans are proposed for aiding these discharged men. It is my earnest hope to be of some practical, substantial assistance to them. With that end in view, I have prepared and introduced a short amendment to the farm-loan act (H. R. 16213), which, in my judgment, is practical and will be of much help to them. I invite the earnest consideration of Congress to it.

The bill proposed by me amends two sections of the Federal farm-loan act approved July 17, 1916.

Paragraph 5, section 12, of this act only permits loans to be made to the amount of 50 per cent of the value of the land and 20 per cent of the value of the permanent, insured improvements. These loans are made through local associations. The bill introduced by me provides that loans may be made to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines to the amount of 100 per cent of the appraised value of the land and the permanent, insured improvements thereon; but it divides the amount borrowed into a first and a second loan. The first loan is for 50 per cent of the appraised value of the land and 20 per cent of the appraised value of the permanent, insured improvements and is made in all respects the same as to any other borrower. The second loan that I propose would be up to and not in excess of 100 per cent in the aggregate of the appraised value of the land and the permanent, insured improvements. This second loan is secured by a second mortgage on the land and improvements and is also secured by an assignment of the insurance of the borrower, taken from the Government under the war-risk insurance act and acts amendatory thereof.

Now, as to the first loans, the notes and mortgages are used by the farm loan banks for the security of the bonds issued, the same as notes and mortgages of other borrowers, but the Government issues its own bonds to supply the money for the second loans secured by the second mortgages and insurance. These bonds shall be denominated "soldiers' bonds." By this plan the Government is insured against loss and the honorably discharged soldier, sailor, or marine wishing to own a farm gets cheap money. He is permitted to borrow it from 5 to 40 years, payable upon the amortization plan, just as other borrowers under the Federal farm loan act.

In addition, this bill proposes to amend section 15 and permit farm land banks, with the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to appoint agents all over the country, through whom applications for loans would be transmitted to the farm land banks. This would not necessitate the discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines joining local farm loan associations. The plan does not amend the Federal farm loan act in any other particular, but leaves it in full force and effect. I want to briefly call attention to the advantages contained in this bill.

In the first place, it will enable honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines to borrow money for a long time at a low rate of interest, payable in installments, sufficient in amount to purchase and improve a home. It would permit them to borrow not only 50 per cent of the value of the land and 20 per cent of the value of the improvements, as provided in the farm loan act, but it would permit them to borrow the full value. It would permit them to look up their own farms, initiate their own transactions, and buy in any locality in any county or State in which they reside or desire to live.

In the second place, it would not require any additional administrative force to carry the act into effect, but the same would be administered by the farm-loan banks and their employees. This would avoid any delays in the act going into practical operation and would insure immediate results. Therefore there would be no additional overhead expense. The first loans will be treated exactly as any other loans. The money to make them will be obtained by the sale of farm-land bonds.

The bill proposed by me provides that the Government shall sell its own bonds to the amount of the second loans and the money derived from the sale of these bonds is to be loaned through the farm-land banks to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines. These Government bonds, denominated "soldiers' bonds," are to be nontaxable, just as far as farm-land bank bonds are nontaxable. They are to be sold at not to pay a higher interest rate than 4½ per cent and not below par. The second loan is to be made at the same rate as the first loan and upon the same terms and conditions. This means, of course, that these loans are to be made from 5 to 40 years, payable upon the installment plan, the same as the first loan, but the notes and mortgages for the second loans are not to be used as security for the farm-loan bonds issued, but the proceeds are to be used in the payment of Government bonds.

It will be seen, therefore, that the bill proposed by me will not depreciate the farm-loan bonds, but that the money is loaned direct from the Government on the second-loan notes and mortgages and the soldier's insurance, through the farm-land banks. This will not necessitate another examination of the title or an additional appraisement of the land. In fact, no additional work will be required, because the loan will be made at the same time at which the first loan is made.

The Government will be adequately secured, because, in addition to the second mortgage given to secure the second loan, the soldier, sailor, or marine is required to assign the insurance that he has in force, taken out from the Government through the war-risk insurance act and acts amendatory thereof. In other words, as additional security, the Government has assigned to it its own insurance.

As the notes secured by the second loans are paid, the proceeds, both principal and interest, are to be applied to the payment and the retirement of the bonds issued and sold by the Government to secure money with which to make these loans. It will be seen that the Government is secured in every respect against loss. These amendments will provide substantial assistance to the men who made large sacrifices and were willing to endure everything in defense of our flag and country.

The returning soldier, appreciative of the merited recognition of a grateful Republic, will take possession of the land purchased for a home, repair, add to, and erect new improvements thereon, as well as clear up and reduce it to a state of cultivation. All this will add greatly to the value of the land. Good agricultural land in my State in the last five years has increased from 50 to 75 per cent in value. Much of it has doubled in value. This is doubtless true of farm land throughout the whole Nation. Every industrious home owner beautifies his home and enhances the value of his land. As the land increases in value and as the loan is reduced by amortized payments, the second mortgage held to pay the Government bonds will become better security.

In addition, the amendment to section 15 provides that a local agent may be appointed through whom these applications may be made for loans, so that the honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines will not have to become members of local farm loan associations. This would insure immediate consideration of the applications and expedite action upon them in every way.

When the original farm loan act was under consideration by the Banking and Currency Committee I was a member of that committee. In the committee and on the floor of the House I criticized the provision requiring that prospective borrowers become members of local farm loan associations before being able to secure loans. I tried to have the same amended when the bill was under consideration in the House. I called attention to the fact then that the organization of local farm loan associations would cause vexatious delays and would have the effect of defeating the purposes of the act. A man can not wait 90 days or longer for the formation of a local association through which to apply for a loan, after he purchases a farm. He must know with reasonable certainty immediately, or not later than a week or 10 days. If this amendment is adopted, local associations will not be necessary, but agents would be appointed throughout the country, and applications may be made and forwarded through them to the farm land banks. These agents in a short time will become so proficient that they will see that all the papers necessary to accompany an application are made in due and proper form, and that the abstract accompanying the same is completed, thus avoiding many interminable delays. There is no reason why an application should not receive favorable action within 10 days at most. This amendment should apply to all borrowers, including soldiers, sailors, and marines.

Every other plan that I have heard suggested involves the creation of new bureaus, with a vast army of employees, involving too much overhead expense.

The plan presented in this bill does not involve any additional expense, but uses the machinery of the farm land banks to come to the aid of the defenders of our country. Instead of spending money upon employees, I want to give the benefits to the man who made sacrifices that liberty should not perish throughout the world.

I can not too strongly emphasize the fact that this plan provides money for soldiers, sailors, and marines to purchase land in the locality of their choice and allows them to exercise some judgment in the selection of it. It does not necessitate their leaving the community where their friends and loved ones reside in order to secure a home.

I want also to emphasize the fact that this plan provides cheap money to them. The money can be borrowed from 5 to 40 years upon the amortization plan, providing for the payment of 1 per cent additional annually or one-half per cent semiannually as a payment upon the principal on long-time loans. The returning soldiers of our country are only asking a fair chance, and this plan gives it to them. It enables everyone who desires a tract of farm land to purchase it for a home.

In the long run the Government will not be out anything. The bonds issued by the Government will be repaid out of the collections, principal and interest, of the second mortgages, and, as additional security for these second loans, the insurance which the soldiers, sailors, and marines have taken out from the Government is assigned. Certainly the Government's own insurance is good security. This insurance must be kept alive and in full force and effect, and this of itself will be helpful in inducing them to keep the insurance in force. In the event of a man's death his wife or other dependents can pay off the loan upon the farm with the insurance and have a home.

In addition to the general legislation enacted for the benefit of men in the service during this war, we have given them a small additional sum to tide them over their period of unemployment. This bill will prove of substantial and lasting benefit to them. It affords the men opportunity to get cheap money, is an inducement to purchase homes, gives them employment, encourages thrift and economy, and will prove of permanent benefit to them. It will aid in the development of our country and show that this Republic is not ungrateful to the men who were willing to sacrifice all in order that liberty might live.

I voted for the declaration of war against Germany. There was no other course to pursue. I voted for all the legislation recommended as necessary and the appropriations asked, in order that we might triumph over German military force. From the date of the passage of the resolution in April, 1917, until the armistice was signed and proclaimed on November 11, 1918, I felt keenly the responsibility laid upon the representatives of the people of this country. I now feel as keenly the necessity for proper and just recognition of the services of the men who were ready and willing to carry the Stars and Stripes to victory. Their services were invaluable.

Be it enacted, etc., That the fifth paragraph of section 12 of the act entitled "An act to provide capital for agricultural development, to create standard forms of investment based upon farm mortgage, to equalize rates of interest upon farm loans, to furnish a market for United States bonds, to create Government depositaries and financial agents for the United States, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1916, shall be amended so as to read as follows:

"Fifth. No such loan shall exceed 50 per cent of the value of the land mortgaged and 20 per cent of the value of the permanent, insured improvements thereon, said value to be ascertained by appraisal, as provided in section 10 of this act: Provided, That loans may be made as hereinafter provided, to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the war with Germany, to an amount equaling 100 per cent of the value of the land and permanent, insured improvements thereon: Provided further, That the loans shall be divided so that a first mortgage shall be taken upon the land and the improvements in each case to secure the note for a first loan in an amount not to exceed 50 per cent of the value of the land mortgaged and 20 per cent of the value of the permanent, insured improvements thereon, which notes for said amounts may be used by the farm-loan banks as security for the farm-loan bonds, the same as notes made by other borrowers, and a second mortgage shall be taken upon the land and the permanent, insured improvements thereon to secure a second loan evidenced by a note for the remainder of the loan in each case, in an amount in the aggregate not to exceed 100 per cent of the value of the land and the permanent, insured improvements thereon, which said second mortgages shall be held by the farm-land bank of the district in which the land and improvements so mortgaged are located, and collections shall be made on them, both as to principal and interest, the same as notes secured by first mortgages; and the United States shall issue its bonds, which shall be denominated 'soldiers' bonds,' to such an amount as may be necessary to make the proceeds equal the amount of the second mortgages, which said bonds shall be nontaxable and bear interest at a rate not to exceed 4½ per cent and be sold for not less than par value, and the money shall be loaned to said honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines at the same rate as paid upon the notes secured by the first mortgages, and the proceeds derived from the payment of the notes secured by the second mortgages shall, when collected, be used for the payment and retirement of the Government bonds herein authorized to be issued: Provided, however, That said second loan shall be made only to those honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines who carry life insurance under the war-risk insurance act approved October 6, 1917, and acts amendatory thereof, in full force and effect, which shall be assigned and held as additional security for said second loan.

"In making said appraisal the value of the land for agricultural purposes shall be the basis of appraisal and the earning power of said land shall be a principal factor.

"A reappraisal may be permitted at any time in the discretion of the Federal land bank, and such additional loan may be granted as such reappraisal will warrant under the provisions of this paragraph. Whenever the amount of the loan applied for exceeds the amount that may be loaned under the appraisal as herein limited, such loan may be granted to the amount permitted under the terms of this paragraph without requiring a new application or appraisal."

SEC. 2. That section 15 of said act shall be amended by adding at the end of said section the following paragraph:

"Each farm-land bank in its respective district is authorized to make loans to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines on farm lands through agents appointed by it and approved by the Federal Farm Loan Board, which agents may be other than duly incorporated banks, trust companies, mortgage companies, or savings institutions chartered by the State in which they have their principal office."

River and Harbor Appropriation Bill.

OF

HON. CALEB POWERS,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, the river and harbor bill recently passed by both House and Senate and signed by the President and which is now a law carries a provision of much interest and great importance to the whole State of Kentucky, and especially that portion of Kentucky which lies in the congressional district I have the honor to represent. I refer to that provision which indorses the expenditure of four and one-half million dollars for the complete canalization of the upper Cumberland River from Burnside, Ky., to Nashville, Tenn., and which makes immediately available for that purpose the sum of $340,000, a part of which sum will be used in purchasing all the lock and dam sites in Kentucky and Tennessee.

When these sites are selected and locks and dams built thereon, it will complete the canalization of the entire upper Cumberland from Nashville to Burnside. There are now seven locks and dams in the Cumberland River, in the State of Tennessee, above Nashville, and a site already selected for the eighth lock and dam. On the Kentucky side we have but one lock and dam, namely, Lock and Dam 21, 30 miles below Burnside, Ky. The sites for all the new locks and dams on the Kentucky side will have to be selected and paid for.

Away back in 1882 Congress made provision for a survey of the upper Cumberland River to determine the feasibility and cost of improving it from Nashville, Tenn., to Burnside, Ky. The report of this survey also included the improvement of the Cumberland River to Smith Shoals above Burnside, Ky. The entire project, as later revised, provided for the construction of 28 locks and dams, also a minimum depth of 6 feet in the river for the entire distance from Nashville, Tenn., to the proposed head of navigation, a distance of 357 miles. This was approved by Congress, and work on this project was commenced in 1888 and was continued at intervals up to February 26, 1906, when the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors recommended that the work on the locks and dams already begun should be completed and that the rest of the project should be discontinued.

Locks 1 and 2, on the Tennessee side, had at that time been completed, while Lock 21, on the Kentucky side, and Locks 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, on the Tennessee side, were under construction. Since February 26, 1906, Lock 21, on the Kentucky side, and Locks 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, on the Tennessee side, have been completed, but it must be remembered that on February 26, 1906, the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors said that they would not recommend any more money for any further improvement on the upper Cumberland River, either on the Kentucky or the Tennessee side, except to complete the locks and dams already begun.

This report of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, made on February 26, 1906, put the upper Cumberland River "on the bum," so to speak, and not a single cent of money has been expended since that day, except on Lock 21, for the buying of a single site for any other lock and dam in the Cumberland River on the Kentucky side, nor the appropriation of a single cent for the construction of one.

It has been the policy of the Government to begin at the mouth of the river and build locks and dams from the mouth up, and not from the head down. This accounts for the fact that, while the Government in 1882 decided upon the policy of improving and canalizing the entire upper Cumberland and adhered steadfastly to that policy for a quarter of a century, no Member of Congress from the eleventh congressional district of Kentucky was able to get any money appropriated to begin building locks and dams at the upper end of the river below Burnside, Ky.; and this, too, notwithstanding the fact that the eleventh congressional district during all this time was represented by a Republican Representative, and notwithstanding the further fact that during the last 16 years of this period, or down to March 4, 1911, the Republican Party was in power in the Nation, with Republican Presidents in the White House, supported by Republican Congresses.

During the Republican rule Democratic Members of Congress from the State of Tennessee had gotten from Republican Congresses appropriations sufficient to build and construct Locks and Dams 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 in the Cumberland River above Nashville, Tenn. These appropriations, all told, will amount, in round numbers, to $3,000,000. Republican Members of Congress from the eleventh congressional district were just as able men as those from the State of Tennessee and just as faithful to their trusts; but they were unable to induce the Government to break its precedent and policy of improving its navigable rivers from the mouth up and not from the head down, and it remained for Dr. W. Godfrey Hunter to break this precedent, who secured the first appropriation for Lock 21.

WHAT HAD TO BE DONE TO SECURE APPROPRIATIONS.

It is an impossible task to get Congress to make an appropriation to build a lock and dam in any stream unless the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors and the Chief of Engineers of the Army recommend such construction. On February 26, 1906, they said in a report that the commerce in the upper Cumberland was not sufficient to justify the Government in expending more money in constructing locks and dams in the upper Cumberland on the Kentucky side except to complete Lock and Dam 21, as I have heretofore pointed out. This report of February 26, 1906, was made during the first year of Congressman Edwards's first term in Congress, and during the remaining five years he was a Member of the House he was unable to get the Government to reverse itself. He was unable to get any money appropriated to start any new locks and dams in the upper Cumberland, although he worked hard and faithfully to that end. It was a difficult thing to do.

When I became a Member of Congress on March 4, 1911, I found the upper Cumberland still under the ban, the Government refusing to start any new locks and dams there. All those conversant with the situation and interested in the canalization of the upper Cumberland knew that we never would get Congress to appropriate any more money for the purpose unless we could get a favorable report from the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors to that effect. Realizing our dilemma, those interested in the improvement of the upper Cumberland set to work to see if they could get the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors to reverse itself and report favorably instead of adversely upon the further canalization of the upper Cumberland. The first logical step in this matter was the introduction of a resolution before the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House of Representatives, and accordingly the following resolution was introduced before and passed by that body:

Resolved by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives of the United States, That the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, created under section 3 of the river and harbor act, approved June 13, 1902, be requested to reconsider its previous reports on Cumberland River above Nashville, Tenn., and to make a further report with recommendation as to the desirability at the present time of constructing one or more locks and dams above Lock No. 7.

On December 5, 1912, the said board granted a hearing here in Washington to those interested in the canalization of the upper Cumberland, and Congressman CORDELL HULL, who represents the Tennessee district on the Cumberland River just south of the Kentucky boundary line, myself, and others appeared before that board and made arguments for the complete canalization of the upper Cumberland from Burnside, Ky., to Nashville, Tenn. We urged that the commerce in the upper Cumberland and the isolation of our people from railroads and the lack of transportation facilities fully justified the Government in spending the money to improve and canalize this stream. We asked for a new survey of the upper Cumberland.

The board granted our request and instructed the local engineer, Maj. Burgess, who is stationed at Nashville, Tenn., to make a complete survey of the upper Cumberland from Burnside, Ky., to Nashville, Tenn., which he did, making his report on December 30, 1913. Maj. Burgess made a most thorough and exhaustive examination of the advisability of a complete canalization of the Cumberland River between those two points and reported favorably on that project. He estimated that it would cost the Government $4,500,000 to complete the canalization of the upper Cumberland from Burnside, Ky., to Nashville, Tenn.; that four new sites for locks and dams would have to be secured on the Tennessee side and six or eight on the Kentucky side, and that to purchase these sites and construct the necessary locks and dams would cost about $4,500,000, and that it ought to be done at the expense of the Government.

The division engineer differed from Maj. Burgess, the local engineer, in this: The division engineer recommended that the canalization of the upper Cumberland ought not to be undertaken by the Federal Government unless the State of Kentucky and the State of Tennessee would undertake to pay half of the expense of it, or, in other words, $2,225,000. Those interested in the canalization of the upper Cumberland knew that the States of Kentucky and Tennessee would never do this, and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors on January 28, 1914, kindly granted us a hearing on this proposition. A pretty complete delegation of Senators and Members of Congress, both from the States of Tennessee and Kentucky, appeared before the board on that date and made arguments in favor of the complete canalization of the upper Cumberland at Government expense. I am one of those who made an argument upon that occasion. The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, after hearing the arguments made before it, recommended to the Chief of Engineers of the Army that the entire upper Cumberland be locked and dammed at Government expense.

On February 4, 1914, in making his report to Hon. Stephen M. Sparkman, chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, of which I was a member, the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army said:

After due consideration of all the facts available I concur with the views of the district officer and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors. The first appropriation should be $340,000, for securing all lock and dam sites and for beginning construction of Lock and Dam No. 8, with contract authorization for $201,000, covering the completion of this lock and dam. Subsequent appropriations should be sufficient to permit the beginning of construction of two additional locks and dams each year.

We incorporated in the rivers and harbors bill of 1914 the item of $340,000 to buy the remaining sites and properly begin the complete canalization of the upper Cumberland. We passed that bill through the House, but a filibuster killed it in the Senate. There has been included an item of $340,000 in the bill which has just passed both House and Senate and which has been approved by the President and which is now a law, providing for the "improvement of the Cumberland River above Nashville in accordance with the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, printed in Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 10, Sixty-third Congress, second session, and subject to the conditions set forth in said document."

The law as passed makes it the policy of the Government to completely canalize the upper Cumberland, and it will be only a question of time when the entire upper Cumberland will be locked and dammed. The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, as well as the Chief of Engineers of the Army, recommend that after this year the Government undertake to construct each year thereafter one additional lock and dam in the upper end of the river below Lock 21, and one in the lower end of the river above Lock 8, and Congress has now approved that recommendation; so in a few years this work will be completed, and the people in the counties along the Cumberland River from Burnside to Nashville will realize their dreams of over a quarter of a century.

We feel that we are justly entitled to this. On February 4, 1914, the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors said in its report:

Data now available indicate that there is a commerce on the upper Cumberland amounting to about 300,000 tons, which is considerably more than heretofore reported.

When we consider the fact that boats are able to run on the greater portion of the upper Cumberland only four or five months out of the year, the wonder is that our commerce reaches 300,000 tons annually.

On the Kentucky side, below Burnside, the Cumberland River runs through or close to the counties of Pulaski, Wayne, Clinton, Cumberland, Russell, and Monroe. Taking the counties as a whole, their wealth consists largely in timber and coal and agriculture. Coal constitutes no part and timber but a small part of the present commerce on the upper Cumberland.

The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors in their report of February 4, 1914, to the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, made this statement:

A large part of this area is covered with timber of high value within hauling distance of the river, but under the existing uncertainties of navigation it can not be economically marketed. Much of the land in the valley and back in the hills is fertile but can not be cultivated to advantage for the same reason. There are also extensive coal lands that can be made tributary to the upper reaches of the river by short rail connections, and it is claimed that these lands will be developed and that coal will be shipped out in large quantities.

This tells the story. It explains why our commerce is no larger than it is. It emphasizes the need of the canalization of this river in order to reach a market with our products.

According to the census of 1910 there were 283,200 acres of standing timber in Clinton County and 51,367 acres of woodland. Cumberland County had 185,760 acres of standing timber and 95,341 acres of woodland. Monroe County had 86,945 acres of standing timber. Russell County had 80,666 acres. Wayne County had 17,818 acres of forest lands. This timber is virtually all there yet. It constitutes a part of the greatest boundary east of the Mississippi River of hardwood timber in this country, such as poplar, oak, walnut, cedar, chestnut, hickory, ash, and other valuable hardwood timbers.

Hon. W. A. Dicken, of Albany, Ky., a safe banker and conservative man, wrote me some time ago about coal lands in Clinton County. He said:

We estimate the number of acres of coal lands in Clinton County to be 12,500; average thickness of veins, 4 feet. The coal in this county is of good quality.

The answer comes back, transportation facilities. These people are cut off from the outside world. There is a territory there in Kentucky and Tennessee as big as the State of Connecticut without a foot of railroad in it. They have neither railroad transportation nor water transportation. They would not be asking you through their Representative here for water transportation if they had transportation by rail. It has been the policy of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and of this House and of Congress to appropriate money on streams that have railroads going up and down either bank, and this Congress is still doing it. If this Congress expends the money of the country on streams that have railroads going up and down either bank, if that is justifiable—and the Congress has taken the position heretofore that it is—how much more justifiable is it to spend money on streams that have absolutely no transportation either by water or by rail?

Mr. Speaker, ours is a deserving people. Wayne County has produced her Shelby M. Cullom, late a United States Senator from the State of Illinois. Clinton County nursed at her breast Gov. McMillan, of Tennessee, as well as Gov. Bramlette, of Kentucky. Monroe County claims the unique distinction of having furnished in the person of one man, Preston H. Leslie, a governor for two States. The people of southeastern Kentucky, these among them, are the greatest and purest reservoir of old Anglo-Saxon in this country. In the recent war with Germany and the central powers the county of Clay furnished according to its quota more officers, it is said, than any other county in any State in the Union. Harlan County, it is claimed, gave a greater sum to the Red Cross according to its quota than any other county in the United States and was given an honor flag. McCreary County, I am informed, oversubscribed its quota in bonds to one of the liberty loans 21 times, which no other county in the Union surpassed. All honor to the people of the mountains of Kentucky.

Thank God this river and harbor bill has been passed and that the dawn of the commercial redemption of all the mountain people is drawing nigh.

The Administration of Military Justice.

OF

HON. A. C. SHALLENBERGER,

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, in discussing the subject of justice in the Army certain things at the outset should be said in fairness to the military authorities who have administered the present courts-martial system. They are not alone responsible for the conditions which have arisen under that system, conditions with which we now are all familiar, conditions disclosing that thousands of our soldiers have been convicted and unjustly sentenced to long terms of confinement in the military prisons, and which have shocked the moral sense of every Member of Congress and of the people throughout the country.

Certain things should be said in defense, not of the system, but of those authorities, because they did not create the system, they inherited it; it came to them from the past. At the outbreak of war its vices, although existing, were not generally known or recognized. The country as a whole, and even the average Member of Congress, cared little about the Army and knew less concerning its government. Courts-martial meant nothing to them. Miscarriages of justice they did not hear of. The Articles of War did not become a live, pressing subject until the war came, and the court-martial system seized not only the old Regular soldier but the boys drawn from civilian life into our expanding Army, and it applied not to a handful of men in whom but few families had an interest, but to thousands and hundreds of thousands of boys, coming from all sections and from every walk of life.

And even after the war started and it was seen that the system worked injustice, the military authorities should not be criticized too severely for not correcting the system. They were engaged primarily in winning the war; their task was to defeat Germany. Their energies were devoted to raising and equipping armies, to training the raw recruits who had just come from civilian life, to transporting our forces across the seas, and to the actual defeat of the enemy. During the period in which America was transferred from a peace to a war-time basis—and almost overnight the entire country became an armed camp—many things were overlooked which should have been corrected; many things were done which should not have been done. Human vision was not broad enough; human strength was not great enough to create in so short a time a perfect war machine. It is small wonder, therefore, that during those days of Herculean effort and activity the subject of military justice received scant and inadequate attention. The eyes of the Army authorities were on the railroading of troops and supplies to the front; they failed to see the frequent railroading of individual soldiers into military prisons.

While we can excuse the military authorities for not changing the system before the war, while they were engaged in its vigorous prosecution, there is no longer excuse if the system is permitted to go on unchanged, now that the war has brought out its injustice and undue severity. The responsibility of Congress is plain. Its members know the system is wrong. If they did not know it before the war, the war has shown that it is un-American and unjust. It should be reformed.

If there be those in military authority who seek to prevent remedial legislation by Congress, they should be required to abstain from interference with the legislative branch.

Congress can not be excused if it fails to act, because the Congress is as much responsible for the system as are the military authorities. The system was created by legislative enactment under the provisions of the Constitution vesting in Congress the power to make rules and regulations for the government of the land and naval forces. The military code is the creation, not of the President as Commander in Chief, not of the military authorities, but of this body of which we are Members and for whose acts we are responsible.

We can not defend ourselves before the country if this system is not changed, because the system is wholly without justification. It is cruel, it is barbarous, it is contrary to our cherished principles of government and jurisprudence, principles which demand for an accused a fair trial and which limit his sentence, if guilty, to a punishment commensurate with the crime committed, principles which are the choicest product of the old English common law, principles esteemed so priceless by the people that when they adopted the Federal and State constitutions, by bills of rights, they prevented the governments so established from depriving them of their benficent protection.

In civil life these principles protect the life, liberty, and property of the citizen. They guarantee to him a fair trial—a trial by due process of law, a trial before a jury of his peers, conducted according to recognized rules of law and procedure. But the instant that the citizen becomes a soldier, the instant he forsakes comfort and safety for hazardous service in his country's cause, these laws and principles no longer safeguard his life or liberty. Both depend entirely upon the will of his commanding officer. He becomes not only subject to but in effect the subject of that officer, who is unlimited in the exercise of his authority over him.

Military justice is not justice according to law, but is justice administered by an officer and accordng to his will. It is not a judicial system, but a system of personal despotism. The Articles of War constitute a system which is a relic of feudalism, when each chieftain had his own military establishment, over which he held absolute sway, when the soldiers serving under him were little more than serfs, whose liberties and rights were entirely dependent upon his will. No judicial system limited him in the exercise of his power over them, no matter how unjust or tyrannical his act might be.

The military code which governs the American Army had its inception in that dark era of the world's history when the Prussian Frederick set up his military kingdom in Europe. It was born then, and it has projected itself into the twentieth century with little modification of its iron rules and merciless provisions. Strange as it may seem, it has survived in America, while England, France, and Italy and other democratic nations have long ago abandoned it. When the war came it alone yet lived in Prussia and Russia. The United States, a Nation which prides itself on the civil rights and freedom of its citizens, has a military code as archaic and despotic as that of the Czar or Kaiser.

In every other enlightened and free country a soldier, no matter how low his rank, is tried by a military code which affords to him substantially the same protection as is given a civilian when tried by a civil court. In our Army, however, a soldier is a creature without liberty or rights except those that the commanding officer may give him. This is a statement of an ugly fact, a fact which is sought to be successfully concealed under a mass of forms and ceremonies. Let us contrast the trial of a civilian with that of a soldier:

If a civilian citizen is accused of a crime, before he can be arrested charges must be preferred against him in the form either of an indictment returned by a grand jury or an information filed by the prosecuting attorney. Neither the indictment nor the information is filed unless a regularly constituted law officer of the State determines that the acts of which he is accused constitute a crime, unless some part of the established judicial machinery determines that a prima facie case is made out against him. The civil law esteems the reputation of the civilian citizen so highly that it does not permit even the blemish of an accusation to be put upon him unless the evidence against him is strong and convincing.

If the soldier citizen is accused of a violation of the military code any commissioned officer, regardless of his character or experience, may prefer charges against him, no matter how trivial or how innocent the acts, and he is immediately placed under arrest or in confinement. The stigma of a criminal is immediately placed on him. The charges then are referred to the commanding officer, usually the commander of a division or of a camp, who has the power to convene a general court-martial and who determines if the soldier shall be brought to trial. This officer is not a lawyer or a man learned in the law; he is a military commander, impressed with the importance of maintaining discipline, and who has been taught the military idea that discipline is to be maintained though justice may be rudely shocked. He may know nothing of law, yet his power is supreme under the articles of war. He has on his staff a judge advocate, a law officer, to whom he may refer the question of prosecution. But he is under no duty to do so or to follow the recommendations, if any are made by this officer.

Statistics show that in very many of the general courts-martial cases no prima facie showing of guilt of the accused was made. Nevertheless they are made to run the chance of conviction and to bear this permanent scar on their record for a lifetime, when often the evidence of the prosecution shows that in all likelihood they were innocent.

The records show that for the most part the offenses charged do not involve moral turpitude on the part of the accused, but simply some minor infraction of discipline. They are not charged with robbery, arson, murder, or embezzlement, but refusal to obey some order, such as peeling potatoes or sewing a hat cord to their hats, or for being disrespectful to some sergeant or second lieutenant. Offenses against military discipline it is true, but offenses which should be punished by a summary court by being detailed to police duty or confined in the company street, rather than by a court-martial.

A civilian citizen is entitled to release from confinement upon furnishing bail pending the interval between his arrest and trial. He is given a preliminary hearing before a magistrate to have determined a second time whether a prima facie case has been made out against him.

A soldier citizen is placed in confinement, with no opportunity of release on bail or of preliminary hearing. The seventieth article of war provides that he must be brought to trial within 40 days from the date that charges were preferred against him. The court-martial records show that the average period of confinement before being brought to trial is more than 30 days; but in many cases the 40-day period is exceeded. I am informed that men are now in confinement in camps who have been there for months without being brought to trial and without opportunity to be released from confinement.

A civilian citizen is tried by a jury, whose names are generally drawn from a jury wheel containing the names of all citizens eligible to serve on a jury of that court—they are not designated by the judge or other official. He may challenge any member of the venire so drawn; the challenge is passed on by the court and not by the other members of the venire. He may challenge for cause at any time during the trial before the verdict is actually reached by the jury; and after the verdict he may move to have the verdict set aside by showing that any member of the jury was prejudiced against him or otherwise disqualified. In other words, at all stages of his trial he has the right to demand and secure fair and impartial trial of his case.

The soldier citizen is tried by a court made up solely of commissioned officers selected and designated by the commanding officer who convenes the court. He has the right of challenge before his arraignment; but the merits of the challenge are passed upon not by some impartial third person, but by the remaining member of the court, who may be subject to the same challenge, and who can not fairly pass on the merits of this challenge. It is charged that many men have been tried by courts who were prejudiced against them, who had formed opinions of guilt of the accused before the trial. It is charged that a court made up of commissioned officers leans toward the conviction of enlisted men—that there is an unfair disproportion between the convictions of men and of officers. Statistics of general courts-martial show that the proportion of enlisted men convicted by courts-martial is about three times that of commissioned officers so tried, and the penalties are much severer upon the private soldiers.

A civilian citizen is tried before a judge who is learned and skilled in the law, who is sworn to conduct the trial impartially, who rules on questions of law and of procedure arising during the trial, and who instructs the jury as to the law at the conclusion of the trial.

A soldier citizen is tried before a court-martial made up of laymen, so far as the law is concerned. This court passes on questions of law as well as of fact, although its members know nothing of law, of rules of evidence, or procedure. The records show that a very large per cent of the general courts-martial cases contain errors of law, many of them seriously prejudicial to the accused, such as the admission of incompetent evidence or finding the accused guilty on insufficient evidence. A large percentage of the cases are so filled with error that an appellate court in civil life would not hesitate to set the verdict and judgment aside.

A civilian citizen is tried by a prosecuting attorney, the representative of the State, a lawyer, whose function it is solely to prosecute.

A soldier citizen is tried by a judge advocate, the representative of the Army, designated by the commanding officer who convenes the court. He may or may not be a lawyer. His functions are not only to prosecute but also to act as the legal adviser of the court and of the accused. In other words, he is called upon to exercise inconsistent and impossible functions—a prosecutor, an impartial adviser of the court, and a defender of the accused. If he attempts to perform all three functions, he does none efficiently. Experience shows that generally he is a prosecutor and little else.

A civilian citizen is defended by a lawyer of his own selection or by one appointed by the court; in either event a man learned and skilled in the law conducts his defense.

A soldier citizen may employ civilian counsel or select military counsel or accept the services of military counsel designated by the commanding officer. If he is an officer he probably has sufficient funds or assistance to secure the services of able civilian lawyers, who will conduct an adequate defense; if he is a private, he generally has no funds or assistance, and hence must rely on military counsel. But such counsel is rarely a lawyer or a man with knowledge of the law. He generally is a second lieutenant, fresh and inexperienced in the service, who knows nothing of courts-martial, who is embarrassed not only by reason of his inexperience but also by the fact that he is outranked by the judge advocate and the other members of the court. He can not adequately defend the accused. The records are filled with cases where the accused has been told to enter a plea of guilty where a vigorous defense should have been made. Often the incompetent defender has failed to safeguard the rights of the accused, resulting either in illegal conviction or unjustly severe punishment.

A civilian citizen after the prosecution has put in its evidence may move for a peremptory verdict of acquittal or for dismissal of the case, on the ground that the prosecution has not made out a case against him. After the verdict he may move to set aside the verdict, or for a new trial, on grounds that the verdict is against the evidence or there has been unfairness or prejudice on the part of the jury or judge, or there is newly discovered evidence material to the issue.

A soldier citizen has none of these rights. The case is closed so far as securing any reopening on the part of the court is concerned.

A civilian citizen can not be convicted without the unanimous vote of the jury.

A soldier citizen can be convicted by a majority vote of the members of the court, except in cases inflicting the death penalty, where a two-thirds vote for conviction is required.

A civilian citizen is immediately informed of the verdict of the court.

A soldier citizen may be not informed of the finding for weeks after it is made.

A civilian citizen receives a punishment commensurate with his crime. In minor offenses a fine alone may be imposed or a short confinement in the county jail. Punishment in the penitentiary for a term of years is inflicted only for serious offenses, involving such moral turpitude as to make it unsafe to society for him to remain a member of it. Never is the death penalty imposed or confinement for a long period of years prescribed except for murder, rape, arson, robbery, or similar heinous cimes.

A soldier citizen receives a punishment immeasurably more severe than that given a citizen for an offense of like seriousness. For minor offenses, such as absenting himself without leave for one day to visit a sick mother or refusing to peel potatoes, he may be sentenced to 20 years' confinement at hard labor. Military punishments have shocked the country by reason of their severity since they have become known.

A civilian citizen is convicted only of the crime that he actually committed.

A soldier citizen may be convicted of desertion or of mutiny when there was present in his act no element of desertion or of mutiny. Statistics show that he frequently is convicted of a serious offense where the most that he was guilty of was some lesser included offense, such as absence without leave instead of desertion.

A civilian citizen is given the right of appeal to an appellate court, either by appeal or by suing out a writ of error; the right to have an appellate court pass on the sufficiency of the evidence of conviction, on the regularity of the proceedings of the trial, on the errors of law committed by the trial judge in qualifying the jury, in the admission or rejection of evidence, and in instructing the jury.

A soldier citizen has no right of appeal whatsoever. Instead he is placed at the mercy of the commanding officer who appoints the court.

The finding of the court-martial is not final; it is no more than a recommendation to the commanding officer as to the guilt or innocence of the accused and the punishment that should be inflicted upon him. It goes, together with the record of the case, to him for approval or disapproval. If he approves and the conviction, in the case of enlisted men, is less than the death penalty, and in the case of officers is less than dismissal from the service, the sentence is immediately carried into execution without review by any other officer or department. If the sentence involves the death penalty or inflicts dismissal from the service on officers, the case comes to the Judge Advocate General of the Army for review, and from him to the President, whose action we shall discuss later. It is worthy of notice that death to a private soldier is put on parity with dismissal of the commissioned officer. If the commanding officer disapproves and bases his disapproval on the ground that the sentence is too light, he can return the record to the court, informing it what he thinks the sentence should be and directing it to reconsider its finding, and he can continue returning it until the court does so reconsider and change the finding. If the finding be acquittal, he can direct, in effect, that a finding of guilty be made. If the finding be "absent without leave," a minor offense, he can, in effect, direct a finding of desertion; if the punishment inflicted be six months, he can, in effect, direct a punishment of 5 or 10 years. His power is such that he can, in effect, compel the court to conform its finding to his judgment of what the finding should be. In a word, he is, in fact, the court.

In reaching his conclusions he may or may not accept the services of the law officer, his staff judge advocate. If he elects to ask his opinion, he need not accept his recommendations.

All general court records go from this commanding officer to the Judge Advocate General for review, but he has no power to change or modify the finding to make it conform to the law applicable to the case and to the evidence introduced. In the case of error or unfairness he can make a recommendation to the commanding officer that the finding be modified. The commanding officer need not follow this recommendation. In other words, the Judge Advocate General of the Army does not have the authority to control the Army courts-martial.

The findings of all general court-martial cases must be reviewed by the Judge Advocate General, but the execution of the sentences is not suspended during this review, except where the sentence imposes the death penalty or inflicts dishonorable discharge upon officers, and in these exceptions only where the death penalty is imposed for an offense of other than murder, rape, mutiny, desertion, or espionage. The commanding officer immediately carries the sentences into execution, even though some weeks later the Judge Advocate General may respectfully call his attention to certain serious errors of law in the record which in a civil case would vitiate the entire proceedings.

After the Judge Advocate General makes his recommendation concerning the finding those cases which involve death or dishonorable discharge of officers go to the President for confirmation before their sentences are executed. Cases which do not involve death or dishonorable discharge go back immediately to the commanding officer. In such cases the President and the Secretary of War have no power to modify the finding to make it conform with the law and the facts; they have no power in the case of illegal conviction to set the finding aside and declare the whole proceeding null and void. They simply can exercise the power of pardon and extend the hand of clemency. They can suspend in whole or in part the execution of the sentence. The finding of the court stands as a judgment against the man, a permanent mark on his record that he was legally and justly convicted of the offense and deserving of the harsh sentence imposed upon him. He is thus branded forever, though he may not be compelled to serve the entire sentence.

Mr. Chairman, to state the case briefly, under the military code the soldier citizen has no right of appeal; no appeal is provided. The commanding officer, who convenes the court-martial, is the person who finally determines whether or not he shall be convicted and the punishment that shall be inflicted upon him. The authority of the commanding officer, so far as the legal effect of the finding is concerned, is absolute and final. His authority is limited only in those cases where the sentence as approved by him involves either death or dishonorable discharge of officers for conviction of offenses other than murder, rape, desertion, espionage. In these limited cases the President must confirm the finding. The supreme law officer of the Army, the Judge Advocate General, functions only in an advisory capacity. Nowhere, except in cases of death and dishonorable discharge of officers, is there the power outside of the commanding officer to modify a finding to make it conform with the law and evidence.

The commanding officer, under our military code, holds the life and liberty of this soldier citizen absolutely in his hands. He determines upon what charges the soldier shall be tried and to what extent the man shall be convicted and punished. Justice is administered by him according to his personal will, not according to law administered through a regularly established judicial system. Legal forms and ceremonies may be gone through. The courts may solemnly convene and sit. Judge advocates may prosecute and second lieutenants may defend, but through all this show of legal ceremony is to be seen the hand of the commanding officer, who alone accuses, tries, convicts, punishes, and executes.

In order to see the full effect of this system on the life and liberty of an individual soldier, let us take a typical case. A second lieutenant prefers charges against a man, accusing him of refusal to obey an order to sew his hat cord to his hat. Regardless of the merit or triviality of the charge, the commanding officer, who convenes the court, will uphold the second lieutenant by directing that the man be tried. The lieutenant has created an issue between himself and his men. He must be upheld in order that his dignity in his company may not be lowered. Discipline must be maintained even though some soldier may be unjustly tried and punished.

The commanding officer summons his second lieutenant to discuss with him the charges brought against this soldier. The second lieutenant says, "I want an example made of this man, not because of his act but because it will have a good effect on the other men in my company. There is a general laxity among them. They need something to make them sit up and take notice and to make them jump when I speak to them." The commanding officer directs this soldier to be tried in order that he may be an example to the other men of his company and put the fear of God and his second lieutenant into the hearts of his comrades.

This attitude is responsible for the small number of acquittals by Army courts-martial:

One in 23 before summary courts.

One in 9 before special courts.

One in 8 before general courts.

Men who have given the subject much study believe it has sent many innocent men to military prisons, and has inflicted harsh and unjust sentences on thousands of others.

What is the remedy for these conditions? What changes should be made in the courts-martial system to make it an instrument of justice rather than injustice?

Congress should so change the Articles of War as to remove the absolute authority of the commanding officer over the life and liberty of men within his command, and give them the protection of a regularly established judicial system. It should provide in substance:

First, that no man shall be tried on charges preferred against him unless the staff judge advocate first examines the charges and evidence and certifies that a prima facie case of the man's guilt is made out.

Second, that at the trial there shall be two judge advocates, one of whom shall be a member of the court, with power to decide all questions of law arising in the trial, with functions corresponding to those of a judge in a civil trial, the other shall be the prosecutor.

Third, that the accused shall be adequately defended by being furnished with services of military counsel (or civilian counsel if he desires to employ them) who shall be men experienced in the service and with knowledge of the law, and with sufficient rank so that there shall be no disparity between him and the prosecutor.

The commanding officer on the review of the finding of the court should not have the power to direct the court to reconsider its finding and to impose a greater punishment than was imposed in the original finding.

The commanding officer on review of the finding of a courts-martial should accept the opinion of his staff judge advocate as to the sufficiency and regularity of the proceedings.

The judge advocate general should have power to revise, modify, and set aside the findings where convictions have been made on insufficient evidence, or where there are any irregularities or illegalities in the proceedings. In other words, the judge advocate general should be a military court of appeals.

A special military court of appeals should be established, appointed by the President, responsible only to the President, to review the records of all men who are now undergoing punishment and whose sentences have not been already executed, and to change and modify the findings so that justice may be done to them.

In other words, the law should set up a judicial machine whereby military justice, just as civil justice, would be administered by regularly constituted courts of trial and appeal, conducted by law officers. We would thus follow in the steps of England, France, and Italy, whose soldiers are not tried, convicted, and punished by military commanders, but by military courts which are independent of the control of such commanders.

Argument is advanced that if we do this our action will be a confession that these unjust conditions do exist. But the cure for this situation is not to attempt to hide and conceal the conditions. Congress, which is vested with the responsibility for the government of the Army, should change the system so as to make such conditions impossible in the future. The present system is archaic and un-American. It has created serious conditions. The country knows them. The remedy is for Congress, which is responsible for the Articles of War, to remove the conditions by changing the law. Justice to our soldiers still in the service, justice to many men now confined in prison, and a decent respect for the feelings of the country calls for immediate action.

OF

HON. GEORGE HUDDLESTON,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Two contemptible characters in evidence during our war with Germany were the profiteer and the patrioteer. Sometimes both were combined in the same individual. The patrioteer was the worst of the two. The profiteer took advantage of his country's peril to satisfy his greed for money, while that patrioteer with shameless hypocrisy wrapped himself in the flag and pursued his base and selfish ends under the pretense of patriotism.

The patrioteer showed himself in his most despicable guise when he laid his hand on public affairs, and particularly in the field of politics. There he showed that no act of treachery, no low political trick, no contemptible deception, no dishonest method was too base for him to resort to. Never patriotic, never willing to make any sacrifice for his country, never able to comprehend devotion to public duty or steadfast adherence to principle, he posed as a model of civic virtue and had the brazen impudence to hold himself up as an example of what a patriotic citizen should be. As in the fields of trade and industry the profiteer found his opportunity, so did the war afford the patrioteer a chance to glut old hatreds and to destroy faithful public servants whom he could not bend to his selfish purposes.

I speak of these things feelingly. They have a personal meaning to me. I was confronted with both patrioteer and profiteer in my race for Congress in the fall of 1918. I was the object of their desperate attacks. They committed themselves without reservation to the attempt to destroy me. The purpose of these remarks is to relate the story of that campaign.

THE NINTH DISTRICT OF ALABAMA.

The ninth district of Alabama, which I have had the honor to represent in Congress for the past four years, is composed of a single county, Jefferson. It comprises the heart of the mineral and industrial district of my State.

The population of Jefferson County is 300,000, of whom 180,000 are white. Only 3 per cent of the population is foreign born. The county contains two cities, Birmingham, with a population of 200,000, and Bessemer, with 18,000, besides several small towns and a number of mining villages. Only about 3,000 men are engaged in farming. Some 18,000 are coal and iron miners. There are important iron and steel works and numerous railroads, with perhaps 7,500 employees.

Jefferson County is the seat of the operations of several subsidiaries of the United States Steel Corporation and of six or eight other great industrial and mining concerns. There are some 50 coal-mining companies operating in the county. Roughly speaking, three-fourths of the population are connected with corporations engaged in steel and iron works and the production of coal and coke and in railroading.

Naturally the business life of the community is dominated by the half dozen great steel, iron, and coal companies. Their favor means success to a financial or business interest and therefore is eagerly sought. So influential are these great concerns that they play an important part in the social and political life of the community. The political almoner of these great interests is the head of a large mining company. He does not pretend to be a Democrat, but his support is said to usually control a Democratic nomination when he chooses to exert himself.

The voting population of my district is only about 17,500. Due to the absence of our soldiers and war workers, the number was reduced to less than 15,000. The interest in the primary of August 13, 1918, was intense, yet only 12,847 votes were polled. The legal voters are so few because of the illiberal election laws of Alabama, which carry the cumulative poll-tax payment requirement and other harsh features which make it difficult for voters to qualify. The negro vote is negligible, numbering only about 300.

The chief interest in politics in my district is in the Democratic primary. In this nearly all voters participate. No interest is taken in the general election, and the vote is trifling unless something of unusual interest is involved.

Birmingham has three daily newspapers, with combined circulation of about 115,000, a good labor weekly with limited circulation, and two or three other small weeklies. Bessemer has a live weekly which constitutes an important influence in that section of the community.

A CLASS FIGHT.

In its controlling features the campaign for the Democratic nomination for Congress became finally a fight of classes. I was opposed from the beginning by the big interests, which were soon able to enlist the help of the financiers and larger business men, and through them the chamber of commerce and certain other civic bodies, though, of course, their members were not unanimous. These powerful influences soon contrived to array the great majority of those who consider themselves better than common people, and their parasites of lawyers, preachers, and other professionals. "Society" was agog over the contest. All the climbers damned me vociferously, and it soon came to the point where the social standing of anyone who would admit that he was my friend was jeopardized. My name was anathema at card and social clubs. Even the banks where I kept my deposits went into politics to fight me; they had larger depositors who were on the other side. The backbone of my opposition was the Coal Operators' Association, a hide-bound and powerful interest, the bitter enmity of which I had incurred.

Thus it came to pass that I was opposed by the unanimous daily press, the bankers, the big employers of labor, the clubs, "society," and all those who hang onto the coat tails of the classes and crave their smiles. There were also those who had never been patriotic before, but had been goaded into it by the war fever, and were so maddened by the unaccustomed sensation that they wanted to fight somebody, and found it safer and more convenient to charge at me than to fight our country's foes. Sundry wet-weather patriotic units went into the trenches; the chief of the local Vigilantes tried to put his organization into the fight against me, and succeeded with a majority of his associates.

Of course, some excellent men, men of high character and unquestionable patriotism, opposed me. Numbers of these were honestly misled by the false clamor that my opposition raised; others seriously differed in matters of important principle, and opposed me, as was their privilege. I bear no grudge against them.

On the other hand, at my back, standing like a stone wall, were the masses of the people—farmers, railroad employees, and wage earners generally. Also, I had on my side a large part of the small business element, together with a considerable number of men who were associated in one way or another with the classes opposing me but who could not be misled by false issues or bullied into voting against me.

SOUTH HIGHLANDS AGAINST ME.

This statement of the line-up of my friends and foes is not fanciful. It is borne out by an analysis of the vote cast. I received a plurality at every voting box in the county except the nine boxes of the wealthy South Highland district and three boxes of the aspiring Norwood neighborhood. This does not include the box at Bessie, a Sloss Co. mining village, controlled by that company, nor a Woodlawn box, where there was a tie. Out of 1,725 votes at straight farmer boxes I received all but 270; seven of these boxes I carried unanimously. Warrior, a combined mining and farming box, gave me 107, my two opponents together 7; Inglenook, with its railroad employees, gave me 103, my opponents together 17; Wylam, a mining and working-class community, gave me 203, my opponents together 39; the four boxes of Pratt City, precinct 29, gave me 436, my opponents together received 129. At Ensley, North Birmingham, Elyton, and Avondale I received nearly 80 per cent. Out of 700 votes cast in Bessemer I received 520, my opponents together 180. At the seven South Highland boxes, extending from Glen Iris to Mountain Terrace, the exclusive residential section of Birmingham, and including the three Norwood boxes, where similar classes reside, I received only 499 votes, while my two opponents received 1,615.

These figures show clearly where the dividing line was drawn, but to one who was thoroughly acquainted with the community and knew what influences were at work the class issue was more obvious, for always there are certain individuals who may be controlled by persons of wealth and prestige, and all such were practically unanimous against me.

The class issue was made by my opposition. The prime cause of the fight on me was that I had tried to represent all the people of my district. I had refused to be the handy man of powerful interests. I had opposed profiteering and, in general, the game that those who became my enemies were playing. I had tried to be a friend to the common man. I had shown an interest in his problems and tried to help him with his burdens. I had concerned myself with the interests of labor and given countenance to wage earners trying to better their condition. The edict was that I must be destroyed. They filched the slogan "He shall not pass" and made it their watchword. The masses sensed this. They caught this meaning. I was being crucified because I was their friend. And they rallied; they stood by my side firm as men never stood before; they could not be bluffed, nor wheedled, nor intimidated, nor deceived. And my opposition, powerful and impudent as it was, cowered in humiliation and defeat.

ISSUES OF THE CAMPAIGN.

I announced my candidacy for renomination upon three definite planks: For paying for the war as far as possible by heavy taxes on war incomes and profits; against the adoption of a permanent system of compulsory military service; and against the conscription of labor as a war measure. The latter was a vital issue during the summer of 1918, as the matter was under consideration by the Government as has recently been disclosed. I sought to place my campaign upon a high plane of political principles. However, my opposition would have none of it. They ignored my tender of issues. They made no issue with me upon matters of principle, but based their opposition wholly on my personality.

Even before I took my seat as a Member of the Sixty-fifth Congress in March, 1917, my opposition was seeking an opening on some matter connected with the war. A strenuous effort was made by the News in March, 1917, to whip me into line as a servile administration man and from thenceforward every possible occasion was seized upon to place me in a position of antagonism to the President. The slightest variation of opinion on my part was magnified and distorted. When I was unable to accept as a whole any measure which could be credited to the administration I was summarily blasted as "fighting the President." My votes against conscription and the espionage act were represented as being due to hostility toward the administration; soon this misrepresentation degenerated into the false and shameless cry that I was "opposing the war." My vote in favor of the war was ignored, also my support of the bond issues and tax measures and my votes for every appropriation and other measures proposed for carrying on the war—all were ignored. I had voted against conscription and against the suppression of the constitutional rights of free speech and free press. No support that I could give to the war was of any worth in the eyes of my critics.

The charge that I was antagonistic to the President continued throughout the campaign and rose to a shriek near the end when the President intervened against me. His intervention gave color to the slanders of my critics, and after that nothing was heard except "Who are you for, Wilson or HUDDLESTON?"

Throughout the campaign, and especially toward its end, my opposition resorted to insinuations against my patriotism along with the slogan of "Wilson or HUDDLESTON." They raised the false and shameless cry, "America or Germany, which?" saying, by cowardly innuendo, that I was not loyal to my country. They gave no particulars; they offered no facts; they made no specific charge, but hid themselves in insinuations and innuendoes. They distorted my speeches, filled the newspapers with misleading advertisements, and seemed determined to destroy me by sheer audacity. The nature of the campaign carried on against me created great public excitement and bitterness. My opposition resorted to every means to raise up hatred and prejudice against me. My friends believed that feeling had been so aroused by the attacks that my life was not safe. Threats of personal violence upon me were frequent. Looking backward I am reluctantly compelled to believe that the spirit in which I was opposed was consistent with violence had the opportunity been found.

IT WAS PERSECUTION.

As may well be believed, my friends and supporters soon came to regard the fight on me as nothing short of persecution. The hatred unleashed at my throat actually had the effect to create sentiment in my favor. The intemperance and unfairness of my opposition and the dastard tactics resorted to solidified my friends and roused them to resentment. At the beginning they had been timid and apologetic, but soon saw that something harsher was required, and at the close their indignation reached the boiling point, and they were as aggressive in fighting for me as my opposition was against me. Early in the campaign my friends sought to avoid personalities and to give their support upon a high plane, but later, aroused to wrath by the threats and bullying of my opposition, they gave themselves without stint. They served notice on the bullies of the opposition of stern retaliation if a hair of my head was harmed.

Fired by the vicious methods of my opposition, the latter days of the campaign were filled with feverish excitement. There was street-corner speaking, streets crowded with excited partisans, frequent hard words, fist fights, several near riots, and strife on a large scale narrowly averted.

In retrospect my renomination in a large way signified an expression of confidence and approval on the part of my supporters, the vindication of my integrity and patriotism, and the faith of my constituents that I had done and would continue to do what I considered best for the public welfare in the discharge of my duties. The result was also a rebuke to the despicable methods which had been used by my opposition. It was notice that a faithful public servant should not be destroyed by organized and powerful interests inspired by motives of selfishness. It was an assertion of the right of the plain people, of the majority, to rule and to choose as their Representative one who had shown himself their friend and in whom they had confidence.

FOUL CAMPAIGN METHODS.

The campaign methods of my opposition were unspeakable. Every low political scheme was made use of; every trick and possible deception and subterfuge were resorted to. There was bullying and intimidation wherever it could be practiced, and wheedling, deceit, and appeals to class interests and prejudices when deemed effective. Money was used lavishly, but so far as I have learned there was no direct corruption. Happily, that is not effective in my district.

It is hard to say when the campaign began. In fact, it has gone on ever since I first took a seat in Congress. Every opportunity for unfair criticism was seized. I was ignored when it was possible to do so, and at all other times belittled and ridiculed. Selfish interests never sleep; they can not be placated nor won over by faithful public service.

As the foreign situation became more acute the effort to line me up as an opponent of the President's policies seemed my opposition's best hope for success. My opposition seized it as an opportunity; they foresaw that I would not be a servile follower of the administration; they hoped to take advantage of that characteristic. Even before war against Germany was declared any of my expressions which could be construed as differing from the President's views were made much of. Trifling differences of opinion were grossly magnified. In March, 1917, a strenuous effort was made under the patronage of the News to organize a movement to coerce me into servility toward the administration. Under patriotic pretenses petitions were circulated binding the signers to stand by the President. This was well understood as being aimed at me. On Flag Day in 1917 a great patriotic demonstration was organized. It culminated in the passage of a cut-and-dried resolution sprung upon the unsuspecting assemblage demanding that I vote for conscription. This was followed up by hectoring articles in the dailies threatening me if I failed to do so. My views on conscription were well known. It was not expected that I would knuckle under to the bullying. My opposition no doubt hoped that I would not and expected therewith to destroy me.

The gross exaggeration of my failure to agree with the administration on conscription and the espionage act continued and finally took on the sinister aspect of innuendoes against my patriotism. The caviling continued in the press and out of it. During the fall and spring of 1917–18 a frantic effort was made to find some one to run against me at the approaching election. Committees went to everyone supposed to have political strength and offered their support. The daily papers, unanimous against me, took turns in nominating opposing candidates. The politicians, however, were wary. They realized my wide personal acquaintance and that I had the confidence of the masses and were loath to enter. Numbers of very good men would gladly have come to Congress. Most of them were afraid to try for it.

POLITICAL CONSPIRACY.

Finally, by one means and another, five opponents of greater or less following were brought into the field against me. The next play of my opposition was to combine on the strongest of my opponents and to induce the others to withdraw. The candidates were induced by fair means or foul to submit to that process of elimination. Three of them were thereupon ruled out, leaving two remaining. This scheme of my opposition calls for explanation. The laws of Alabama governing primary elections require that the nominee receive a majority of all votes cast irrespective of the number of candidates and provide for first and second choice votes, optional with the voter. Where no candidate receives a majority the nomination is given to the candidate having the greatest number of first and second choice votes combined. Two opponents were chosen to run against me with the agreement that the supporters of each should vote for the other as second choice. It was expected that my supporters, since they could not vote for me on both first and second choice, would give their second choice to one of my opponents. This fine plot was designed to result in the nomination of one of my opponents, it being recognized that neither of them could hope to get a majority of first-choice votes. It was typical of the ethics of my opposition.

The two candidates selected to remain in the field against me were F. M. Jackson, a capitalist and manufacturer, and A. J. Dickinson, a Baptist minister. The former was chosen to win. He was prominent in business and financial circles and had been an active prohibition leader. He was to be supported by the solid financial and large business elements and was expected to control a substantial following on the outside. Dr. Dickinson was selected as a decoy for votes which might otherwise go to me. He was known to hold progressive political views and to be popular with his denomination. Also he was an active leader in an anti-Catholic movement, which was strong with the farming people and with the smaller business and middle-class elements, and had influential political affiliations. It was expected that each of my opponents would organize their strength so as to deliver their second choice votes in a block to the other. In fact, such was the actual result, as I received only a total of 100 second choice votes from their supporters. An effort was made to deceive voters into thinking that first choice votes would be thrown out as illegal if no second choice was voted. The deception failed; few of my supporters voted for a second choice.

The schemes and plots of my opposition were in vain. The total vote cast was 12,847, of which I received 7,650, Jackson 3,134, Dickinson 2,063; my vote was substantially 60 per cent of the total, while my opponents divided 40 per cent between them. But for the President's intervention I do not doubt I would have received from 75 to 85 per cent of the total vote.

"THE ALLIED ARMIES."

The business organizations of my city, except the civic association, are under the domination of the big interests and larger business men. These bodies were largely in control of liberty-bond sales and other war subscriptions. A so-called "allied armies" was organized to conduct this work. This organization did good work in its proper field, but being largely dominated by the class opposing me, it was put into politics against me. I subscribed liberally to every bond issue, but this was not due to the organization. It ignored me completely. All my subscriptions were offered voluntarily. Never at any time was I asked by any representative of the organization to subscribe. Usually my subscriptions passed unnoticed. I was not permitted to take part in this war work. I was never invited to make a speech in my home city in behalf of bond sales or other war work. This in face of the fact that I had voted for every bond issue, subscribed for every issue, and had supported the work in every way to the best of my ability.

In May, 1918, I took occasion in the House to advocate higher taxes on war profits and incomes, and to say that while I would vote for the loan then proposed, I was unwilling to continue to vote for bonds unless heavier taxes were laid. My opposition considered the time ripe to launch their campaign against me. Simultaneously, and evidently by prearrangement, they sprang at my throat. Each of the three dailies denounced me. The News called me Socialist and insinuated pro-Germanism. The Age-Herald characterized me as a Bolshevik and deliberately lied about my position on financing the war. The "allied armies," at a meeting held to promote the loan, passed a cut-and-dried resolution offered by the Republican agent of a big New York insurance company, misstating my position and charging me with misrepresenting my constituency. The Ledger clamored for my elimination from Congress. The great offensive had begun. Agents of the big interests, parasites, and sycophants, Tray, Blanch, and Sweetheart, all took up the cry.

Many of my friends thought I was done for—no official had ever faced such a storm in my city—naturally they were discouraged. Numbers of those who stood firm and continued to defend me were visited by influential citizens and advised that agents of the Department of Justice were watching them and they had better be quiet.

But I was unafraid—foolhardiness it was called—but I trusted the people. I had faith that justice would be done. A brave few rallied to my rescue. They organized, took up the fight, defended me at public meetings called for that purpose, encouraged the timid and explained the situation to the unthinking. The unbluffable element stood firm from the first. Old-fashioned Americans of revolutionary stock, they let it be known at once where they stood. Various progressive elements asserted themselves. The forces of labor were active and after a few weeks it began to be seen that the great majority were on my side.

PATRIOTEERS IN ACTION.

In desperation a falsely named "Jefferson County Patriotic League" was organized by my opposition. Its expressed purpose was to defeat me for Congress. It had a skeleton of officers, but its membership was unrevealed. It spent money lavishly—where the money came from was not disclosed. It went into the press with an advertising campaign of false insinuations and lying and insulting innuendoes. No one accepted responsibility for its dirty work. During the last few days of the campaign this base and anonymous organization spent over $3,000 against me. This appears in the sworn affidavit by one of its officers. Who furnished this money?

There was no need for my opposition to spend money advertising. The dailies gave free all the space that might have been desired. The Age-Herald was especially vicious and dishonest. It carried almost daily slanderous and deceitful cartoons and reading matter against me. The hatred and spleen of these cartoons were tempered only by their utter stupidity. I was shown as a Bolshevik refusing to support the Government; as the protector of a German anarchist exploding a bomb under a munitions plant; as a pigmy trying to hold back a giant Wilson going about the affairs of the Nation; as an anarchist overturning the Statue of Liberty with the Kaiser applauding; as playing with the rattle of socialism as our soldiers marched by on their way "over there"; and as casting reflections upon our fighting forces. On Sunday after the President's telegram was issued a large picture of the President was shown with an assassin's hand about to stab him in the back. Of course, I was not named in this picture. The paper was too cowardly for that, but everyone understood what was implied.

There was no pretense of fairness on the part of either of the dailies. Columns were given to accounts of small meetings of my opponents. No notice was taken of important gatherings of my friends. Space was given to any cheap notoriety seeker who wished to denounce me. They made a distinct effort to connect the Department of Justice with my opposition. I regret to relate that no public discouragement of this effort was given by anyone connected with the department. An attorney connected with the department wrote and spoke against me. Always the papers quoted him as an official. The matter was brought to the Attorney General's attention but no public disclaimer was issued. An agent of the department used the color of his office in an effort to intimidate my friends. He is still in service and unrebuked so far as I know, although the facts were presented to the department by a formal complaint.

My opposition did not hesitate to desecrate the Sabbath itself. On Sunday before the election the regular Birmingham "community singing," attended by several thousand persons, was perverted by those in charge into what they called "a patriotic meeting." Speakers of my opposition exhibited an immense picture of the President and urged the people to stand by him. Programs were distributed carrying the President's telegram against me.

THE CRUELEST LIE.

Of all the falsehoods used by my opposition in the desperate effort to defeat me the cruelest was that I had not been the friend of the soldiers. I had served as a private soldier myself and had borne some of the hardships that the enlisted man must suffer, but that they dismissed as of no account. My vote against conscription they twisted into lack of regard for men in service. The arguments which I had made in favor of the volunteer system they distorted as showing lack of respect for men forced into service. I stood pledged to vote for every measure which might improve the soldier's lot, better his equipment, increase his supplies, and care for his loved ones at home, but that they ignored. I had fought for free postage and better facilities for soldiers' mail; I had led the fight in behalf of equality of enlisted men with officers under the insurance and allotment laws; I had tried in many ways to help the soldier and better his pay and conditions—all of which they ignored.

I had helped thousands of soldiers' families to get their allotments, but my opposition counted it as nothing. They quoted isolated sentences from speeches made before the war, in which I criticized West Point and Annapolis and social caste in the Army as undemocratic, and tried to twist them into something unfriendly toward soldiers generally. They deliberately lied in charging that I had opposed the increase in the soldier's pay to $30, when, in fact, I had voted for the increase and had advocated an increase to $50. My sympathy for men in the ranks and desire to help them they willfully construed as insulting.

The desperate crew opposing me ransacked their silly brains to find something in my life which they might criticize. Nothing was too silly or too mean for them to try to use. They even descended to exaggerating the value of the property I had managed to accumulate by a lifetime of thrift and saving. With all their sifting the harpies could find no stain upon my integrity or moral character. With all my 20 years' active practice as a lawyer they could find no client who would say that he had been overcharged and no adversary who would claim that I had been unfair. They could find no one who I had overreached in business.

MY WELCOME HOME.

My duties detained me in Washington until a few days before the primary. I carried on my campaign as best I could; the great bulk of the work was done by the faithful friends composing my campaign committee, aided by a great number of others who were interested in my behalf. I went home a few days before the election. I planned to reach Birmingham at 7.30 on Thursday evening before the primary on the following Tuesday. My committee advertised my coming and arranged to meet me at the station and to hold a meeting subsequently in Capitol Park.

My train was late. It stalled on a hill 10 miles out. It has been charged that my enemies had soaped the track. A sworn statement to that effect was handed my chairman. I do not know what the facts were, except that the train was delayed for three hours. With the delay I had expected to get home unwelcomed and to find that the meeting had dispersed. But I did not understand. My train drew into the station; a dozen engineers pulled their throttles wide open. The train stopped; I alighted. All was noise and confusion. A multitude of torches were burning and cheers of welcome came from thousands of friendly throats. A crowd of friends swarmed through the station gates and over the tracks; I was their prisoner. A chair with carrying poles had been provided by the men from the railroad shops; I was placed in it willy-nilly. Sturdy shoulders bore me out. A procession was formed with a brass band playing in front, and down Fifth Avenue toward the park a cheering crowd of thousands surged, flags flying, torches burning. The scene was indescribable and unprecedented.

At the park another great crowd had assembled. With enthusiasm unabated they had waited for my coming until 11 p. m. Eight thousand chairs were filled, acres of people were standing. The assemblage was estimated at over 15,000 persons.

I spoke for 40 minutes. I was embarrassed for having been carried on the shoulders of my friends. I apologized for it, saying that I realized that the tribute of the welcome I had received was not called forth by any quality of my own, but was in fact merely an evidence of the sense of justice of my supporters, who realized that I was being persecuted because I was their friend and that they had carried out the demonstration to show that they did not intend to allow the wolves that were snarling at my heels to drag me down. The vast audience shook with excitement and enthusiasm. My lightest remarks were wildly applauded. The occasion was an overwhelming exhibition of the determination of my supporters.

At the close of my speech I shook hands with thousands of my friends. It was 1 o'clock when I reached my hotel. A dozen strong-armed friends stuck close to the very last. I did not understand at the time. They feared I would be assassinated.

THE PRESIDENT'S INTERVENTION.

The great welcome given me on my return home filled my opposition with dismay. The hope to defeat me went glimmering. They realized that the single chance remaining was to induce the President to interfere. Previous efforts of my opposition to entangle him in my campaign had failed. Made desperate by the welcome given me, they roused to a final effort. Various telegrams were sent to the President. I have been unable to learn definitely what statements they made. I do know that false statements as to my attitude were made. The President was basely deceived. However, the foul tactics of my opposition prevailed—the intervention came.

About 5 o'clock on the day following my return home the newsboys cried an extra, "President denounces HUDDLESTON." The President's telegram had just been received. It was addressed to Glass, editor of the News, who gave it to the public first in an extra of his own paper. Under a scare head on the front page, "Stand by the President," with his picture, almost life-size, the message was printed:

FRANK P. GLASS,
Birmingham, Ala.:

Your message received. I do not feel at liberty to make any discrimination between candidates equally loyal, but think I am justified in saying that Mr. HUDDLESTON'S record proves him in every way an opponent to the administration.

WOODROW WILSON.

The message was followed in big type by—

A vote for HUDDLESTON is a repudiation of President Wilson and his administration. A vote against HUDDLESTON is an indorsement of President Wilson and his administration.

The telegram was the sensation of the hour. The extra edition of the News was sold quickly. Men gathered in excited knots to discuss the latest news. All was confusion and uncertainty. The President of the Nation had spoken. He had in substance expressed his will that a Member of Congress should be defeated for reelection. Men wondered what would be the result.

I had an engagement to speak that night in the city park at Bessemer. On reaching the appointed place I found an audience of about 6,000 gathered. No such assemblage had ever before gathered in that young city. I spoke for over an hour, relating what I had done in the performance of my official duties and telling of the fight being made against me. I read the President's telegram—many of the audience had not heard of it. I explained what my attitude in Congress had been, and charged that the President had been misled by false friends into sending the telegram. My speech was enthusiastically received. At its conclusion some one in the audience handed up to the chairman a resolution:

We, 2,000 voters in mass meeting assembled at Bessemer, Ala., do hereby resolve as follows:

That we have the greatest confidence, respect, and love for our great President, the Hon. Woodrow Wilson; that we are with him and will continue to support him in this great hour of our Nation's great trial to a final victory. That we have the greatest respect, love, and confidence in our Congressman, the Hon. GEORGE HUDDLESTON; that we are with him; that we do hereby express our confidence in him. Be it further Resolved, That the chairman of this meeting is hereby instructed to wire a copy of this resolution to our great and beloved President, the Hon. Woodrow Wilson.

The chairman read it to the assemblage and it was adopted with a unanimous shout.

Of course, I was amazed by the President's intervention. I did not know how the people would accept it. I resolved from the first instant that it should not alter my course; but I knew that my constituents are among the most loyal and devoted people in America, and I could not foresee just what they would consider to be their duty under the circumstances. The reception of my speech and the adoption of the resolution left no doubt on that point. I knew that my renomination was assured.

The following day—Saturday—was spent by my opposition in a strenuous effort to stampede my supporters. The dailies tried to bully me into withdrawing from the contest and printed statements from the weak-kneed few of my supporters who could be induced to say that they had been changed by the President's telegram. Committees of prominent business men went up and down the streets trying to intimidate my friends; smaller business men were threatened with boycott if they continued to support me; hectoring, bullying, and shameless lying were freely indulged. The timid and wabbly, the neutrals, and undecided went over to my opposition. Perhaps I lost 15 to 20 per cent of my strength by reason of the President's intervention; but the bulk of my friends stood like iron and took even a more aggressive position than they had occupied. That night I spoke in Ensley to an enthusiastic audience, reduced in numbers because the meeting was in the open air and it was raining.

Monday, the final day before the election, was filled with excitement. The streets were crowded; interest reached to fever heat; happily disorder of more than a minor nature was averted. On Monday night we held a final meeting at Capitol Park in Birmingham. Again the enthusiasm was at the boiling point; more than 15,000 were assembled; the scene was indescribable.

My friends had come from the remote parts of the county to show their interest. It was obvious that my opposition had failed, that the President's message had not turned the tide, and that it was merely a question of my majority.

REASONS FOR INTERVENTION.

The real reasons which impelled the President to intervene in the campaign in my district I can not surmise. My efforts to learn them have been without effect. On Saturday morning after his telegram was sent I wired him, stating that my friends believed that his intervention had been procured by misrepresentations and asked as an act of justice to my constituents and to me that he disclose the representations which induced him to send the telegram. I received no reply until late on the afternoon of election day, when a message came from the President saying that he wished to do no injustice and that he desired that my constituents should judge me by my record. This was the only satisfaction I got. It came too late to be of service.

A few days later a newspaper writer issued a syndicated article, purporting to be inspired, which undertook to explain the causes which led the President to intervene in several campaigns. By that article I was inferentially charged with being a "reactionary southern politician," with having in my committee tied up important legislation, and with hypocrisy in pretending to my constituents that I had been an administration supporter. This article merely added insult to injury.

Of course every Member of the House knows that I had not been an opponent to the administration. I had voted against conscription, the espionage law, and two or three other minor so-called administration measures. I had voted for more than 100 administration measures in support of the war. Every member of my committee knows that I have never in the least obstructed administration measures before it, but have usually supported them.

I had stated my position frankly to my constituents. I had issued a formal campaign speech and sent a copy to each voter in my district saying on this point:

Of the dozens of measures relating to the war, either directly or indirectly, in only three have I voted against what was reported as the judgment of officers of the administration. Those three are the conscription bill, the espionage bill, and the explosives bill. I challenge my critics to show to the contrary. I have been willing to vote for every soldier, every ship, and every dollar needed to carry on the war.

I will be frank. I have voted for the measures proposed, not because some officer of the administration advised it but because they met the approval of my judgment. I have not been a rubber-stamp Congressman, but have tried to weigh patriotically every measure presented and to vote for the best interest of my country. It is I who am Congressman. It is I who took the oath of office. It is I who must face my conscience and my Maker. And always I have felt that I must make the final decision for myself. For this frame of mind I offer no man an apology.

In view of the indisputable facts, the conclusion is irresistible that the President did not intend his telegram to be accepted literally. It was to be taken merely as indicating his desire for my defeat. It is clear that he was brought to that decision by the powerful influences in and out of my district which were opposing me. I have no doubt that the President was basely deceived by pretended friends. My feeling on the subject was expressed in an interview which I gave on the morning after the election.

I do not accept the result as a rebuke to the President; it is instead a stern rebuke to the vindictive and unfair opposition. It is not wholly a personal tribute to me. I accept it as an evidence of the instinctive love of the great masses of the people for justice and the square deal. My constituents know that I have served them honestly and faithfully and that I am patriotic and devoted to duty. Such of them as think that I have made mistakes are ready to forgive them, realizing as they do that I am honest and try to be a true representative.

The President's intervention shall not incite me to antagonism. I shall show no petty spirit of revenge or opposition toward him. To the contrary, I shall continue to cooperate with him conscientiously in every effort to win the war and preserve American honor and interest.

I am conscious that I have been done a cruel injustice, but that consciousness has not and shall not in the least affect my official action.

THE AFTERMATH.

In my after-the-election interview, I said:

I am not puffed up by my success, but accept my victory in deep humility. It has been made possible by the loyalty and devotion of my friends.

I trust that the feeling created by the bitter and unfair attacks upon me will soon pass. I am anxious to be the representative of the whole people of my district and to work with all for its material interests consistently with the public welfare. I beg for the future a more friendly spirit of cooperation upon the part of the elements which have recently opposed me. I am praying that the methods which have characterized the campaign will never be repeated in my district.

My victory was complete. Despite the fact that I had two popular opponents who had the support of the daily papers and of the big business and financial interests, I received 60 per cent of the total vote. I was willing to let bygones be bygones. Not so my opposition. The daily papers accepted the result of the primary with exceedingly bad grace. The Ledger blamed it on the bitter attacks which had been made on me; the News complained that the result was due to the weakness of my opponents; the Age-Herald called the result a "grievous mistake," and urged that preparations be made for the next campaign. There was growling, long and loud, among those who had sought to do me to political death.

The Republicans of my district thought to take advantage of the Democratic row. A cunning politician was nominated against me. He wheedled the Republican Congressional Committee out of $1,000 for his campaign fund, and collected a considerable amount from captains of industry and my disgruntled opposition. He endeavored to take up the campaign against me where it had ended in the primary. His methods were, if anything, more unscrupulous than had been previously used. The Ledger and News were neutral. The Age-Herald encouraged my opponent and gave him columns of space in which to exploit himself. It was happy to give big headlines to my critics, no matter how petty and mean the criticism. Numbers of the big business men who had opposed me in the primary allowed their names to be used as a campaign committee for my Republican opponent. I paid no attention to their campaign, and did not spend a dollar in the election. The result was that, while the vote was quite light, my Republican opponent received only 14 per cent of the total. And thus this chapter ends.

This chapter ends with disaster to my opposition, but I do not assume that I am to have peace. I would gladly represent the big business interests along with the rest of my constituents, but I will not be their tool nor submit to their dictation. I will represent them only upon my own terms, which are that the rich and powerful must stand upon equal footing with the poor, and that the welfare of my country must be supreme. I will be the Congressman, and the final decision must be mine. I will guide my actions by the standards of patriotism and not of sordid dollar grabbing.

I do not expect my opposition to accept me on these terms. They will continue to assail me so long as there is hope for success. But I face them without fear in my soul. I will not flinch nor ask quarter. I will not be swerved. I will not be bullied out of public life by them. Their vicious political methods shall not drive me from office. When I go it will be from my own desire or because of the will of my people.

Conscientious Objectors.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. MASON,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I insert here the following memorandum in refutation of the charge that conscientious objectors have been treated with leniency, furnished me by the National Civil Liberty Bureau, of 41 Union Square, New York.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The charge has been made that conscientious objectors in this country have been treated with undue leniency. What are the facts? Actually there are authentic, undenied statements of cases on record where conscientious objectors have been beaten, prodded with bayonets, immersed in filthy latrines, held for periods of from 15 to 45 minutes under cold shower baths, fed only bread and water, and placed for long periods in solitary confinement.

At the United States Disciplinary Barracks at Alcatraz Island, Cal., four religious objectors—three Hofer brothers and Jacob Wipf—were placed in a perfectly dark dungeon where water seeped in from the sea, their outer clothing being removed, and where they were fed only small amounts of bread and water. At the end of the fifth day they were removed by the recommendation of the medical examiner and placed in isolation. Later they were transferred to Fort Leavenworth, where they were at once placed in solitary confinement. Two of the Hofer brothers died of pneumonia within 10 days of their arrival at Fort Leavenworth. The body of one of these men was sent home dressed in the military uniform of the United States Army, although he had gone to prison because of his refusal to wear this uniform.

At Camp Funston a group of conscientious objectors for six weeks were put through a course of the roughest sort of hazing and brutality. They were not allowed to communicate with anyone during this time, and were subjected to physical coercion—struck with whips and dragged about with ropes, etc. (see Exhibit A, annexed hereto). Other undenied stories of brutalities have come from Camp Sherman, Camp Meade, Camp Wadsworth, Fort Jay, Fort Riley, and numerous other cantonments (see Exhibit B, annexed hereto).

Finally, over 500 objectors were sent to the military prison at Fort Leavenworth, with sentences ranging from 5 to 40 years. Here some of the objectors who refused to fall in line with the military discipline were kept for over nine weeks in solitary confinement, during most of which time they were manacled, standing to the bars of their cells nine hours a day, every alternate two weeks being spent on a diet of bread and water (see Exhibit B, annexed hereto). This was done with the express authorization of the War Department, as was tacitly admitted in Secretary Baker's order of December 6, abolishing manacling.

Yet, in spite of these facts, charges are brought that the War Department discriminated in favor of conscientious objectors. The explanation of this is to be found in the policy adopted by the War Department. It is true that the War Department did issue a confidential order providing for conscientious objectors, thereby giving color to the charges of special leniency. But in practice this policy worked out both to the disadvantage of the Army and the unnecessary and brutal coercion of objectors. It was the policy which sought ultimately to deal with conscientious objectors as a problem of military discipline. The officers in charge of these men found themselves forced to treat as soldiers men who were determined at all costs not to accept that status. The inevitable result of this policy was the coercion of objectors. Any other result under the circumstances would have meant that both officers and objectors were more than human.

In the case of objectors who were finally court-martialed the War Department has insisted upon treating these men as individual recalcitrant soldiers. This has resulted in the fact that to-day many of them have been released on one pretext or another, while others, actually no more radical in their protests against military service, are still in prison.

A further result of the War Department's policy has been that all objectors released from military prison have practically been forced to accept back pay as a condition of their discharge. This has served to discredit men who while in camp refused to sign the pay roll and so had back pay credited to them. According to a recent statement of the War Department, however, over $5,000 of the pay thus given to objectors has been returned direct to the Department.

Conscientious objectors have been sentenced by courts-martial to prison terms of exceeding severity. The War Department has announced its policy of reviewing each individual case with a view to possible clemency. This policy seems another mistake, because all of these men are imprisoned for the reason that their consciences upon one ground or another forbade their becoming a part of the military organization. Their cases all have the common basis of conscience and all have shown their sincerity by endurance of severe punishment. If one should be freed, all should be freed. If any are to serve out their sentences, all should. Their prison terms are the unhappy by-product of a military system essentially inconsistent with American democratic ideals, and which was created for the purpose of serving the country in a particular crisis. The crisis is now over and their release becomes now not a matter of clemency in individual cases but a matter of ordinary democratic justice.

EXHIBIT A.

REPORT OF TREATMENT OF CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS AT THE CAMP FUNSTON GUARDHOUSE.

THURSDAY, September 5, 1918.

Seven conscientious objectors arrived at the military police guardhouse from the guardhouse at Riley.

SATURDAY, September 7.

We were ordered to fold our arms and stand at attention by the officer of the day, Capt. Buckley. Failing to comply with this order, he proceeded to abuse and insult us, referring to those of Jewish birth as "damn kikes," etc. He then had our beds and blankets taken from us and ordered that we be given raw rations—pork and beans—which we were to cook in the latrine, if we wanted to eat. He suggested to the prisoners that they beat us up. We had no supper and slept on the bare floor in our clothes.

SUNDAY, September 8.

Very little sleep was had because of the extreme chilliness of the night.

No other provisions having been made for the preparation of food, we ate nothing on this day.

We again slept on the bare floor without blankets.

MONDAY, September 9.

Food conditions remained the same until supper when we were informed that a kitchen for preparing our food would be furnished us if we would do our own cooking. We were able to prepare supper. Upon returning from this meal we were informed that henceforth we would be given bread and water only. Upon this fare we continued until September 15.

SATURDAY, September 14.

Col. Barnes, the provost marshal, called at the guardhouse. He ordered us to stand at attention, and when we refused to comply he proceeded to kick the legs of the men. Kaplan had his legs and ankles bruised as a result. Upon leaving he hinted to the prisoners that he would be tempted to pardon them if they would beat us up.

MONDAY, September 16.

We were again placed upon bread and water diet. This continued until the following Sunday, September 22, on which day we had regularly prepared meals, so that between September 7 and 22 we had only two days of regular rations.

MONDAY, September 23.

We were ordered to stand at attention by the incoming officer of the day and upon refusal we were told that we would be taken out every two hours during the night. This procedure was inaugurated that very night when we were awakened at these periodic intervals, taken out and kept out a while and sent back to bed.

THURSDAY, September 26.

While walking about in the courtyard the men were kicked and shoved about for not obeying an order to walk in prescribed military fashion—Kaplan and Breger being the particular targets.

In the afternoon Larsen was brutally assaulted, being choked, his head banged against the wall, and dragged around the room, by the sergeant of the guards for refusing to clean quarters other than our own.

FRIDAY, September 27.

Again, while exercising, the men were grossly maltreated. The bayonet was applied to all of us—Larsen receiving a scar. Kaplan and Breger were beaten with the butt end of the rifle. All were kicked and shoved about.

Eight conscientious objectors came here from Fort Riley guardhouse.

After supper we were ordered outside where we formed in double rank. The sergeant of the guards issued some military commands to us. When we did not obey promptly he shoved us about violently. We then began marching around the building. Orders were given to "double time." Bayonets were pressed against the bodies of Larsen, Silver, and others to obtain compliance, but no one ran. The guards now insisted that we walk in strict military posture, and cuffs, kicks, and blows were rained upon those who failed to do so. Eichel refused to submit to this abuse and informed the guard that since in his opinion exercise was optional with conscientious objectors he would march no more under such brutal impositions. A guard seized him by the neck and forced him around the building, heaping blows and kicks upon him at the same time. When he was finally released the back of his head was covered with bumps and he was sore all over.

At about 9 that evening we were again ordered out and again put through the same ordeal. This time Steiner ceased walking. He was seized by the ears and dragged around the building. Another guard after a while seized him by the throat and choked him so forcibly that he sank breathless to the ground. Steiner reported his treatment to the officer of the day, a second lieutenant, who refused to give his name and who insisted that he was carrying out orders.

We were informed that we would be called out every two hours. At 11 p. m. we were awakened and ordered out. We refused. It was debated whether or not to forcibly drag us out. They finally decided to leave us alone. However, none could sleep, for the thought that we might be roused any moment kept preying upon our minds.

SATURDAY, September 28.

At 8.30 p. m. the sergeant of the guards ordered us out. Expecting a repetition of yesterday's affair, especially so since the sergeant was a veritable brute, we refused. Kaplan, half undressed, was the first to rouse his venom. He was lifted bodily off his bed and thrown headlong through the door. He was dragged back again, lifted off his feet and thrown against the bedstead so forcibly that his skull might have been smashed. He was then ordered to put on his shoes. He refused. The sergeant seized him and put him out barefooted. The other men were similarly handled. When we were finally lined up outside, the sergeant following us out—and never did man gloat so over his accomplishment—he remarked that he was carrying out the major's orders, meaning Maj. Taussig, the military police officer. After marching around a while we were permitted to return to quarters. Threats of subsequent and periodic repetition of this treatment again had the effect of keeping us awake and expectant all night.

The instructions that conscientious objectors are to be permitted to exercise is being utilized as a means to impose hardships upon us. We are kept outdoors in all sorts of weather, from six to eight hours each day, and the guards are instructed to see to it that we keep moving continually. This is a source of constant irritation and friction between us and the guards, for some of us find it physically impossible to keep walking all day.

Our corresponding privilege has been restricted to one letter a week. The letter must be written upon one side of one small sheet. Its contents are subjected to careful censorship.

A general and thorough raid was made upon our quarters for books, magazines, and any other reading matter.

All prisoners were ordered to take a cold shower.

FRIDAY, October 4.

Orders were issued that conscientious objectors are to be given but one helping of food and "d—— little at that." Not even an extra piece of bread is allowed us. We are kept hungry from meal to meal.

SATURDAY, October 5.

We were ordered to take a cold shower. Da Rosa, feeling that cold showers are detrimental to him, and having taken a bath but one-half hour previous to the issuing of the above order, refused to undress. The corporal of the guards thrust him under the spray with his clothes on. Da Rosa returned to the guard room, wearing his dripping clothes. The corporal ordered him to undress and take a thorough shower. When Da Rosa again refused, the corporal tore his clothes from his body and at the same time delivered upon him some telling and effective blows. He was then placed under the cold shower.

We were compelled to take a cold shower once in the morning and once in the afternoon. A guard stood watch and checked each man.

SUNDAY, October 6.

In the afternoon, Sandin collapsed while taking his second cold shower of the day. We explained to the doctor who called, the nature of the treatment we had been receiving lately. We also informed him that we were being underfed.

The captain, who was "officer of the day" ordered that we be deprived of supper because we did not stand at "attention" at roll-call.

At midnight we were suddenly and unexpectedly roused by the sergeant of the guards and ordered to take a cold shower. It was obvious that this was an unreasonable and vicious imposition and most of us refused to get up. We were then violently dragged into the shower room and held underneath the spray, night clothes and all, thoroughly exhausted. Kaplan, Breger, Block, Powell, Franklin, Eichel, Downey, Steiner, and Da Rosa were so treated. The "officer of the day" was present and directed the proceedings.

MONDAY, October 7.

Greenberg, Block, Bernstein, and others have gone on sick report this morning, suffering from colds. Block and Bernstein were given asperin tablets to make them perspire. Though the day was rainy and damp, all hands were ordered out for exercise. We were kept outside in the drizzle, until ordered to come in for a cold shower. Even those who had taken asperin tablets were not excused from the prescribed bath.

Breger, Monsky, Ott, Silver, Da Rosa, Block, and Eichel have already declared an absolute hunger-strike as a vehement protest against this treatment.

Another cold shower was administered to us in the afternoon. At 8 p. m. the "officer of the day," a captain, and the sergeant of the guards ordered all to undress in the squad room and prepare for a cold shower, the third that day. We were marched to the latrine in a body. The captain himself brought forth scrub brushes, used ordinarily for cleaning toilet seats and brooms used for sweeping, and ordered that we scrub each other with them. Franklin refused to use the filthy brush. He was seized and roughly thrown to the cement floor, dragged back and forth and viciously belabored until thoroughly exhausted. He was then placed under the cold spray and left there until he collapsed. Eichel and Shotkin helped him back to his bed. When he recovered he became hysterical.

The captain wished to know what had happened. Eichel explained that Franklin was suffering from myocarditis and the constant and frequent impositions of cold showers had in all probabilities aggravated this ailment. Eichel then requested the captain to permit him to see the post commander. This the captain refused to do, although he told Eichel that he was carrying out the instructions of the post commander in treating us so.

TUESDAY, October 8.

Franklin, Sandin, and Hennessey have joined the hunger strike as protest against our inhuman treatment.

At about 8 p. m. the order was issued to prepare for a cold shower. Monsky informed the captain, who directed proceedings that he would not undress. The captain ordered a guard to undress and keep him under the shower twice as long. The sergeant of the guards timed everyone. Monsky was kept under the spray an unusually long time. He finally heard the captain say, "If he suffers, keep him there; but if he isn't suffering let him go."

Franklin, because of his collapse the previous evening, was given an extra dose and again collapsed. Eichel again requested to be permitted to see the post commander and again was refused.

Quite a few of the men, thoroughly chilled by the shower, had gone to bed to warm up. "Attention" was suddenly called and those in bed were dumped by the guards and dragged to their feet. Half naked the guards proceeded to place them in military posture. Towels, socks, and ropes were utilized to tie their hands in proper position. Then the captain addressed us. "How many of you will now become sensible objectors and go out to do some work this afternoon?" Receiving no favorable response he said tersely: "All right, another cold shower at 10.30 a. m."

We were then ordered to dress and go out for exercise. Quite a few refusing to do this were rudely dressed and dragged outside.

Promptly at 10.30 o'clock we were ordered in for our cold shower. Monsky, Block, Breger, Franklin, and Eichel, feeling that this was unquestionably punishment for their refusal to work, refused to undress. They were taken to the shower room in their clothes. There Eichel was again ordered to undress. When he refused, a corporal slapped his face vehemently and dragged him back to the squad room. There the order was repeated, and when Eichel maintained his attitude the corporal belabored him viciously with slaps across the face and blows upon the head. He was taken back to the shower room, and he as well as the others who had refused to undress were placed and kept underneath the spray in their clothes.

Henessey had undressed for the shower and had stepped underneath. No one was paying any particular attention to him. Suddenly he emitted a wild shriek, began tottering and swinging aimlessly. If some one had not grabbed him instantly, he might have dashed his head against the cement. He was carried to his bed, all the time maintaining his wild cries. Presently his struggles subsided and he remained in a state of coma for almost an hour. No doctor was sent for. Ott now asked permission to see the post commander, and was given the expected response.

Those who had taken the shower in their clothes undressed and went to bed. At about 2 p. m. the order came to get out for exercise. The wet clothes were put on the men and they were thrust outside. We were walking around when the corporal informed us that the major (Taussig) had ordered that we walk more rapidly. Franklin attracted the guards' attention first. He was rushed violently against the wire fence, thrown to the ground, and his head banged against the rocks. Monsky next received the brunt of attention. The corporal and guard pommeled, shoved, and abused him. A group gathered to watch the spectacle. Amongst the latter were some friends of the active guard. To please them, he seized Monsky from behind and ran him around the inclosure. Then, acting upon the suggestion of one of the spectators, he deliberately strove to step upon Monsky's bare feet. The latter succeeded for a while in thwarting him, but the inevitable happened and Monsky sank to the ground in agony. His ankle had been sprained.

This cowardly act completely unnerved Breger. "Hurray! Hurray for our brave American!" he yelled, and clapped his hands vehemently in applause. He was stopped, but he no longer was master of himself. He stopped, took off his shoes and exclaimed, "Here, do the same to me and show your bravery!" He walked on a while and suddenly let forth an uncanny yell and fell to the ground. He struggled painfully, all the time maintaining his gruesome cries. His struggles ceased finally and amid jeers of "He's all right" he was raised to his feet. Monsky in the meanwhile had been dragged all over the ground, his clothes torn from his body, and was practically unconscious.

The "officer of the day" now came upon the scene. He ordered those who would not walk to be placed in solitary confinement on bread and water. Breger and Monsky were the first to be punished. Eichel discontinued walking. He was dragged around a while and then placed in solitary confinement on bread and water. Steiner now refused to walk, and he, too, was placed in solitary. Silver next attracted the guard's attention. The doctor had come, and Silver informed him that since he had not eaten for two days his physical condition would not permit his exercising, and hence he would walk no more. He was ordered back into the ring by the "officer of the day," and when he refused a guard seized him and threw him to the ground. He then lifted him by the legs, to the intense delight of the spectators, and banged his head against the ground. This act was repeated a number of times. Then Silver, thoroughly shaken up, was placed on the restricted bread-and-water diet.

Breger, in the squad room, again gave vent to the wild paroxysms. His cries and intense internal struggles continued intermittently for over an hour.

WEDNESDAY, October 9.

Steiner joined the hunger strikers because he had been placed on bread and water.

Eichel was undressed and given a cold shower.

Col. Barnes, the provost marshal, called while some of the objectors were taking their enforced exercise. He ordered them to stand at "attention." When they refused, he beat them vigorously with his heavy riding crop. Shotkin was badly hurt, the colonel breaking his crop over the former's ankles. He deprecated the ruining of his stick and implied that the only reason he did not brain Shotkin was that he wasn't worth the trouble. He then addressed the men before him. "You have declared a famine strike on me. Well, the Third Assistant Secretary of War, your friend, knows it and has instructed that I permit you to starve to death."

Shotkin, limping, returned to quarters. A guard straightway ordered him outside. Shotkin insisted that he could not walk and demanded medical attention. Though the doctor was in the room at the time, no treatment was given him. On the contrary, though suffering intense pain, he was dragged outside and two guards pushed him around the inclosure.

Steiner was dragged from his solitary cell and ordered to walk. Failing to obey, a guard seized him by his fingers and dragged him around. Steiner suffered intense pain, for the slightest resistance on his part meant the pulling of his finger out of joint.

After supper two slices of bread were given to those who were presumably on bread and water, despite the fact that every one of them was on hunger strike. The sergeant informed them, "Not a d—d drop of water do you get until this bread is consumed."

THURSDAY, October 10.

Ott and Da Rosa, both materially weakened by their hunger strike, were forcibly dressed and put on exercise in the afternoon.

Ott was shoved around a while and then left unmolested.

Da Rosa was pushed about, then thrown to the wet ground, punched, kicked, and spat at by the guards. He was raised to his feet and dragged around some more. Presently he was dropped and one guard seized him by the hair and rubbed his face in and banged his head on the ground. His cheek and forehead were bruised, leaving two ugly skin wounds.

Then four guards carried him to the shower room, stripped him of what little clothes remained on his person, placed him on the cold cement floor in an exhausted condition, and turned the cold spray upon him. The soldiers then scrubbed him viciously with filthy brushes and brooms. One guard tickled his feet. He was finally brought back to the squad room in a semiconscious state.

Downey, Brandin, Bernstein, and Kaplan, feeling they could not conscientiously continue eating while their fellow conscientious objectors were being so brutalized, joined in with the hunger strikers.

FRIDAY, October 11.

Brandin, because of extreme weakness, was unable to walk. A guard pricked him with a bayonet, and then the sergeant of the guards himself pushed him around.

SATURDAY, October 12.

In the afternoon all the men, regardless of their physical condition, were ordered to dress and go out for fresh air. Those who refused were forcibly dressed and thrust outside. The men, because of their weakened state, sprawled all over the ground, while groups of spectators watched the miserable and sorry sight. At various times during the afternoon Block, Breger, and Silver collapsed from total exhaustion.

After supper the men were taken out of the solitary cells and returned to the regular squad room.

MONDAY, October 14.

Maj. Taussig, accompanied by another major, who introduced himself as our investigator, came into the room in the morning. The latter gazed sneeringly and insolently about the room and without much ado dismissed most of the men from his mind as "Russian foreigners." His questioning was confined for the most part in ascertaining the birth and nativity of the men and establishing them as "Pro-Germans and members of Von Ludendorf's third division." He finally asked, with studied irony, whether any man was in danger of losing his reason or even his life. His final remark was, "There isn't a single American in the crowd."

Our writing tablets and what little money was in our possession were taken from us. A special guard was placed over us.

TUESDAY, October 15.

Silver was examined by the doctor, and it was apparent that his condition was very poor. He was hardly able to get out of bed. In the afternoon he was taken out of our squad room and placed in a solitary cell.

THURSDAY, October 17.

The men felt that the hunger strike had accomplished its purpose, in that brutalities had been discontinued for the past few days, and decided to eat supper. Bread and milk was given us to break our fast.

FRIDAY, October 18.

Black coffee and bread was sent us for breakfast. Such food at this time most of us felt was actual poison for our systems. Hence, with one or two exceptions, we declined to eat this repast. No other food was furnished us.

SATURDAY, October 19.

Immediately after breakfast Eichel was viciously and suddenly struck two stinging blows in the mouth for failing, through no fault of his, to properly "cover off" for count.

Later, Ott and Eichel were ordered to clean the latrine by the sergeant of the guards, and when they refused the former slapped, punched, and shoved them violently against the wall and other projections.

The major who made the perfunctory investigation Monday, October 14, returned and began calling each man to explain the mistreatments he had experienced and witnessed.

We wish it known that during this tense period we were held absolutely incommunicado. Packages containing food and delicacies, sent us from home at a great expense of time, money, and sentiment, were viciously and wantonly destroyed and their contents dumped in the garbage cans, though we had at no time been told that we could not receive such packages.

The above is only a brief summary of the atrocities perpetrated upon us. The situation can never be described with sufficient vividness and intensity to impart to the authorities a real impression of the mental and physical anguish suffered by us. Most of the mistreatments took place outside, with large groups watching the sorry and revolting spectacle of defenseless men being most brutally punched, shoved, and abused.

While we do not wish to impugn the motives of the investigator we have reason to believe, because of his own statements and his obviously antagonistic attitude, that the report of his investigation would be prejudiced and not strictly in accordance with the fullest testimony of the men. We therefore feel justified in submitting this report, which we are willing to affirm under oath, merely as a confirmation to his report.

The men reached the guardhouse at Funston on the following dates, and went through the above experiences from the day of their arrival:

September 5.—Bernstein, Breger, Greenberg, Kaplan, Henessey, Larsen, and Powell.

September 27.—Downey, Eichel, Franklin, Ott, Sandin, Shotkin, Silver, and Steiner.

September 30.—Block, Da Rosa, and Monsky.

October 8.—Brandin.

A copy of this report has been given to the investigator.

We, the undersigned, consider the above a fair and accurate account of our treatment at the military police guardhouse of Camp Funston, Kans.

EXHIBIT B.

POLITICAL PRISONERS IN FEDERAL MILITARY PRISONS—MEN, STRIKING IN PROTEST AGAINST THE TREATMENT OF FELLOW PRISONERS, ARE MANACLED IN SOLITARY CONFINEMENT IN DARK UNDERGROUND CELLS ON A DIET OF BREAD AND WATER—IT IS ONLY A QUESTION OF HOW MANY DAYS THEY CAN LAST BEFORE PHYSICAL OR MENTAL COLLAPSE PUTS AN END TO THIS PHASE OF THEIR SUFFERING.

The National Civil Liberties Bureau has come into possession of information regarding conditions in the military prisons of the United States which it believes it would not be justified in withholding from the public. These prisons, called "disciplinary barracks," are located at Fort Jay, Governors Island, N. Y.; Fort Leavenworth, Kans.,; and Alcatraz Island, San Francisco Bay. Concerning the last-named prison we have at present no information. The other two are fairly well run as prisons go, with the exception of the form of punishment for recalcitrant prisoners, which consists of solitary confinement in dark cells, manacling, and a diet of broad and water. The conditions are described in the following documents. Primarily this protest has nothing to do with the offence for which the prisoners were sentenced. The first point is that torture inflicted upon any prisoner for any reason is as stupid as it is wicked and abhorrent to the American spirit. The second point is the justice of a distinction between political and criminal offenders.

I. STATEMENT OF CONDITIONS AT FORT JAY ON AUGUST 20, AS REPORTED BY DR. JUDAH L. MAGNES AND MR. JOHN S. CODMAN.

AUGUST 27, 1918.

Mr. John S. Codman, of Boston, and I went to Governors Island on the 3.15 boat and returned on the 6.30 boat.

Maj. Ward received us very courteously, and gave us every opportunity to interview the three conscientious objectors, and to examine the conditions under which they are now imprisoned.

He took us to the cells where Sterenstein and Eichel are in solitary confinement. These cells are on the top floor of the prison. Maj. Ward informed us that most solitary confinement cells are in the cellars of prisons. He gave Mr. Codman later the dimensions of these cells. They are small and all but completely dark. Light and air come in from a very small opening on the top, and through a small iron grating (in the door). Maj. Ward informed us that in many solitary confinement cells there is only the opening at the top. The door of Sterenstein's cell was opened first. We found him with his wrists shackled to the iron bars of the small opening in the door. He was in his underwear and in bare feet. There was no pail in his cell. The only thing in the cell was a blanket. When Eichel's cell was opened we found him shackled in the same way to the bars of the grating in the door. He was in his underclothes and had on one stocking. There was a pail in his cell.

Maj. Ward explained to us that they were sentenced to solitary confinement for refusing to work and obey prison instructions. (Such refusal to work will be found throughout these documents to be one of the chief sources of difficulty between the conscientious objector and the military. To the average reader it may seem difficult to understand and quite indefensible. The objectors' position may be clarified by the following explanation: (1) In certain cases the objectors felt that the work assigned to them amounted to the noncombatant service which they had refused in the first place because it relieved other men to do the very work in the Army to which they were conscientiously opposed. Other objectors considered that the mere acceptance of work under military orders was a recognition of the whole principle of conscription which they are convinced must be everywhere condemned before the world can ever become safe for real democracy. (2) At Fort Leavenworth all but a few of the objectors had consented to work, but a number finally ceased working, not so much because they were opposed to the work itself, but because such a stand was the only effective way by which to register their protest against the brutal treatment of fellow prisoners in solitary confinement. Rather than acquiesce in such wrong they would share their suffering.) They were shackled to the bars of the grating from 7.30 a. m. to 11.30 a. m. and then from 12.30 p. m. to 4.30 p. m.—the theory being that this is equivalent to an eight-hour working day. They are given two slices of bread three times a day and a pitcher of water three times a day. They are given no water with which to wash. If they wish to wash they must use some of their drinking water. They are not permitted a tooth brush. They are taken on Saturday night and given a shower bath.

"After 14 days of such confinement the prisoners are released into the prison yard for 14 days. They are given raw food, an ax for chopping wood, cooking utensils, and shelter at night. Otherwise they are regarded as men on a desert island, bound to shift for themselves. If after these 14 days of desert island life, they are still unwilling to yield their conscientious convictions, they are placed in solitary confinement again for another 14 days. This can go on indefinitely for the term of 20 or 30 years to which these men have been sentenced or until they are broken, either physically or mentally.

"We were then shown into the chaplain's office by the major, who said that we might interview each of the three prisoners separately, provided that we would give them nothing nor in any other way break the prison rules. We told him that we were particularly anxious to question the men as to the attitude of the board of review toward them.

"Robinson was the first prisoner admitted. He was not in solitary confinement, having served his 14 days. He was now undergoing the desert-island treatment, and had been for a few days. He had a healthy color and clear eye. He answered all of our questions simply and in a straightforward and in almost an objective way. We told him, as we did the others, that we were members of the National Civil Liberties Bureau, and that Mr. Baldwin had reported on their status from time to time; that we were interested in the general problem of conscientious objectors and that we had come to ask them particularly as to the attitude of the board of review. Robinson said that the board of review had interviewed him for only a few minutes, perhaps two or three, and that after that interview had declared him to be insincere. They regarded him as insincere because, so he thought, when they asked him if he would shed blood in self-defense he answered that he did not know what he would do under such circumstances. He said that he had not received any official notice as to what his sentence was, but that he had been informed through newspaper reports that he had been first sentenced for life and that then his sentence had been reduced to 20 years. He was a conscientious objector from every point of view—from the religious, the humanitarian, the political, the antimilitarist. He was of a farmer's family. He had been farming himself, and was for that reason better able physically, so he said, to endure the solitary confinement than the other men, who came from the city. He did not know how long it would be possible for him to stand the solitary confinement, but there was no doubt in his mind that, after the expiration of his 14 days of desert-island treatment, he could stand another 14 days of solitary confinement. Although most anxious to hear from his family, he could not hear from them because he had refused to sign the necessary papers. He regarded these papers as military documents and refused to sign them for that reason. He had no complaint to make as to the food that was being given to him during the desert-island treatment. His general complaint about the solitary confinement cell, and this was the general complaint of the others as well, was that it was almost impossible to sleep at night because the cells were full of vermin—bedbugs and another brown bug being particularly numerous—so numerous, in fact, that, after sleeping fits they had to be brushed in large quantities from their limbs. When we told the major afterwards of this he was quite indignant and said that he did not believe the cells were full of vermin; that he was sure they were lying, but that he would make a note of it, anyway. (I may as well remark here that the major in conversation afterwards did not seem to be as well posted as he might be on conditions in a prison to which he is supposed to be giving his complete time and attention.)

"The next prisoner admitted was Sterenstein. He came into the room blinking because of the light, after the darkness of his cell. He had been permitted to put on his prison garb. We were very grateful that because of our visit both he and Eichel were given a few minutes' respite from their shackles. Sterenstein had quite a heavy growth of beard. (The prisoners in solitary confinement not being permitted, of course, to shave.) He seemed to be physically the weakest of the three. He informed us that he had been sentenced to 30 years for refusing inoculation and refusing to work. Neither he nor Eichel had been adjudged as insincere by Judge Mack's board. It was his opinion that he and Eichel were being kept at Fort Jay because it was necessary for the authorities to subject a few men to severe punishment as an example to others. Other men who held precisely the same views and who had refused to obey certain orders had been transferred to Fort Leavenworth. He said that as a Socialist and humanitarian it was not possible for him to do anything to further the war; that he realized his life did not belong to him at a time when thousands of men were losing their lives, and that he was ready to be shot if only in that way he might give testimony to the faith that was in him. When he and Eichel came to Fort Jay they were undecided as to whether or not they would work on the stone pile. They worked on the stone pile for one day and then came to the conclusion that it was wrong to do this, because they would then be relieving some other men for military work. They thereupon refused to do other prison work and were placed in solitary confinement for this. Maj. Ward later cited their one day's work as conclusive evidence of their insincerity. Sterenstein complained of the petty annoyances to which the objectors were being treated by some of the guards. He was ready to serve his complete sentence without flinching, but did not think that they should be subjected to severer treatment than their sentence called for. He said that guards had beaten up at least two men to his knowledge, one of them in a cell, and that Maj. Ward himself had declared that one man would have to be beaten up, inasmuch as that was the only way to deal with him. Maj. Ward declared afterwards that as far as he knew no man had been beaten up at the prison for a whole year. Sterenstein said that at certain times of the day some rays of light came into his cell so that it was possible for him to read surreptitiously. He pulled out a tattered copy of the New Testament from his stocking, saying that he had been able to conceal this. He complained of the trouble the vermin gave at night. He thought also that if he might be permitted, when shackled, to stand in his shoes it would be easier for him, because he had flat feet. He had a handkerchief during the 14 days, inasmuch as there was one in his clothes. No handkerchief had been offered him by the authorities. When asked if he objected to our repeating some of his remarks, he said that he was entirely willing to suffer any reprisal that might be meted out if only the cause of the conscientious objector might thus be helped.

"Eichel appeared to be stronger physically than Sterenstein and just as steadfast in his determination to hold out as long as he could. His attitude was practically the same as that of Sterenstein. There was no discrepancy between the statements of any of the three prisoners. Eichel was particularly anxious to have his family know that he was still at Fort Jay. They had not been permitted to hear from their families."

As a result of our complaint to the War Department, based upon this and other reports, the conscientious objectors in question were transferred to Fort Leavenworth, where the cells are said to be more sanitary; but the use of these cells at Fort Jay for the punishment of recalcitrant prisoners still continues to this day.

II. STATEMENTS AS TO CONDITIONS AT THE DISCIPLINARY BARRACKS, FORT LEAVENWORTH, KANS.

This is the chief military prison in the United States. At this time it contains approximately 3,000 prisoners, of whom about 300 are conscientious objectors. Most of these latter are under sentences ranging from 10 to 30 years. Whatever the particular charges on which they were court-martialed, they are imprisoned for one reason only, and that is their steadfast refusal on religious or other conscientious grounds to accept any form of conscript service under military authority.

The documents which follow come from prisoners whose names we can not publicly disclose, but who are known to us to be trustworthy:

1. Bulletin on conditions within the prison as they were about November 6. [We know the author of this bulletin and can vouch for his character and accuracy.—Ed.]

"Evan W. Thomas finally refused to continue work * * *, and the following day he was put in solitary confinement.

"His final statement was that in going to the 'hole' he was protesting against the entire prison system, as well as the fact that conscientious objectors are not distinguished from ordinary criminals and against the mistreatment of individual conscientious objectors.

"He believes that officials here are acting according to instructions from authorities in Washington.

"He plans to remain in 'solitary' until he collapses physically if conditions are not changed.

"Nine conscientious objectors, serving long sentences at the United States Disciplinary Barracks for refusal to submit to military conscription, are in solitary confinement in the institution because they have declined to engage in prison labor. * * *

"Five of these men have been brutally beaten and manhandled since they arrived.

"These nine men are handcuffed and chained by their wrists to the bars of the door for nine hours a day in darkened cells. The solitary cells here are in the sub-basement of the prison. Prisoners in such confinement are rationed on bread and water. Most of these executive sentences are for 14 days, but some of the objectors have been in solitary 30, 40, or even, in one case, 50 days. * * *

"Following is a list of the nine conscientious objectors enduring solitary punishment:

"Thomas Reed (colored), religious, arrived from Fort Jay, N. Y., on September 13, in solitary since September 15.

"Hyman Bloch, religious, from Camp Funston, September 20, in solitary since November 4.

"Jacob Wurtzman, socialist, from Fort Riley, November 4.

"Henry Monsky, socialist, from Camp Funston, November 4.

"Abraham Geleiter, orthodox Jew, from Fort Jay, September 13.

"Jake Conovaloff, religious, Camp Funston, October 20.

"Fred Uren, religious, Camp Funston, October 20.

"Morris Shuben, religious, Camp Funston, November 2.

"Andre Shuben, religious, Camp Funston, October 28.

"Prisoners, including at least two conscientious objectors, witnessed the brutal treatment given Dan Yoder and S. Herschberger, both from Camp Sherman, Ohio, November 1, and their accounts are substantially as follows:

"These men are members of the Ammish Mennonite sect, one of the religious rules of which forbids the wearing of clothes fastened by buttons. Upon their arrival they refused to don the uniform of military offenders. They were taken to the clothing storeroom and undressed forcibly by sentries, and were put into prison clothes.

"Sergt. Morris, foreman of the clothing storeroom, then took the two prisoners to the bathroom. There they again refused to cooperate. Again they were disrobed roughly. They were led under the cold showers and held there for between 10 and 15 minutes.

"Herschberger took the coarse 'laundry' soap that was forced upon him and washed himself. Yoder was led, or almost dragged, by the hair, shivering and crying noisily. Sergt. Morris, who was holding him, still by the hair, then ordered all the warm water to be turned off. Yoder refused to wash himself. The sergeant took a large cake of soap and a heavy fiber brush and began to scrub him, rubbed the soap up and down over his face and roughly applied the scrubbing brush to his body.

"They refused to put on the uniform. Herschberger dried himself and was dressed by other prisoners and sentries. Yoder, in the hands of the sergeant, was knocked down onto the cold cement floor. Without being dried, he was forced into the uniform. During this process his head was held between the knees of Sergt. Morris. When his underclothes were on, the sergeant lifted him up by the ears. This treatment has caused these two men to submit to prison labor against their beliefs.

"Instances can be multiplied. Geleiter, when he refused to drill, was beaten by sentries before he was put into solitary. Even there he was deprived of his phylactery, a religious article, indispensable to him. Uren and A. Shuben were beaten in the executive office. Corpl. Harry Hunter inflicted the bodily punishment in these last cases. His actions were unauthorized, and in consequence he has been suspended as yard corporal.

"But that is the only show of justice that the authorities of the institution have given in respect to these outrages. The incidents of Yoder and Herschberger were reported by two prisoners to Capt. Harry Mitchell, adjutant, and by him to Capt. L. A. Humason, intelligence officer. Nothing further has been done. It is not known whether reports of these affairs were allowed to reach officials in Washington or whether proper punishment is to be meted out to the soldiers who committed these brutalities. * * *

"Thomas has stated briefly how most of the political conscientious objectors regard this situation. When he submitted his letter to Col. Sedgewick Rice, the commandant, he was read an order from Washington stating that conscientious objectors who have been sentenced shall be treated as the ordinary criminal soldier."

2. Extract from letter written November 7:

"You will wonder at my sanity if I tell you that I am trying to pick a vegetarian existence out of the limited rations in the mess hall. There are several of us now. * * * One is Rose, from New York, who passes on all the books sent to prisoners; another is Sylva, just arrived from Funston and still weak from the effects of his hunger strike; another is a robust athlete from Denver; and the other four are Israelites from Benton Harbor who tremble lest by eating a morsel of animal fat they will violate the exhortations of Holy Writ. The table has contributed so many to the 'hole' that some begin to fear it is enchanted. Block, from Riley, has just gone down for refusal to work; Geleiter, from Fort Jay, has been in solitary for weeks, and several Russians have gone after him.

"In the 'hole,' a dungeon in the sub-basement, the men are fed only bread and water, and are handcuffed to their cell doors for nine or more hours a day. During the first week they stand with their hands crossed at their breasts; during the second they hang by their wrists. [We presume, with their feet on the floor.—Ed.]

"The 'screws' [sentries] are brutal. I have gone down with food from the mess hall several times to observe them. The air reeks with curses and foul drule. I have not heard these fellows suggest anything nearer a human reaction than a bestial laugh at some lewd tale. It follows that these men handle the prisoners with little gentleness. Geleiter has been beaten periodically. I saw him dragged by the collar, choking, across the rough floor of the corridors and the barber shop into the bath. One sentry knocked him down upon the cement floor, another undressed him with such brutality that he screamed with pain, and three of them forced him into the shower and scrubbed him with coarse soap.

"The Russians from Riley came out of confinement yesterday wan and staggering. They have gone to work. Both are religious objectors. Some of the Russians now in confinement have gone through the worst experiences in jail which the worst of the Tzars had to offer. They say that there they were permitted to cook their own food and were let alone. They swear that their life there was easy in comparison to this.

"Fellows who came from Camp Sherman last week declined to don the prison garb. (From other sources we learn that this was because of religious scruples against wearing buttons.) Two of them persisted. They were beaten into submission and the clothes were forced on them. For a time one of them wore his bundle around his neck, refusing to touch it; but he, too, was forcibly dressed. It is said that a captain witnessed the original beating and that he turned his back and walked off without interceding. The sentries to whom he left the job dragged the boys to the bathroom and treated them to Geleiter's experience, scrubbing the flesh of one with the ubiquitous galvanic soap and a coarse scrubbing brush. The water was so cold that the rest of us spent scarcely three minutes under it and retreated. Yet these C. O.'s were held under it for nearly 15 minutes. Corporal ——— is being tried for beating up two Russians—Holy Jumpers from Texas—for their refusal to salute and work. He administered one of his pummelings in the office of the executive officer, who himself had to stop the struggle. But he is being tried because his specific act was not authorized. The 'hole' treatment is known by everyone in all its details and is accepted by the authorities. * * *"

3. Letters of November 14 and 15 on the situation to date.

Box 60, Fort Leavenworth, November 14.

My Dear ———: Francis Hennessy has asked me to send you this message, for just now he can not write.

The group of boys from Fort Riley and Camp Funston came to Leavenworth more than a week ago. Most of them began working in and about the prison, but practically all have refused to work longer and are now doing penance in the "holes." The "hole" is our jail, you know—a black, cold place in the sub-basement. The men hang there chained by their wrists to their cell doors for nine hours a day. They sleep on the cold cement floor between foul blankets and are given bread and water, if they will eat at all. They can not speak, and of course they can neitner read nor write. [That is, they are not allowed, being chained in the dark.—Ed.]

There is brutality enough, too. Some of the men have been beaten periodically. I saw one man dragged by his collar across the rough corridor floor, screaming and choking, to the bath. He was knocked about on the floor for failing to undress, and was then stripped roughly and thrust under a cold bath. * * * He has since gone to the hospital.

Several Russians—Holy Jumpers from Arizona—have been hunger striking in the hole. Two of them were beaten so bestially that even the authorities were shocked, and the sentry is to be court-martialed. The sentry is being tried, however, only because he exceeded his authority. The other beatings and tortures are matters of general knowledge and are accepted by the authorities as justifiable. These Russians were so weak at the end of six days that two of them had to be sent to the hospital—veritable ghosts. * * * They are ready to die in this dungeon. Their courage, so firm and beautiful, shames the others of us.

Evan Thomas, Howard Moore (on Nov. 8, 1918, the Carnegie Hero Fund Commission awarded Howard Moore a hero medal and $500 for the gallant rescue of Miss Hanney off Bell Island, Conn. When the award was made, he was prisoner at Fort Leavenworth for conscience sake. Other of his comrades are no less brave). Rose (of Philadelphia), Hennessy, and about 20 others are now in the pit. They are protesting against the brutalities and tortures, compulsory work, compulsory chapel on Sunday, and against the imprisonment itself. The local officers are relentless in punishing this breach of discipline, and promise one man a court-martial, I am told, as a lesson to the rest of us. Little more could be expected of them. But from Washington we hope that some recognition of the condition may be drawn. We hope, of course, that the administration will act as liberally as it has so often spoken and that it will recognize the right to be free-minded, religiously and politically. We feel that if the Government is not committed by deed to the principle, the sacrifice we have been making has accomplished nothing except, perhaps, to create a splendid social propagandist material.

We wish that some one could visit us and see with his own eyes the results of the repressive policies which these military persons call justice. * * *

We have all come to love Francis in the few days that he has been here. He is a lad of the quietest courage. He has not the slightest hesitancy about stepping into this dungeon. He wants you to be assured that he will come through happily.

Very truly, yours,

(Signed)

NOVEMBER 16.

This is a supplement to the letter I sent concerning Francis Hennessy. The boys in the dungeon are hunger striking now, demanding their release. They are being forcibly fed in the usual manner. I can not learn whether Francis is among them, but he said when he left me that he intended going the limit. He was getting on quite happily on bread and water yesterday morning.

Rose, of Philadelphia, who struck for 25 days in Camp Meade, was taken from the wing yesterday and ordered to begin breaking rock. He refused and was forced to stand all day, the cold wind cutting his flesh, eating nothing. He went to his cell in the evening shuddering with chills and burning with fever. To-day he is out in the yard again, professing health and liberty. He is to be court-martialed, he is told, and given a long term of years in the Federal penitentiary.

Others will be joining the hunger strike day by day. None will die, for the officers do not want the responsibility of making explanations to enraged parents and friends, and the public generally; but they will all have a sober time of it. As long as I am at liberty myself, I shall be happy to tell you of the condition of Hennessy and of the others.

Very truly,

(Signed) ——— ———.

4. Digest of a report by an investigator sent to Fort Leavenworth by the National Civil Liberties Bureau:

NOVEMBER 18, 1918.

The investigator states that at the time of his visit there were in confinement at Fort Leavenworth 280 conscientious objectors, and that several had died of the recent epidemic of influenza. The assistant commander refused absolutely to allow him to copy the names of any of these men, nor would he state what treatment was given to objectors who refused to do work assigned to them. The investigator adds that from his observations "they would not be accorded very much consideration as human beings," that they are "very thinly clad," "are constantly under the eye of an armed man," and that "hundreds of armed guards of the rough-house type are with the men at all times."

5. Documents illustrating the reason why some of the men quit work in protest against the punishment of certain of their comrades.

(a) Letter of prisoner No. 14822 to The Adjutant General, Washington, D. C.:

UNITED STATES DISCIPLINARY BARRACKS,
Fort Leavenworth, November 5, 1918.

From: General Prisoner Evan W. Thomas, Serial No. 14822, United States Disciplinary Barracks, Fort Leavenworth, Kans.
To: The Adjutant General, Washington, D. C.
Subject: Treatment of conscientious objectors.

SIR: In a letter written by you dated August 18, 1918, to David E. Eichel at Fort Riley, Kans., you declared that it is not the policy of the Government to coerce the conscience of individual objectors, but that, on the other hand, great and liberal concessions have been made to conscientious objectors. I know that the same impression has been given by the Government to many other individuals through letters as well as through the public statements of officials.

Yet the fact remains that in accordance with the regulations a number of the many conscientious objectors now confined in the disciplinary barracks here are in solitary confinement, chained to the bars of their cells nine hours a day for conscience sake. I have been witness of the mental anguish through which some of the men have gone because they could not work in this institution, no matter what the consequences might be I myself have on repeated occasions before coming here declared to Army officers that I would not work in the disciplinary barracks if the consciences of others were coerced or if the work was the same as noncombatant service in the Army.

Nevertheless, since my arrival here, on October 20, I have been working. It is not my desire, even if it were possible, to interfere with the discipline of this institution, nor do I believe that that is the intention of the objectors now in solitary confinement. But the fact remains that in spite of the many liberal statements made by the Government the conscientious objector is being treated exactly as the recalcitrant or criminal soldier.

In view of the explicit promises made by the Government, can not some provision be made to relieve the situation here?

Respectfully, yours,

(Signed) EVAN W. THOMAS.

(b) Memorandum sent to mother of prisoner No. 14822 in reply to her questions with regard to her son:

NOVEMBER 13, 1918.

MEMORANDUM FOR COMMANDANT.

Circumstances under which No. 14822 came into the office and the reasons for going into solitary confinement rather than work.

1. I was in need of two reliable copyists in the office and was entering the office of the executive officer to apply for these men and remarked my needs to Capt. Leard, who was also entering the office of the executive officer. He pointed out No. 14822 and said, "There is the very man you want. He is a graduate of Princeton and has had two years at Oxford, and he is now going to the executive officer to decline to work and to take his medicine for conscience sake and what he supposes to be his duty."

I asked the executive officer about this man and told him that such a man was at least entitled to an interview, and asked him to send 14822 to my office.

I talked to this prisoner, No. 14822, for 30 minutes trying to convince him that he was really arraying himself on the side of disorder as against the law of his country and order, however his case of injustice and inconsistency might appear to him. The interview closed with my giving him the permission of coming into the office the next day, and suggested that he would save himself further trouble by being useful to us and his country.

He came into the office the next day and said he had concluded to work for me and I put him to work with the purchasing department. Two days later, we found that it was necessary to put another man on the records of our registered stock. I called for 14822 and told him that I had concluded to give him this work, as it was the most accurate work in its requirements in the office. He informed me that he was on the point of asking for an interview to tell me that he had made a mistake in not going to the executive officer and refusing to work in the first place, but feeling as he did about it, he felt that to save himself the ordinary punishment of his refusal was an act of cowardice, and that he was really diverted from his refusal to work by fear. He had thus concluded to take his medicine. I said to him, "You have fully determined on this course—there is no further use of conversation or argument?" and he said, "No, sir."

I directed him to report to the executive officer.

(Signed) SAMUEL A. SMOKE.
Major, United States Army, Retired.

In connection with these documents it may perhaps be added that almost all of these objectors came to Fort Leavenworth after months of segregation or imprisonment in guardhouses, where many of them suffered severely from the brutality of guards and petty officers.

We are not issuing these documents to argue the question of conscientious objection. It is plainly evident, however, that the charge of physical cowardice so often leveled against the conscientious objector is false in the case of the men who are confined in Leavenworth. Without exception, they could have avoided their heavy sentences merely by accepting noncombatant service. Many, in an effort to protest against the treatment of fellow prisoners, have gone so far as to choose deliberately a course which led inevitably to the horrors of the "hole." Misguided perhaps, fanatics perhaps, but not cowards!

The treatment administered to these men can not conceivably be the only or the best course open to the State. They are capable of the quixotic generosity of a sympathetic strike in prison, they are eager to serve high causes outside prison walls; the State seems to confess its weakness and perplexity in finding no alternative to the brutal method of crushing them in mind or body.

The facts which we have cited raise two issue:

(1) The use of torture in military prisons to enforce obedience. This is as unnecessary as it is barbarous. Conscientious objectors may be rendering a real social service in calling attention to the use of solitary confinement, such as we have described, to which ordinary military offenders have been subjected for years.

(2) Political prisoners, of whom conscientious objectors are one group, should be distinguished from ordinary offenders against the criminal law. Such is the almost universal practice in Europe. In Great Britain the so-called "absolutists" objectors were never confined in military prisons and no sentences exceeded two years. This policy was carried out in the heat of the war. Our own Government has repeatedly declared its intention not to coerce the conscience of any recognized objector, yet by confining these men in military prisons, it raises the question of coercion in an acute form. From the standpoint of the well-being of the State, as truly as of the ancient American liberties of conscience and free speech, what possible good end is served by the indefinite confinement of political prisoners who are eager to render useful service outside prison walls? The situation is urgent. This torture can have but one end—the utter breaking of the men in body, mind, or spirit.

No solution of this problem short of complete pardon will satisfy the generosity or sense of fair play of the American people. But in the meantime it is our particular purpose to urge (a) the immediate release of men now chained in solitary confinement and the permanent abolition of this and similar obsolete forms of discipline in military prisons; (b) the recognition of the status of conscientious objectors as political prisoners.

In creating the Department of Labor Congress declared that its purpose was to promote and develop [not labor unions, but] the welfare of wage earners, to improve their working conditions, and to advance their opportunities for profitable employment. Congress did not declare that the millions of wage earners not union men were "scabs" and not entitled to any consideration. I am for giving an equal chance alike to all of the honest toilers of this Republic, and I am unalterably against subjecting every department and branch of this Government to the selfish whims, dictates, and demands of an autocratic leader of organized labor.

OF

HON. THOMAS L. BLANTON,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 4, 1919.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, during the debate on the sundry civil bill last Friday I took the position that the balance of the previous appropriation made still available of $1,543,400, supplemented by the $1,800,000 provided for in H. R. 16187 passed that day, was amply sufficient to carry on the Employment Service and that the extra $10,000,000 demanded by organized labor was unnecessary and should not be allowed.

Therefore, when the distinguished gentleman [Mr. WATKINS] offered his amendment proposing to increase this appropriation with the enormous sum of $10,033,808.10, I objected to it and made a point of order against it, which the Chair sustained. And likewise when the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] offered his amendment to increase this appropriation, I opposed and helped to defeat it.

Then there was an attempt made by the sponsors of organized labor to secure this extra $10,000,000 in spite of the law and the rules of the House, and the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] offered the following amendment:

Amendment offered by Mr. GALLIVAN: Page 152, line 20, insert a new section as follows:

"To enable the Secretary of Labor to advance the opportunities for profitable employment of the wage earners of the United States there is hereby appropriated out of available money in the Treasury, $10,033,808.10.

I promptly objected to it, and made a point of order against it, and I here insert from the RECORD of the proceedings the remarks I made in favor of the point of order:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. The law which sets forth the purpose of this department shows that the purpose is threefold. Simply because it specifies this threefold purpose is no reason why Congress has the right to inaugurate new legislation here and spend $10,000,000. One of the purposes is to promote and develop the welfare of wage earners. Why, if the gentleman from Massachusetts is correct in his contention, the Secretary of Labor could contend that he could furnish every wage earner with a Pierce-Arrow limousine to ride to his place of work. That would promote his welfare. Would the gentleman contend it would not require legislation, special legislation, for the Secretary of Labor to do a thing of that kind? One of the purposes is that it is to improve their working conditions. Why, the Secretary of Labor might decide in his discretion that in order to have their working conditions improved each one of them should own a brownstone mansion. Would the gentleman contend for one moment that the Secretary of Labor could carry out that purpose from a lump appropriation without special legislation authorizing it? The other purpose is "to advance their opportunities for profitable employment." Why, the Secretary of Labor might well say that it would advance their opportunities for profitable employment to send each one of them to Yale University or to Harvard or to Columbia, and let them take an A. B. degree. Does the gentleman contend, simply because he is to help them in their opportunities, he could decide in his discretion to give them a university education out of the lump-sum appropriation, without new and special legislation passed by Congress to authorize it?

I submit, Mr. Chairman, it does take new legislation here to authorize the expenditure of this $10,000,000 proposed, and without new legislation authorizing it it is certainly subject to a point of order.

After the Chair had sustained my point of order, and ruled the amendment out of order, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] appealed from the decision of the Chair, but the House sustained the Chair by a vote of 114 ayes to 58 noes.

And then the renowned Socialist Member from New York [Mr. LONDON] made his attempt to secure this $10,000,000 as follows, copying from Record:

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to offer an amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.
Mr. LONDON. As a section for the purpose of continuing the present system of unemployment exchanges, the sum of $10,000,000.
Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.
Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.
Mr. BLANTON. I make a point of order. It is new legislation.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:
"Amendment offered by Mr. LONDON: Page 152, after line 20, insert, as a new section, the following:
"'For the purpose of continuing the present system of unemployment exchanges, $10,000,000.'"
Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chariman, I make the point of order that it is new legislation.
The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order.

And the Chair, after the prolonged argument which ensued, again sustained my point of order and ruled the amendment out of order.

And then my eloquent friend, the orator from Missouri [Mr. DECKER], contributed to the cause by offering his amendment:

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.
The Clerk read as follows:
"Amendment offered by Mr. DECKER: Page 152, after line 20, insert as a new section:
"'For expenses of Department of Labor, made necessary by the act of March 4, 1913, entitled "An act to create a Department of Labor," $10,000,000.'"
Mr. BLANTON. I make a point of order against the amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.
Mr. GALLIVAN. I should like to have the gentleman give some reason for the point of order.
Mr. BLANTON. Because it is legislation and not germane.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] then appealed from the decision of the Chair in sustaining my point or order, and the House sustained the decision of the Chair by a vote of 106 ayes to 33 noes. And so this $10,000,000 was saved to the already overburdened taxpayers of this country.

Mr. Speaker, there is not a Member of this House who is a stancher, truer, more deeply sympathetic friend to all laboring men who toil for their daily bread than I am. I could not be otherwise. I have fought their battles for over 20 years. Left to meet the struggles of life when a boy only 10 years old, I know through hard experience the problem of earning bread, working for every dollar that procures your education, and fighting on every inch of the ground, step by step, the innumerable obstacles always found blocking the path of success.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am for all men who labor, and not for just a special favored few. I am not willing to subject every department and branch of this Government to the selfish whims, interests, dictates, and demands of the autocratic leader and master of 3,000,000 members of organized labor to the detriment of 50,000,000 other honest toilers in the United States. I am just as much opposed to autocracy assumed and practiced by Samuel Gompers as I am to that of a Hohenzollern kaiser.

For a proper labor employment service, run in the interest of all wage earners alike, and not merely in the interest of labor organizations and the big-salary-drawing employees of this Government, I would vote for one million or ten million or even one hundred million dollars, if same were necessary. But from a careful study of the question and of conditions prevailing here in Washington during the past two years, I have become firmly convinced that our Labor Department in States other than Texas, which, thank God, has not yet become Gomperized, is run more in the interest of labor unions and high-salaried officials than it is for wage earners generally. In his autobiography the Secretary of Labor specially emphasizes the fact that he has taken an active part in trade-union affairs from early manhood, and for eight years was international secretary-treasurer of the United Mine Workers of America. He has seen fit to appoint as chief clerk of the Department of Labor, Samuel J. Gompers, son of the president of the American Federation of Labor. It will be remembered that labor unions have designated as "scabs" all laboring men not members.

Now, in the hearings on the sundry civil bill, part 2, pages 965 to 1755, Mr. J. B. Densmore, Director General of the United States Employment Service, in his testimony, admitted that up to January 1, 1919, this department had expended $3,282,790, and he also admitted that out of the last appropriation of $5,500,000 he still had left on hand on February 1, 1919, the sum of $1,543,400 thereafter to be expended. To this sum, in the deficiency appropriation bill passed last Friday, Congress gave him the additional sum of $1,800,000.

Now, let us see how this Employment Service has been spending this money of the people in such enormous sums. I will only mention the administration office here in Washington. It will be interesting to the people, and to the returned soldier boys who have been fighting in trenches mud deep in France 24 hours out of the 24 sometimes for $33 per month, to learn what the officers of this Employment Service have been allowed by the Secretary of Labor for seven hours work per day. I give below the official designation, number, and salaries of such officers in the administration office alone of the Employment Service:

In addition to the above, this Employment Service had in the field 3,784 representatives on the pay roll of the Government. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], through questioning, brought out the fact that it is the intention of this department to raise the salary of the director general, Mr. Densmore, to $7,500, the salary of the assistant director to $6,000, the salary of two other assistants to the director to $5,000 each, and the salary of seven other assistants to the director at $4,500 each; yet the Legislature of Texas, simply because it is requested so to do by these big salary drawing officers, without knowing much about the real facts, has passed a resolution demanding that Texas Congressmen support this program. Fortunately I got my commission directly from the people and use my own mind in doing a little thinking myself in their behalf. From July 1, 1918, to December 31, 1918, six months, said Employment Service paid out in—

Salaries	$1,967,962.81
Rent of offices	229,239.11
Per diem expenses	164,380.00

The following examination of Director Densmore by Chairman BYRNES, as taken from said hearings, may be of interest:

Mr. BYRNES. I notice you have an adviser on industrial relations; who is your adviser on industrial relations?

Mr. DENSMORE. Mr. Hugh Frayne; he came to us from the War Industries Board. He was a member of the War Industries Board.

Mr. BYRNES. A special camp organizer, $4,000; what are his duties?

Mr. DENSMORE. He has been organizing special offices in all demobilization camps.

Mr. BYRNES. Director of negro economics; who is your director?

Mr. DENSMORE. That is carried now and has been carried all the time on our pay roll as some other items have; that is Dr. Haynes, in the Secretary's office. He is director of negro economics in the Department of Labor and paid from our appropriation.

Mr. BYRNES. If he is now in the department on the work, why is he to be paid out of that appropriation?

Mr. DENSMORE. The operations which he is directing are pretty closely allied to the employment work.

Mr. BYRNES. What does he do?

Mr. DENSMORE. He is adviser to the Secretary of Labor on negro economics and employment.

Mr. BYRNES. That has nothing to do with this Employment Service?

Mr. DENSMORE. That, however, might as well be out of there, because there is an appropriation being asked for that. Isn't that true, Mr. Gompers?

Mr. GOMPERS. I know of no such estimate.

Mr. DENSMORE. I thought there was one; we have a good many negro officers and negro field officers.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BYRNES. Your director of negro economics is a negro?

Mr. DENSMORE. He is; Dr. Haynes, a university man.

Mr. BYRNES. He is an assistant and supposed supervisor?

Mr. DENSMORE. Yes, sir.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BYRNES. The director of economics and supervisor of economics; I do not see what functions they are exercising with regard to the employment of labor?

Mr. DENSMORE. Well, they do a very great deal; the director of negro economics arranges all the cooperation of the negro organizations in the field.

Mr. BYRNES. Have you had him for some length of time?

Mr. DENSMORE. Yes, sir; I don't know when he was appointed.

Mr. BYRNES. Was he there when you came there?

Mr. DENSMORE. He came in about a year ago.

Mr. BYRNES. Do you propose to continue in the service the director of negro economics as assistant supervisor?

Mr. DENSMORE. If the Secretary desires to.

Mr. BYRNES. Your senior clerks, I notice you pay them from $1,800 to $2,620 a year.

Mr. DENSMORE. Well, they are carried as senior clerks.

Mr. BYRNES. Is there any special duty that devolves upon them? Are they stenographers, or what is the character of their service?

Mr. DENSMORE. I think that title is not at all indicative of what they do; they are not clerks; they are various heads of separate sections and other special duties.

Mr. BYRNES. You have got chiefs of sections from $4,500 to $2,400.

Mr. DENSMORE. Those section chiefs, however, aside from those two or rather the first three—the first three are practically divisions.

* * * * * * * *

TRANSPORTATION OF WORKERS.

Mr. BYRNES. This item of $250,000 for transportation of workers on page 635—what is the status of that appropriation?

Mr. DENSMORE. We have practically all of it.

Mr. BYRNES. You practically have all of it?

Mr. DENSMORE. Yes, sir; we used very little of it.

* * * * * * *

Mr. MONDELL. Is it actually advanced for transportation costs?

Mr. DENSMORE. In a few cases.

Now, I will show you why so little of that transportation money was furnished to workmen, and one of my constituents is forced to borrow money to get home. Read the following:

AFFIDAVIT.

I, J. W. Weatherly, being duly sworn, upon oath state: I live in Stephens County, Tex. On account of passing through a three years' drought I was persuaded by a Government representative of the United States Employment Service to leave Texas, and was specifically promised that if I would go North and work three months, not only my transportation there would be paid, but that all of my transportation and meals in returning home would be paid. I left Texas in August and worked faithfully. I was refused my return transportation, and have not been able to get 1 cent, and will be forced to go home at my own expense. Not belonging to a union, I received 40 cents an hour, and later received 45 cents an hour, and by working 10 hours a day I made $4.40 per day, while some union men were making $10 a day, or $1 per hour. I know a number of Texas men who were fooled about their transportation just as I was, they being promised same by the Government representative of the United States Employment Service as an inducement to leave their homes, and they have been forced to pay their own expenses back to Texas. Counting expenses, I could have made much more money in Texas and had the pleasure of remaining with my family.

J. W. WEATHERLY.

Sworn to and subscribed before me on this the 3d day of March, A. D. 1919.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
UNITED STATES EMPLOYMENT SERVICE,
Washington, February 25, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: Acknowledgment is made of your letter of February 24, inclosing communication concerning J. W. Weatherly, in which you wanted information as to whether transportation would be furnished Mr. Weatherly for his return trip to Fort Worth, Tex.

We regret to say that no men were promised return transportation to their homes from projects constructed by the Government. In many cases transportation to a job was, of course, furnished. No provisions, however, were made for the trip home.

Very truly, yours,

J. B. DENSMORE, Director General.

And this Employment Service has refused to pay this return transportation to several hundred of my constituents to whom, as a special inducement, such Government agents in the field had promised would be done if they would leave Texas and come North.

UNPRECEDENTED PROPAGANDA AT GOVERNMENT EXPENSE.

During the hearings on the third deficiency bill, held by the Appropriations Committee, the chairman asked Director Densmore if he knew who caused the hundreds of telegrams to be sent Congressmen in behalf of the Employment Service, and in reply—page 414, February 22, 1919—Director Densmore stated:

I accept all the responsibility for it.

And, on page 428, Director Densmore admitted that Mr. Hugh Frayne, the adviser on industrial relations for the United States Employment Service, is a member of organized labor.

Now, let us see what kind of telegrams Director Densmore had sent out from Washington, at Government expense, to the labor unions and chambers of commerce throughout the 48 States of this Republic in an effort to get his additional $10,000,000 appropriation. Read the following clipping from the Abilene Daily Reporter, of Abilene, Tex.:

TELEGRAM URGES INDORSEMENT OF BUREAU OF LABOR.

The chamber of commerce has received a telegram from the managing editor of the United States Employment Service Bulletin, the official organ of the Federal Employment Service, urging that the local organization and other civil organizations of towns and cities in the western part of Texas use their influence to counteract present opposition developing at Washington against the continuation of the Employment Service over the Nation. The telegram seeks to have these organizations at once telegraph their Representatives in Congress to press the passage of a bill which would establish permanently the bureaus of the country and provide appropriations sufficient to conduct the business of the service in an efficient manner.

On page 10, issue of February 26, 1919, of the Waco Times-Herald, Waco, Tex., appeared the following resolution from the Young Men's Business League:

NO HELP FOR UNITED STATES SERVICE.

Secretary W. T. Wheeler presented a letter and telegram from H. W. Lewis, State director of the United States Employment Service, made defunct by a bill of Congress, urging that the Y. M. B. L. pass resolutions and take steps to cause legislators at the National Capital to provide for the continuance of the Employment Service.

Not a single director evinced a desire to help Mr. Lewis and other gentlemen of the service mentioned, the general sense of the directorate, on the other hand, being that "the usefulness of many bureaus and commissions created on account of the war are now passed."

I wish that the people knew just how many telegrams the labor unions all over the United States, at the instance of this Employment Service, have sent to the 435 Members of Congress. Also through their influence, by causing them to believe that it was in behalf of our returning soldiers, mayors, chambers of commerce, chiefs of police, and other officers and prominent citizens have sacrificed much money telegraphing us. I received a long telegram from Hon. J. F. Carl, of San Antonio, and a 223-word telegram, sent at Government expense, from Director Lewis, of the Employment Service there, attempting to tell me facts about which I had more definite information than he did, and when I later received a 1,000-word telegram from Judge Carl I sent an answer in reply to all of them through the public press; and to satisfy the curiosity of my genial Irish friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN], I will state that I sent it as official business.

During the debate on the sundry civil bill, in discussing this extensive progaganda propagated by Government employees in Washington, I inserted in the RECORD my said telegram, to wit:

[Telegram.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 26, 1919.

SAN ANTONIO EXPRESS,
San Antonio, Tex.:

Kindly permit me to publicly answer a 1,000-word telegram just received from Director J. F. Carl. Sundry civil bill continues Employment Service until July. This service in Texas is beneficial, worthy, and ideal. Not so in many other States. It is not the returning soldier boys who are now demanding that this service be made permanent, adding an extra ten million appropriation for coming year, but it is members of organized labor who didn't enlist or fight, but who claimed industrial exemptions, and who during entire war have drawn higher wages than ever dreamed of before, as high as $11 per day, more than the salary of the Governor of Texas, while our fighting boys in trenches were paid only $33 per month. When Gen. Crowder ordered all "men to work or fight," it was Samuel Gompers and this same bunch who threateningly told him that he could not apply the work-or-fight order to organized labor, and thus forced the drafting of boys 18 years old. When Congress required the 240,000 Government clerks, drawing annual salaries up to $2,500, to work eight hours per day during the war, it was this same bunch who forced President Wilson to veto this eight-hour provision by thousands of such employees threatening to march on the Capitol and threatening to quit work and thus crippling every department of Government in war time. Statistics in Labor Bureau show that during war—April 6, 1917, until armistice was signed, November 11, 1918—there were in the United States 6,000 strikes by members of organized labor, lasting an average of 17 days' duration.

In several Southern States where farming is absolutely dependent upon negro labor, Government representatives of this Employment Service have induced thousands of negroes to leave farms and have unionized them in cities. The editor of the Employment Service Bulletin here has lately wired the unions and chambers of commerce throughout my district urging them to insist on my supporting this union program, and it takes an extra stenographer to answer such communications from labor unions. Although 45 States have ratified the prohibition amendment, and it is a part of our Constitution, these same labor unions are arranging a strike against the Constitution of the United States on July 1. They also defied law and the courts of California.

Mr. Samuel Gompers has cabled us to support this and other union measures, insinuating that a failure to do so might cause a revolution of the discontented labor members here. It has now reached a point when Congress must decide whether America and its Government is to be run in the interests of its 110,000,000 people or run solely by Samuel Gompers in the selfish interests of 3,000,000 members of labor unions. The success of a doctor, lawyer, preacher, teacher, Congressman, merchant, farmer, and public officer depends entirely upon his ability, efficiency, and class of service given, but the 3,000,000 members of unions depend solely upon Samuel Gompers, union card, power of strike, and revolution.

The citizens in every county in my district will see to it that each returning soldier is properly placed, and they will handle any revolution which Mr. Gompers and his discontented bunch may start. Shall it be Gompers and unions first and America second, or the interest of all American citizens first, last, and all the time?

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

The able and distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], who, according to his autobiography, was for 17 years a railroad locomotive fireman and engineer and therefore a member of the brotherhood union, entered a general denial on behalf of organizd labor by stating:

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not believe that I can sit still in my seat and listen to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] indicting the union labor men of this country. I have not always agreed with Mr. Samuel Gompers, and on several occasions I have taken issue with him right here on the floor of the House, but when the gentleman from Texas intimates that organized labor of this country caused all of these strikes and did not do their part in the winning of this war, he makes a misstatement which he can not prove by the facts.

Who ought to be better informed in regard to the number of strikes, the Department of Labor or the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]? I wrote the Secretary of Labor, a member of the Cabinet, requesting that he have prepared for me a correct statement of the number of strikes by members of organized labor occurring in the United States between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918. In reply I have the prepared statement, signed by the Acting Secretary of Labor, stating that eliminating all duplications, there were 6,000 strikes by labor unions in the United States between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, of an average duration of about 18 days each. If there is any misstatement the Department of Labor is responsible for it, and the Department of Labor has since made no correction, hence it does not become the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] to deny it.

Every posted newspaper reader knows that several times during the war members of striking labor unions had to be ordered, both by President Wilson and Secretary McAdoo, to end their strike and go to work. Even plasterers and paper hangers struck for $1 per hour and time and a half for overtime over eight hours, making $11 per day for 10 hours' work.

When in the spring of 1918, through the insistence of organized labor, the committee proposed a blanket raise in salary of $120 to the 240,000 Government employees drawing annual salaries up to $2,500, the late lamented gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Borland, offered an amendment that before paying said raise in salary such employees should be required to work eight hours per day. Such employees then worked only seven hours per day; received their salaries regularly, paid twice a month in cash; worked in comfortable buildings, well furnished, steam heated, electric lighted, with ice water and electric fans in summer; were given 30 days' vacation on full pay each year; were allowed as much as 30 days' additional on full pay on doctor's certificate; were allowed the 52 Sundays and all legal holidays; and were allowed half of Saturdays during three months of summer and half holidays on all special occasions in Washington. They had the benefit of seeing all of the many places of interest and amusement in Washington, attending the best theaters, the finest churches; enjoying the miles of paved streets, fine parks, public bathing beach, all maintained at a great cost to the people of this Nation.

The House twice adopted the Borland amendment, and it finally passed the Senate, allowing the 240,000 employees a blanket raise of $120 each, but requiring them to work eight hours a day.

The Washington Times, on its front page, in its issue of June 28, 1918, carried the following:

PRESIDENT URGED TO VETO BORLAND EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

A great exodus of Government employees from Washington, which may be so large that it will of itself definitely solve the housing problem, is being freely predicted as a result of the action of Congress in approving the Borland amendment to the legislative bill providing for a minimum eight-hour day and no overtime.

Appeal has been made to the President for a veto or other action that will wipe out the Borland amendment. Officials who have conducted the employees' campaign against this legislation are confident that the President will act in their behalf, but in the meantime there is much talk among employees of quitting the service.

President H. M. McLarin, of the National Federation of Federal Employees, and President John S. Beach, of the local union, carried an appeal to the President for a hearing for the clerks and for veto of the legislative bill.

President Gompers has also acted, writing a letter to the president asking for elimination of the Borland amendment or veto of the bill.

An appeal has likewise been carried to the National War Labor Board for intervention to defeat the Borland amendment.

On page 2 of its issue of June 29, 1918, the Washington Star carried the following:

CLERKS' PROTEST EXPECTED MONDAY—THOUSANDS MAY MARCH TO CAPITOL—MASS MEETING AGAINST EIGHT-HOUR DAY.

Thousands of Government clerks may march to the Capitol Monday afternoon in protest against the action of Congress in prescribing an eight-hour day.

At a mass meeting of Government employees, to be held in the New Masonic Temple, to-morrow afternoon, at 2.30 o'clock, plans will be presented for the demonstration.

MISS RANKIN WILL SPEAK.

Representative JEANNETTE RANKIN will be one of the speakers at to-morrow's meeting.

Government departments are arranging tentative schedules in anticipation of President Wilson signing the bill calling for the extra hour of work. In all probability the time will be from 8.30 a. m. until 5 p. m., although a system of staggered hours may be arranged later to give relief to street car traffic congestion.

AIMING TO DEFEAT PLAN.

Labor leaders and representatives of the National Federation of Federal Employees are bending every effort toward accomplishing the defeat of the Borland amendment through the President's veto. Failing in this, they will direct the fight toward obtaining an appropriation for additional pay for overtime work.

The President could not afford to have 240,000 clerks cripple the departments of the Government by walking out in war time, so he was forced by the demands of organized labor to veto the Borland amendment, and thus said Government employees got their $120 raise in salary and continued to work only seven hours during a world war. And it is interesting to note that they were not satisfied, but have this year forced Congress to grant them a $240 raise each in salary. But what did organized labor do for the gentleman from Missouri? I will let them tell you in their own words.

In the Federal Employee, the official magazine of the National Federation of Federal Employees, for June, 1918, the vote cast by each Congressman on the Borland amendment, requiring the 240,000 Government employees to work eight instead of only seven hours per day, is given, with the following comment:

If a Congressman's votes and policies have been against the interests of employees this fact should be made known throughout his district, and if he has shown an attitude offensive toward organized labor every voter in his district should know it.

And this red-flag admonition to all organized labor voters was sent broadcast into the districts of the various Congressmen who had dared to vote to require employees to work eight hours a day during war times.

Again, from the September issue of the Federal Employee I quote:

THE DEFEAT OF REPRESENTATIVE BORLAND, AS TOLD BY ONE OF OUR BRETHREN WHO WAS IN THE FRAY—A REMARKABLE DEMONSTRATION OF THE VALUE OF UNION SOLIDARITY AND AFFILIATION.

[By Gilbert E. Hyatt, president of National Federation of Postal Employees.]

Those ultraconservative members of the civil service who have not realized the value of organization, particularly in its inevitable and most beneficial aspect, that of affiliation with the other great organized agencies under the banner of the American Federation of Labor, have been given a demonstration so plain that he who runs may read of what these things mean and of the real spirit of unionism.

No Federal employee is ignorant of the constant persecution of his brothers in the District of Columbia under the guise of establishing what Mr. Borland was pleased to name an eight-hour day. The single-minded persistence of the advocate of this measure, culminating in the veto by President Wilson of the appropriation bill carrying the amendment in question, is too well known in all details to need repetition, but the story of Borland's rebuke and defeat by organized labor simply on this ground is a lesson that every member of the civil service should ponder on, for in it is contained the secret of any future defense that they will make and of any future gains for their cause. * * *

An appeal was made to organized labor and every legislative agent in Washington responded. President Gompers sent a scathing telegram to the Central Labor Union of Kansas City (Borland's home), and the legislative agents of the railroad brotherhoods went on record in the plainest language. The writer of this article had the honor, as a member of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineman, of bearing their personal message to the railroad men of Kansas City. As a result the Kansas City central body passed a resolution without a dissenting word or vote at a crowded meeting condemning Borland and instructing their legislative committee to organize the campaign for his defeat. A joint committee of railroad men was formed to do a like service for their members, and the outcome was the overwhelming defeat now passed into history. * * *

It should be fully appreciated by the civil-service employees that these men had not one iota of personal interest in the point at issue, and that they had no personal contact with the class of workers attacked. * * * Mr. Borland had done many favors of a personal nature for members of organized labor in his district, and many of the men who worked for his defeat expressed friendship for him, but factional alignments, craft divisions, and personal friendships were thrown aside to fight for a basic standard of their doctrine.

I quote the concluding paragraph of the said telegram sent by Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, also published in this magazine, which is as follows:

Let the inspiring word go forth, "We stand by our friends," and administer a stinging rebuke to men of any party who are either indifferent or hostile.

What was Congressman Borland's crime committed for which his office was taken away from him as a punishment? He merely asked that Government employees in war times work eight instead of seven hours per day. He conscientiously believed that when we required our soldier boys to work sometimes 24 hours out of the 24, sometimes in trenches drenched and knee deep in mud, on $33 per month, who, if he momentarily slept from exhaustion or should demand a single dollar more pay, would be stood up against a wall and shot in eternal dishonor, that it was not unreasonable to demand of Government employees, many of whom were filling the jobs vacated by those soldier boys, and who were working under pleasant surroundings and safe environments, that in war times especially they should work eight instead of seven hours.

But getting back to the Employment Service, I have just received a letter from a substantial citizen of Denison, Tex., in which he states:

FEBRUARY 27, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In to-day's Dallas News I note your reply to the Hon. J. F. Carl, of the State council of defense, giving your reasons for refusing to support the $19,000,000 appropriation asked by the Labor Department for maintenance of the United States Labor Employment Bureau, and I desire to commend you for the stand you have taken. I am inclosing herewith the first page of the Denison Labor Journal, a publication supported and operated by the Labor Trades Council of this city, on which I have marked a couple of items that will substantiate the claim you asserted that the attempt is being made to "unionize" the negroes of the South and thereby make their employment unprofitable.

You will observe that this new organization is the "Domestic Union" and is restricted to colored "ladies" who do the "washing" and other household work and who the organizer says are underpaid. These organizers are in the employ of the United States Labor Board and are drawing salaries both from the Federation of Labor and the Government. No wonder they want the appropriation made. I have been flooded with telegrams from labor leaders from all portions of Texas, as well as other States, requesting items favorable to the Employment Bureau and asking for indorsement as well as telegraphic requests to my Congressman and Senators to support the appropriation, all of which I have declined to do, because I think it is the most gigantic hold-up ever attempted to be made upon the American public.

The following are the items from the Denison Labor Journal of February 22, 1919:

MISS BERRY GIVES ACCOUNT OF DENISON WORK.

SHERMAN, TEX., February 18.

To the Denison Labor Journal, greetings:

Having just completed two weeks' work in your city, I feel the organizations will be interested in knowing the following locals voted to affiliate with the Texas State Federation of Labor:

The Railway Carmen, Railway Clerks, Railway Expressmen, Maintenance of Way Men, both the white and negro locals; blacksmiths, painters, and, I am sure, a number of small locals will take similar action when they next meet. Was also successful in organizing a new local with 33 charter members, namely, "The Woman's Domestic Union." This organization promised to make a good, strong labor organization and will assist in bettering the conditions of the underpaid working women of Denison, thereby making better citizens.

I hope to see Denison's labor organizations 100 per cent in the State Federation of Labor by May 19, when our next convention convenes in Beaumont.

Fraternally,

MYRTLE BERRY,
Second Vice President, Texas State Federation of Labor.

NEGRO WORKERS ARE RAPIDLY LINING UP.

The Colored Maintenance of Way and Railroad Shop Laborers Union No. 854 met at Taborian Park promptly at 7.30 with all officers present. Considerable business of a routine nature was attended to, besides some special business. Nineteen new members were received and obligated. The new union is growing fast, and it is hoped and believed that at an early date every colored laborer eligible to membership in our order will be enrolled.

COLORED WOMEN FORM NEWEST DENISON UNION.

Friday night of last week Miss Myrtle Berry, organizer for the Texas Federation of Labor, addressed quite a number of colored women at Taborian Park Hall and succeeded in organizing a culinary and domestic union among them, with a membership of about 33 members. They seemed very much pleased with Miss Berry's address, as she made it very plain to them that they were in need of an organization.

A. W. B.

Here is another letter from Director Densmore relative to the claim for return transportation, dishonoring the promises made by one of his Government agents:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
UNITED STATES EMPLOYMENT SERVICE,
Washington, February 26, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: This will acknowledge receipt of your favor of the 24th, in which you inclosed communication from Mr. S. C. Autry, of San Angelo, Tex., relative to a claim made by Mr. W. A. Posey, of that place.

We regret to say that no men were promised return transportation to their homes from projects constructed by the Government. In many cases transportation to a job was, of course, furnished. No provisions, however, were made or even promised the men for their return transportation.

We also note what Mr. Autry has to say in his letter about a representative of the Employment Service advising Mr. Posey not to take his tools with him. This seems to be very unusual, for, as you know, it is very necessary for a carpenter to have his tools; that is, if he expects to work at the carpenter trade; and we feel that there has been a misunderstanding on the part of Mr. Posey.

Very truly, yours,

J. B. DENSMORE,
Director General.

Mr. Frank Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, on February 25, 1919, in sending to each Congressman a copy of Samuel Gompers's 192-word cablegram, and besides asking us to support the union-labor program, and requesting specially that we support this proposed $10,000,000 extra appropriation for the Employment Service, stated:

There is great danger that the attitude of Congress, in the defeat of various measures which might relieve the present industrial situation, will result in increasing the unrest and uncertainty prevailing in this country.

When our soldier boys come home and learn of the millions of dollars wasted when building cantonments, shipping, and other public works, where laborers were told not to work too fast or they would be discharged, and they learn of the 6,000 strikes and the refusal of Mr. Gompers to have the "work-or-fight" order apply to organized labor, they will promptly attend to any revolution which any discontented $11-a-day members of organized labor may start.

HON. JAMES P. MAHER,
OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919,

On the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 357) requesting the commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the international peace conference to present to the said conference the right of Ireland to freedom, independence, and self-determination.

Mr. MAHER. Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in voting for the resolution now before the House for the self-determination of Ireland.

Every man worthy of the name has an interest in the land that gave birth to his father and mother. This was clearly demonstrated by President Wilson when he visited England, as it was a great pleasure for him to visit the church of his grandparents.

If we are going to give self-determination to the small nations of Europe, Ireland should receive the first consideration, for she has never accepted the rule of Great Britain and has always demanded her freedom. We hear the arguments advanced that England has granted liberal laws to Ireland—the 17-year purchase act, the old-age pension, and other beneficial laws. If you take a bird and place it in a cage it is no satisfaction to the bird to know that his cage is made of gold; he wants his freedom, and he will get it at the first opportunity when the door is left open. And now we feel that the door of opportunity is open for Ireland to get self-determination, when the nations of the world in council assembled are discussing the right of self-determination for small nations. Ireland has never come into the courts pleading or praying for any special consideration; her people neither bow or kotow to the Kingdom of Great Britain. They demand fair play and a long-delayed justice.

HON. DAN V. STEPHENS,
OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I desire to insert in the RECORD some correspondence on the subject of the discharge from the Army of conscientious objectors for the general information of the public:

FEBRUARY 21, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. STEPHENS: I herewith return the resolution adopted by the Legislature of Nebraska inclosed in your letter of February 20.

The problem of the "conscientious objector" was a complicated one, and the measures taken by the Congress and the War Department to deal with it covered a wide range of facts and a variety of conditions. The individuals released from the Leavenworth Prison by way of clemency, referred to in the resolution, were released after a careful judicial inquiry into the circumstances of their imprisonment by a committee consisting of Maj. Kellogg; Dean Stone, of Columbia University Law School; and Judge Julian W. Mack, of Chicago. The special form of discharge contains the words set forth by Congressman Stark in his paper, which is also correct in its statement that there was no power in the Secretary of War to affect the pay status of these men.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Hon. DAN V. STEPHENS,
House of Representatives.

LINCOLN, NEBR., February 5, 1919.

DAN V. STEPHENS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The following resolution was adopted by the State Legislature of Nebraska and is hereby transmitted to you:

[Legislature of Nebraska, Thirty-seventh session.]

A RESOLUTION.

Whereas press reports state that several hundred men who were drafted for service in the war and refused to bear arms or work or obey orders of their superior officers, or in any manner assist in the defense of their country, or support thereof, are to be given and are being given honorable discharge from the Army, fitted out with a complete outfit of civilian clothing, and paid the full wage, and in some instances fifteen to twenty-five dollars more than that which they would have received had they been loyal to their country and served in the trenches and borne the hardships incident thereto; and

Whereas there are several hundred thousand loyal American soldiers still in France who have willingly offered their lives in defense of their country, and who are anxious to be discharged and return to private life; loyal and unselfish men, who will some day return to find their positions filled by the unpatriotic slackers and conscientious objectors wearing the clothing furnished them by the Government, and with no provision made for rewarding and honoring those who have saved the country and who by their glorious achievements have preserved to posterity the honor of the Nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Nebraska, That we earnestly protest against the action of Secretary of War Baker in rewarding the slacker and the traitor, which we stamp as a direct insult to the brave soldiers who so valiantly went forth to defend democracy and freedom against the awful blight of Kaiserism at the sacrifice of their lives, and to the Red Cross nurses who risked their lives to administer to the wounded and bleeding upon the battle fields of Europe, and every other worker who participated in the support of the war, and we call upon the Congress of the United States to condemn the said action of Secretary of War Baker, as it is not consistent with the principles of true Americanism; and we further call upon Congress to honor and reward the loyal and faithful men of our Army and Navy in a manner befitting their glorious deeds; be it further

Resolved, That a certified copy of this resolution be sent by the secretary of state to Secretary of War Baker and to the Members of Congress and Senators from this State.

D. M. AMSBERRY,
Secretary of State.

STATEMENT OF FACT BY EX-CONGRESSMAN STARK OF NEBRASKA.

[Advertisement.]

In the Literary Digest, February 8, 1919, page 33, appear comments on conscientious objectors, in part as follows: "The special form of discharge presented by the Secretary contains this sentence: 'This is a conscientious objector who has done no military duty whatsoever and refused to wear the uniform.'"

Based on report of January 7, 1919, by Julian Mack and Harlan F. Stone, members of the board of inquiry on conscientious objectors, stating, "In the opinion of the undersigned clemency should be promptly exercised in their cases." Same was approved by the Secretary of War directing "that Form No. 526, A. G. O., be used for their discharge as provided in paragraph 4, War Department Circular No. 97, 1918, the following remark being placed theron: 'This is a conscientious objector who has done no military duty whatsoever and refused to wear the uniform.'"

Official U. S. Bulletin, January 23, 1919: Being based on "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States" approved May 18, 1917, and, in part, as follows: "And nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any of the forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization at present organized and existing and whose existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organization, but no person so exempted shall be exempted from service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be noncombatant."

Under the above law the conscientious objectors were entitled to pay due, and having refused to wear the uniform, they were entitled to money in lieu of clothing allowance. As to the suit of clothes, the United States makes about the same allowance as the State of Nebraska on a discharge from the penitentiary, a decent suit of clothes, an overcoat between the 1st of November and the 1st of April, $10 in money, and a Bible. Under that law, why not discharge conscientious objectors after the armistice was signed. The Government would have to subsist and pay them with no corresponding benefits.

If the order of Secretary Baker is not approved by the public the remedy is to have Congress make another law and repeal this one which is now in operation. Secretary Baker, not being an anarchist, Bolsheviki, I. W. W., or ignoramus, and desiring to save the public money, obeyed the law.

To call the above "special discharge" an "honorable discharge," especially with the remark placed thereon by order of Secretary Baker, is a silly falsehood, and, in the name of every man who has an honorable discharge from the United States Army, Navy, or National Guard, I enter my protest against the colossal ignorance evidenced by the resolution passed by both branches of the Nebraska Legislature.

AURORA, NEBR., February 17, 1919.

Concurrent Resolution of the Legislature of North Dakota Favoring the Establishment of Direct Rail Routes.

HON. GEORGE M. YOUNG,
OF NORTH DAKOTA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, following is a copy of a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, certified by Hon. Thomas Hall, secretary of state, favoring the establishment of direct rail routes:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA.

To all to whom these presents shall come:

I, Thomas Hall, secretary of state for the State of North Dakota, do hereby set forth and certify that the following is the full text and the whole thereof of a certain concurrent resolution adopted by the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota.

Dated at the capitol in Bismarck, N. Dak., this 3d day of March, 1919.

[SEAL.] THOMAS HALL,
Secretary of State.

Concurrent resolution favoring direct rail routes.

Whereas the Federal Government of the United States is presumably operating all railroads as a unit for the benefit of the entire people of the United States, irrespective of selfish interests of the former management of several individual lines of railroad; and

Whereas we believe the shortest and best possible routes between all points on existing lines should be utilized and reasonable train service established thereon and reasonable rates be charged for service rendered; and

Whereas there are no through passenger or through freight trains operating via Linton, N. Dak. (the northern terminal of the branch line of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad), between points on said railroad in South Dakota and Bismarck, the capital of North Dakota; and

Whereas the past and present policy of the management of the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. has been to obstruct and prevent the establishment of through freight and passenger service via Linton on the shortest line between western North Dakota and central South Dakota; and

Whereas the people of both North and South Dakota are entitled to much better, shorter, cheaper passenger and freight service than that now offered between these sections; and

Whereas, at Bismarck, N. Dak., there are ample terminal facilities, roundhouses, machine shops, stockyards, sidetracks, and division superintendent's headquarters on the Soo Railway, and lines for the North and West as well as for the East diverge at Bismarck, N. Dak., where connection may be made with Missouri River boats; and

Whereas through train service may profitably be established by utilizing a short mileage on each of the three railroads; and

Whereas an emergency exists, in that the immense lignite fields of North Dakota remain undeveloped and the live-stock industry of western North Dakota would be greatly stimulated were it not for the excessive rates of freight and inadequate train service provided between North Dakota and South Dakota: Therefore be it

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be urged to present to the Hon. Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, the protest of the State of North Dakota against the prevailing railroad passenger and freight service between west North Dakota and South Dakota, and the excessive rates now charged for inadequate service established by the former management of the Northern Pacific Co., to the exclusion of the railroads from the capital of North Dakota; and further, be it

Resolved, That the Director General of Railroads be urged to direct the immediate establishment of through passenger train service and through freight train service, using the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul tracks from South Dakota points to Linton, N. Dak., and the Northern Pacific Railway tracks from Linton, N. Dak., to Moffit, N. Dak., and the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway tracks from Moffit, N. Dak., to Bismarck, where he may utilize the terminals of the Soo Line at Bismarck; and that the Director General of Railroads be urged to prepare reasonable joint through rates for the service to be rendered based upon the mileage of each line used.

On the Irish Resolution.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, we are living in great times. The light of justice is at last penetrating the dark places where tyranny has long held sway in undisturbed dominion. And out of this new dispensation has come the determination to end the reign of brute force, now and forever. Peoples long held in bondage are to be freed and new States to be created. The granting of that boon will not be envied or grudged; and I hope it will not be deemed an invidious comparison to say that no nation in the world to-day is more entitled to the sympathy of Americans in its ambition for recognition than is Ireland. To her we stand in everlasting indebtedness. Her best sap has entered every fiber of our national being, and in all our struggles, from colonial days to this—from Lexington to the Marne—her warm and generous blood has flowed most copiously in behalf of freedom and of humanity.

In all our history Irish names stand out among the foremost in art, literature, and industry—in peace, no less than in war. It is no slur to your memories to remind you of the names of Count Dillon, Barry, Sullivan, McDonough, Jackson, and McKinley. Many a man sitting here, who can not account for his Irish name or for his religion—be he Methodist or Baptist, Presbyterian, or Anglican, has only to study the penal laws administered by England in Ireland in the eighteenth century—the most barbarous and atrocious in all history. He need only follow the tribulations and the wanderings of the devoted sons of Erin, forced, by those laws, to seek a haven of free speech and free religion in the Colonies. Let him study the history of the Irish redemptioners, forced to make human chattels of themselves to escape a more degrading bondage.

I am not one of those unrelenting students of history who can not forgive past injuries. I harbor no resentment against generations long dead, and to rekindle the ashes of the past is not my purpose.

But if you want to understand the viewpoint of Ireland you must go back to her past sufferings. The study of this will repay your labor.

It is a fact that, from the time that Christianity came to Ireland in the early part of the fifth century, for 400 years her monasteries were the most advanced educational centers of Europe. Her missionaries carried the gospel into Britain and across the Channel throughout Europe. Two hundred and fifty-one of these early Irish knights of the Cross are venerated to this day from Scandinavia to Italy; from France to the Ukraine. Montalembert in his history, entitled "The Monks of the West," has given us a wonderful account of the civilization of Ireland. He states that the Irish monasteries were virtually universities in which music, architecture, and the working of metals were taught, and the languages of Greece and Rome studied with passionate zeal; that one of the oldest manuscripts of Horace in existence, namely, that in the library of Berne, Switzerland, is written in Celtic characters, with notes and annotations in the Irish language. He also assures us that Alfred the Great of England received his education in an Irish university.

Take a rapid glance at the annals of Ireland, and you will find some of the most remarkable ironies of history.

First. That it was Christianized by a Gaul, St. Patrick.

Second. That Ireland for several centuries was the intellectual center of Europe; its universities being patronized by youths from Britain and from the Continent.

Third. That the Anglo-Saxons received their learning from Ireland.

Fourth. That Ireland, which later was to make so many sacrifices for her fidelity to the Papacy, had the theft of her birthright—her freedom to exist as a separate nation—sanctified by a Bull of that very Papacy. For we find that Pope Hadrian IV, in 1155 authorized the Angevin King of England, Henry II, to conquer and take possession of Ireland.

Fifth. That her regard for virtue was the immediate cause of her undoing; for it was her indignant expulsion of Dermott McMurrough for the seduction of Devorgilla that brought upon Erin the invasion of Strongbow.

Sixth. That it was the Hanoverian King, George III, of England—the same potentate who sought to throttle liberty in America—who undermined and destroyed the Irish Parliament. And it was the same Lord Cornwallis, who surrendered to Washington at Yorktown, who was commissioned by King George III to carry out his infamous plan of undermining the Irish Parliament—by fraud, corruption, bribery, hypocrisy, and terrorism.

Seventh. That the destruction of the Irish Parliament was chiefly due to resentment for the very pronounced attitude of the Irish people in favor of the Colonies during the American Revolution.

If there is anything which ought to bring the cause of Ireland near to the hearts of patriotic Americans, it should be this early disinterested devotion of the Irish people to the cause of American liberty.

England now professes to be penitent for what George III did to America 143 years ago. Do you note any indication of penitence for the crime of destroying the liberty of the Irish people 118 years ago, when the act of union with Great Britain was forced upon the Irish people against their will?

I think I hear a faint protest: "An Irish Parliament! Who ever heard of an Irish Parliament?" Yes, Mr. Speaker, such as it was, there was an Irish Parilament; and this is its history:

The so-called Parliament was first instituted by the Norman invaders. It was originally a council of the barons, prelates, and "faithful." The upper house consisted of lay peers, abbots, priors, and bishops. The lower house consisted of knights of the shires and burgesses. The lay peers in time lost interest in the study and framing of dry statutes. They asked and received exemption from attendance. The abbots, priors, and bishops also lost active interest and sent their proctors to represent them. The practice then grew up of summoning two proctors from each diocese, who sat with the knights and burgesses in the lower house. As most of the shires were in the hands of the Irish, they returned no members, and the ecclesiastics, the burgesses, and proctors were under control of the English Government. From thence onward the statutes passed were no more the acts of the Irish Parliament; they were only the registered voice of the English Crown. This strange council met at irregular intervals at Dublin, Kilkenny, and Drogheda at the summons of the King's lieutenant or his deputies.

In 1367 a Parliament was held at Kilkenny which imposed heavy penalties on all English who adopted Irish names, speech, or customs. The Norman who married an Irish wife was ordered to be hanged, disemboweled alive, and have his estate forfeited.

In 1372 there was a conflict of authority between the English and Irish Parliaments upon the question of raising larger revenues for administration purposes. The King summoned the Irish Parliament to England to debate the question—a favorite method with English kings and queens. It is needless to say that when the Irish delegation reached the English shore their power to equal debate was very materially impaired. In this case the Irish Parliament yielded and sent a delegation, but at the same time reserved to itself the right to grant or refuse the legislation requested. Of course such reservations were always made before the delegates started. When they got back to Ireland there was little left of the reservation.

In 1494 Sir Edward Poynings, deputy governor of Ireland, had carried the act which bears his name by virtue of which all measures intended to be submitted to the Irish Parliament must first be submitted to the English Parliament. Of course, this rendered the Irish Parliament a mere recording instrument of the will of the English Parliament. But, for that matter, the English Parliament was itself hardly better off. It also was the recording agency of the will of the Crown. The parliament thus constituted, taking always its cue from the sovereign, proceeded to enact laws of cruel rigor. After the fatal rebellion of 1690 in behalf of the exiled James II, Patrick Sarsfield held fast for some time to Limerick, and, finally compelled to surrender, was able to exact a covenant from the English, which might now well be called the first "scrap of paper." One of its articles (article 1) provided that the natives of Ireland would be allowed freedom of religion and contained a promise of repeal of the objectionable penal laws.

The penal laws then existing referred to were as follows:

1. Catholics were debarred from belonging to corporations.
2. Certain civil offices were closed against them.
3. They were subject to fine for nonattendance at the place of worship of the established church on Sundays.
4. The chancellor had the power of appointing a guardian to the children of Catholic parents.

In 1692 at the first session of the Irish Parliament, held after the treaty of Limerick, an oath was framed by the Protestant majority. It was framed in such a way as to make it impossible for any Catholic member to take it. Upon the presentation of this oath the Catholic peers and members of the Commons quitted their respective houses in indignation, and from that time on until the Parliament of Ireland ceased to exist in 1801, over a century, no Catholic Irishman sat in the Irish Parliament.

Justin McCarthy, the brilliant novelist and historian, says:

> Under the penal laws the Catholic population of a Catholic country were deprived of almost every right that makes life precious. Dopping, Bishop of Meath, had proclaimed from the pulpit that Protestants were not bound to keep faith with Papists, and the violation of the treaty of Limerick had justified his utterance. Lord Chancellor Bowes and Chief Justice Robinson had proclaimed from the bench that the law did not suppose any such person to exist as an Irish Catholic. The penal laws certainly did their best to insure that no such person should exist as an Irish Catholic.

Irish Catholics were shut out from every civil or military profession; from every government office, from the highest to the lowest; from almost every duty or privilege that can be obeyed or enjoyed by citizens.

The following is a summary of the penal laws actually in force in Ireland up to the nineteenth century:

1. A Catholic could not sit upon the benches of the Lords or Commons of the Irish Parliament.
2. He could not record his vote for the election of a member of Parliament.
3. He could not serve in the army or the navy.
4. He could not plead at the bar or give judgment from the bench.
5. He could not become a magistrate or a member of a corporation.
6. He could not serve on grand juries or in vestries.
7. He could not be a sheriff, gamekeeper, or a constable.
8. He could not give education.
9. He could not receive education.
10. He could not send his children abroad to be educated. If in defiance of law he, a Catholic, did send his child to receive in continental colleges that knowledge which was refused at home, he was subjected to a heavy fine and the child so educated was excluded from inheriting any property in Ireland or England.
11. Not only was a Catholic denied the practice of his own religion, but conformity to the Anglican faith was enforced by statute. Every Catholic was liable to a fine each month for not attending a place of Anglican worship, and at any time any two justices of the peace could call a Catholic over 16 years of age before them and bestow what property he possessed upon his next of kin if he refused to turn from his faith.
12. Any four justices of the peace could, without the formalities of a trial, send any Catholic refusing to attend Anglican service into banishment for life.
13. Every Catholic priest in the country pursued his sacred calling under a penalty of death.
14. No Catholic might buy land, or inherit it, or receive it as a gift from Protestants, or hold life annuities or leases for more than 31 years, or any lease on such terms as that the profits of the land exceeded one-third the value of the land.
15. Any Protestant discovering that a farm held by a Papist produced a profit greater than one-third of the rent could, immediately upon announcing this discovery, dispossess the Catholic owner and seize the farm for himself.
16. The estate of any Catholic not having a Protestant heir was gaveled or divided in equal parts between all his children.
17. As cases occurred in which Protestants helped their Catholic fellow citizens or relations by holding property in trust for them, it was made legal for any Protestant who suspected another Protestant of holding property in trust for a Catholic to file a bill against the suspected trustee, and, if he proved the case, to take the property away from him.
18. A Protestant might at any time compel a Catholic to sell him his horse, however valuable, for £5, and the horses of a Catholic could always be seized without payment for the use of the militia.
19. In order to guard against the consequences of any exasperation into which these laws might goad their victims, they were rigidly prohibited from possessing arms. Any two justices or sheriffs might at any time issue a search warrant for arms against any Catholic household. Any Catholic who was discovered with any kind of weapon in his possession was liable to fines, imprisonment, whipping, and the pillory.
20. Not content, however, with depriving the Irish Catholic of all the rights of a free man, the penal laws aimed insidiously at his destruction by endeavoring to turn his own kin, his flesh and blood, his children, and his very wife against him. The eldest son of a Catholic upon apostatizing became heir at law to the whole estate of his father, and reduced his father to the position of a mere life tenant.

21. An apostate wife was immediately freed from her husband's control and assigned a certain proportion of her husband's property.

22. Any child, however young, who professed the Anglican creed was immediately removed from its parents' care and a portion of the parental property assigned to it.

23. Furthermore, no marriage between a Catholic and a Protestant was recognized by the law.

24. The fact that the husband and wife were of opposite faiths in itself rendered the marriage null and void without any process of law whatever. A man might leave his wife or a woman her husband, after any period of wedlock, no matter how long, and be free to marry again, and bring a legalized illegitimacy upon all the offspring of the former marriage.

You must not draw the conclusion from this fearful array that the Anglo-Saxon is bloodthirsty, cruel, or inherently unjust. Not to him, however, must be charged these cruelties, but to the rapacious Norman—the invader of both Albion and Erin. There is no doubt that the Norman was essentially a marauder and brigand in all his instincts. His feudal system of destruction of individual land ownership and its oaths of fealty to the overlord destroyed all love of liberty and hope of progress. Even the Anglo-Saxon himself succumbed to the Norman sword. The difference between the Anglo-Saxon and the Celt was that, when conquered, the Anglo-Saxon submitted, whereas the Celt never conceded the conquest and never surrendered.

In March, 1720, the English Parliament passed an act taking away from the Irish House of Lords the power it had heretofore exercised as a judicial tribunal or appellate court "to examine, correct, and amend the judgments and decrees of the courts of justice in the Kingdom of Ireland."

Due to the efforts of Henry Grattan the Poynings law was repealed and the Irish Parliament restored in 1782 to somewhat of its power and jurisdiction. The vicious system of so-called rotten boroughs or pocket boroughs was still maintained. That situation, however, was not the subject of much complaint at the time because precisely the same situation prevailed in England herself. As soon as it entered the dull intellect of King George III what the possibilities of Irish autonomy were he began to repent of the boon granted.

Although the Irish Parliament was not composed of Catholics (for a Catholic could neither vote nor hold office) it nevertheless showed signs of yielding to the universal demand for religious emancipation and the abolition of the various test oaths and acts which prevented the great bulk of the Irish people from participating in their government. King George III then instituted a system of intrigue intended to eventually break down and destroy the Irish Parliament.

The outbreak of the Irish Rebellion of 1798 gave the King the opportunity to put his plan into operation. He selected as viceroy of Ireland Lord Cornwallis, and to assist him in the process of extinguishing the National Parliament of Ireland he was accompanied by Lord Castlereigh as Irish secretary (the man whom Byron spoke of as "a wretch never named but with curses and jeers"), while Lord Clare was put in the post of lord chancellor. This was the triumvirate assigned the odious task of destroying by corruption, fraud, and treachery the Irish Parliament. In justice to Lord Cornwallis it should be said that he regarded his task as personally obnoxious. His letters reveal the disgust with which the tasks assigned to him were regarded. He tells of the manner in which the Castlereigh gang and their associates were continually crying out for more severity, more imprisonments, more torture, and more blood. But Lord Castlereigh and Lord Clare do not appear to have had such qualms of conscience. They went about their work as though it were congenial.

Lord Castlereigh made the public announcement that every nobleman who returned members to Parliament should be paid £1,500 for every member so returned; next, that every member who had bought his own seat should be paid back the money he had paid for it; and, last, that all members of Parliament who were losers by the union should be compensated for their loss, and that the sum of one and one-half million pounds should be voted for that purpose. Bishoprics, judgeships, and other offices in the navy, army, and in the church were freely given. Forty new peerages were created, and it is a term of reproach even to this day to be known as "a union peer."

Grattan, who had retired from Parliament in disgust at the outbreak of the hopeless rebellion of 1798, came back to the House of Commons in the hope of fighting the act of union. He was assisted by Sir John Parnell, the ancestor of the Parnell who later distinguished himself in the fight for Ireland's cause. The battle for the retention of the Irish Parliament was hopeless from the first. The moment that the power of the Crown of England came into the struggle there was no longer hope for autonomy. The act of union was passed in 1800 and went into effect the 1st day of January, 1801.

It will thus be seen that the granting of a parliament to Ireland would be no more than an amende honorable—an appropriate reparation. If 150 years of wrongful usurpation has failed to make right the destruction of Polish autonomy, the Irish can well claim that the basis of their grievance was much more recent.

How can England, with a straight face, enter a league of nations, promising autonomy and self-determination to distant nations, without doing a modicum of justice to the devoted, brave, long-suffering race, praying, pleading for so long for relief at her very doorstep? Why withhold from her nearest small neighbor what she has granted ungrudgingly to South Africa, to Australia, and Canada?

And why should this American Congress, the Congress of an ally and friend in the greatest and most idealistic war in all history, hesitate to point out to the peace conference this staggering inconsistency?

Work and Homes for Returning Soldiers, Sailors, and Marines.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,

OF COLORADO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 4, 1919.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to again call the attention of the House and the country to the very great importance of Congress as speedily as possible enacting some appropriate legislation to provide suitable employment and permanent homes for our returning soldiers, sailors, and marines. As the House well knows, I have for many months been diligently cooperating with Secretary Lane, of the Interior Department, in his splendid efforts toward the adoption of some constructive and far-reaching national policy upon this subject. I have been receiving a great many petitions, letters, and telegrams on this subject almost every mail for several months, urging and appealing to Congress for this legislation. These appeals come from people in all different walks of life, from the President of the United States and the governors of many of the States and from tens of thousands of soldiers, sailors, and marines, as well as hundreds of chambers of commerce and other business men's associations, including the mayors of towns and cities and public-spirited, far-seeing people of all kinds. I desire to insert in the RECORD a letter received by me the other day from the President of the United States, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 27, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. TAYLOR: I am very strongly in favor of the measure which you have introduced in the House and for which I understand a rule has been passed. This bill is well devised to invoke the support of every Member of the House who wishes to positively recognize the services of our soldiers and sailors who want to make their homes upon our soil. It is an extension of the idea which underlies the reclamation act. Its purpose is to bring unused lands into use and to do this by the labor of men who wish to make their homes upon it. I trust you will be successful in securing its passage at this session of Congress.

Cordially, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
House of Representatives.

I also insert in the RECORD the following telegram from the commissioner of immigration of Colorado, as follows:

DENVER, COLO., March 1, 1919.

HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Colorado warmly approves your report on bill for reclamation and development of unoccupied lands of West, and urges adoption of bill before adjournment of Congress. Failure to do so will show utter lack of appreciation of needs of soldiers, sailors, and marines returning to civil life. Colorado Legislature on record for cooperative bill carrying sufficient appropriation. All possible pressure should be brought to bear to induce congressional action. State act may fail of passage if Congress refuses to act, and subsequent action by Congress will be too late for State cooperation.

EDWARD FOSTER,
Commissioner of Immigration.

I also insert a telegram from the secretary of state of Colorado, showing the approval of this matter by the Colorado Legislature:

DENVER COLO., February 27, 1919.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Senate joint resolution No. 12, pledging cooperation to Secretary Lane's soldiers' settlement plan, adopted by both branches of legislature this afternoon.

W. H. MCNICHOLS, Secretary of State.

I might go on and fill a hundred pages of the RECORD with indorsements of this measure. It is one of the greatest disappointments that has ever come to me during my entire legislative career, extending over a continuous service of 22 years, that this session of Congress is closing without making this most just and necessary provision for our returning soldiers, sailors, and marines. It will serve no good purpose now to denounce or criticize others for this failure, because there is some blame on both sides of the House for this failure. It probably should have been brought up much sooner. But overconfidence in the self-evident justness and absolute necessity for the measure and an overabundance of caution in carefully preparing it has delayed bringing it out until the last few days of the session, and its final consideration has been prevented by filibustering parliamentary tactics, which I hope the country will take due notice of.

As chairman of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, I called the committee together and held various hearings and meetings of the committee and public meetings upon this subject, and personally introduced the bill that seemed to meet with the concerted judgment of those interested. Then the bill was exhaustively considered and amended and in its amended and finally approved form, to carry out the wishes of the President, the Secretary of the Interior, the Reclamation Service, and the judgment of the Irrigation Committee, and a great many other people interested, I introduced the bill in its final and present form as H. R. 15993, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15993) providing for cooperation between the United States and State Governments in the rural settlement of soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to promote the reclamation of lands, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That in recognition of the military services of those who have served with the armed forces of the United States and who have been honorably discharged, including former American citizens who served in any of the armed forces of the nations allied against the central powers and who have been repatriated, provision is hereby made for their employment and to furnish opportunity for them to secure rural homes. This act shall be known as the "national soldier settlement act," and the "national soldier settlement fund" shall be created in the Treasury of the United States to carry out the purposes hereof.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior, herein styled "the Secretary," may, for the purposes of this act, select projects, acquire property by gift, purchase, deed in trust, cooperative agreement with States, irrigation or drainage districts, municipal corporations, or individuals, or condemnation, build project works upon project lands, including lands the title to which may not be in the United States, but which may be held under contract as herein provided, perform necessary reclamation work, if any, whether drainage, irrigation, the removal of trees and stumps, the building of levees, sea walls, necessary roads, clearing and land leveling, fertilization, sanitation, or otherwise, all of such purchases, operations, and improvements to be paid for from the national soldier settlement fund. The Secretary may withdraw, utilize, and in like manner with other lands acquired hereunder, dispose of portions of the public lands of the United States required to carry out the purposes of this act through agencies designated by him, and patent with prior lien reserved for all sums due or to become due and other appropriate reservations shall be issued by the General Land Office in accordance with such disposition.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary is also authorized from said soldier settlement fund to make farm improvements and advance to settlers under this act short-term loans for further improvements and for needed stock and equipment, to the end that the qualified applicants hereunder may obtain suitable homes and productive farms. He may subdivide the lands into appropriate allotments and dispose of the same to the beneficiaries named in section 1 hereof and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem proper and subject to the terms of this act. He may by general regulations impose conditions as to ability of applicants, so as to insure the United States and the settler, as far as possible, against failure. The Secretary may make appropriate regulations as to the area obtainable by individual applicants as to residence and actual cultivation, as to transfers of allotments so as to avoid excess land ownership and speculation, as to requiring prior liens, as to cancellation of applications and contracts and the forfeiture of payments made thereunder, and as to protecting the interests of the United States, or those cooperating with the United States.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary may cooperate with any State irrigation or drainage district, or municipal corporation, in connection with any project located therein upon such terms as may be agreed upon.

SEC. 5. That moneys expended for any project undertaken shall be fully reimbursed to the United States, the State, or others entitled thereto. To this end the Secretary shall fix the charges upon each allotment, and payment shall be made under such amortization plan and over such period, not exceeding 45 years, as the Secretary may deem best adapted to each project. Deferred payments shall bear interest at a rate of 4½ per cent per annum, payable annually, from the date of contract of purchase. Reimbursements to the United States shall be covered into the national soldier settlement fund, which is hereby reappropriated for expenditure under the terms and conditions of this act.

SEC. 6. That lands may also be dedicated for schools, churches, and other public purposes, and town sites may be developed and opened for sale on such terms, conditions, and restrictions as the Secretary may determine, and patent or deed may issue accordingly with prior lien reserved for all sums due or to become due, and other appropriate reservations. The proceeds of all operations under this act, including the sale of timber and other materials removed from lands, shall be covered into the national soldier settlement fund.

SEC. 7. That in the investigation and construction of projects provided for in this act the services of the beneficiaries named in section 1 hereof shall, so far as practicable, be preferred.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to transfer to the Secretary of the Interior upon his application for use in connection with the operations incident to the reclamation of the lands herein described any war material not required by the War Department, such as motor trucks, automobiles, dredges, ditching machinery, cranes, explosives, horses, harness, wagons, and other property, as the Secretary of the Interior may be able to utilize in connection with the reclamation work herein contemplated.

SEC. 9. That it is the intent and purpose of this act to authorize and empower the Secretary, and he is hereby fully authorized and empowered, through such officers, agents, or agencies, as he may appoint or employ to do all necessary acts and things to enable him to accomplish the purposes and objects of this act.

SEC. 10. That to carry into effect the provisions of this act there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $100,000,000.

Of course, practically everyone throughout the length and breadth of this country, and especially millions of our boys that are and have been serving in the ranks, know that Secretary Lane has been giving months and months of painstaking, energy, research work, public speaking and writing toward bringing about some congressional action on this subject. The Secretary first presented the subject to the people in May, 1918, and in his annual report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, he very clearly and elaborately set forth the necessity for legislation of this kind. His report was forcibly indorsed by President Wilson at the opening of this session of Congress, on December 2, 1918, when in his address to Congress he very earnestly urged the enactment of the legislation recommended by Secretary Lane, as follows:

PRESIDENT WILSON URGES SUPPORT OF SECRETARY LANE'S PLAN.

EMPLOYMENT FOR RETURNED SOLDIERS.

The ordinary and normal processes of private initiative will not, however, provide immediate employment for all of the men of our returning armies. Those who are of trained capacity, those who are skilled workmen, those who have acquired familiarity with established businesses, those who are ready and willing to go to the farms, all those whose aptitudes are known or will be sought out by employers will find no difficulty, it is safe to say, in finding place and employment. But there will be others who will be at a loss where to gain a livelihood unless pains are taken to guide them and put them in the way of work. There will be a large floating residuum of labor which should not be left wholly to shift for itself. It seems to me important, therefore, that the development of public works of every sort should be promptly resumed, in order that opportunities should be created for unskilled labor in particular, and that plans should be made for such developments of our unused lands and our natural resources as we have hitherto lacked stimulation to undertake.

PLANS FOR RECLAIMING LAND.

I particularly direct your attention to the very practical plans which the Secretary of the Interior has developed in his annual report and before your committees for the reclamation of arid, swamp, and cut-over lands which might, if the States were willing and able to cooperate, redeem some 300,000,000 acres of land for cultivation. There are said to be 15,000,000 or 20,000,000 acres of land in the West, at present arid, for whose reclamation water is available, if properly conserved. There are about 230,000,000 acres from which the forests have been cut but which have never yet been cleared for the plow and which lie waste and desolate. These lie scattered all over the Union. And there are nearly 80,000,000 acres of land that lie under swamps or subject to periodical overflow or too wet for anything but grazing which it is perfectly feasible to drain and protect and redeem. The Congress can at once direct thousands of the returning soldiers to the reclamation of the arid lands which it has already undertaken if it will but enlarge the plans and the appropriations which it has intrusted to the Department of the Interior. It is possible in dealing with our unused land to effect a great rural and agricultural development which will afford the best sort of opportunity to men who want to help themselves; and the Secretary of the Interior has thought the possible methods out in a way which is worthy of your most friendly attention.

WOODROW WILSON.

I submitted the bill in this form to the Department of the Interior for careful consideration and an official report and the Secretary reported thereon as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 17, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. TAYLOR: I am in receipt of request for report upon H. R. 15993, a bill providing for cooperation between the United States and State Governments in the rural settlement of soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to promote the reclamation of lands, and for other purposes.

The primary objects of the bill are to afford an opportunity for employment of our soldiers, sailors, and marines upon their return from the existing war, and to afford them, or such of them as may desire same, a chance to secure homes upon the lands reclaimed and improved, as proposed by the act. In addition to these ends, the bill if enacted and carried into effect, would result in the reclamation and improvement of immense areas of lands in the United States, public and private, now unused and undeveloped, thereby adding to the taxable property and values of the States in which they are located, and of the Nation at large. The bill does not contemplate the donation of the funds expended, but provides for their return within a fixed period, with interest.

The general plan received the indorsement of the President in his address to Congress December 2, 1918. His remarks upon the subject and extracts from my annual report for the year ended June 30, 1918, are found in the inclosed pamphlet entitled "Work and Homes for Our Fighting Men."

H. R. 13651, introduced by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, is a brief bill, proposing to confer general authority to carry out this plan, and to appropriate the sum of $100,000,000 therefor.

The bill which you submitted for report is along the same general lines, except that it contains more details and does not make an appropriation, merely authorizing same.

A memorandum prepared in this department discussing in a general way the advisability of such legislation as is here proposed and the probable procedure thereunder, if enacted, is inclosed.

I wish to emphasize what I believe to be the vital importance of this legislation and to urge its immediate adoption. Our soldiers, sailors, and marines are being discharged from the service in large numbers and the problem of providing for their employment and future welfare is pressing. If it is not possible to secure an immediate appropriation for this work, I most earnestly recommend that this bill be enacted at the earliest possible moment.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
Chairman Committee on Irrigation, House of Representatives.

I notice every day in the leading papers throughout the country editorials indorsing this measure. In the Washington Evening Star of yesterday is an editorial as follows:

OPEN THE LANDS TO SOLDIERS.

Of all the bills now pending at the Capitol none is more urgently needed than that which proposes the opening of public lands to former soldiers, who upon discharge from the Army will seek employment and opportunity for settlement. Secretary Lane has given convincing reasons for its passage. There are millions of acres of land awaiting use in various parts of the country. They could not be put to better use than in furnishing homesteads for the men who have answered the Nation's call to duty, have contributed to the victory and now await some chance for earning a livelihood. Two ends will be served by putting these men on the lands. They will be given productive employment that will sustain them, and the fertile areas now idle will contribute to the food supplies and enrich the country. Adjournment without action on this bill will be a neglect, not only of opportunity to benefit the Nation, but of a duty which Congress owes to the men who have served the country faithfully and heroically.

The last article written by the late President Theodore Roosevelt was an editorial for one of the magazines in which he indorsed with his characteristic vigor this plan of Secretary Lane as follows:

We should spend hundreds of millions of dollars reclaiming land for the returning soldier and arranging labor bureaus so that he may be certain to have every chance to work. The man who has gone into the Army should be given in peculiar fashion the best chance that this country affords to become a farmer or to work at his trade or profession. If possible, he should be encouraged to become a farmer, in accordance with some such plan as that proposed by Secretary Lane.

In brief, this bill provides work and homes for our returning soldiers, sailors, and marines in making practical and comprehensive plans for rural development, which may be concisely stated as follows:

PLAN FOR PROVIDING EMPLOYMENT AND HOMES FOR RETURNED SOLDIERS, SAILORS, AND MARINES.

INTRODUCTION.

During the war just terminated millions of men have been withdrawn from their normal pursuits to engage in the struggle, either as members of the military forces or as workers in various industries essential to the prosecution of the war. Their places have largely been filled by older men, by boys, or by women, and while some will be reinstated in their old positions, the majority of those, particularly those in the military service who have become used to life in the open and have had created in them a spirit of ambition, will be looking for the opportunity for active outdoor employment and for homes upon the land. Thousands of inquiries have already been received from those in the military service.

A large percentage of the soldiers who entered the war from the other allied countries have shown a desire for the wholesome open life of the country. France, Great Britain, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand have appropriated large sums of money and set aside millions of acres of land. England has multiplied the original appropriation by 10. The Australian Commonwealth, which has about one-twentieth the population of the United States, has made available $200,000,000 to help soldiers improve and equip their farms. An equivalent appropriation in this country on the basis of population would be $4,000,000,000. Notwithstanding this generous provision, it has been found impossible to secure and improve farms rapidly enough to meet the demand.

The introduction of a similar policy here will not only meet the desires and aspirations of a large number of soldiers, but the benefits of the development which will result will largely justify the cost in enabling this country to produce an abundant food supply for its industrial workers and thus be better able to meet the economic competition of the future. It is a plan which would offer immediate employment to many thousands of returning soldiers, lessen industrial disturbance, and bring into operation methods and policies for rural development which this country needed even if there had been no war.

THIS OPPORTUNITY SHOULD BE NATIONAL IN SCOPE.

In every State there are great areas of good land which are now either unused or sparsely settled because of facts aside from fertility. Some of this land requires reclamation. The arid lands need works for irrigation, wet lands need to be drained, and other lands need to be cleared of stumps and undergrowth. In addition to these, there are areas of neglected lands or lands badly used, which can be acquired at reasonable cost and a new, vigorous, and successful rural life created through carefully thought-out community developments.

PREPARATION OF THE LANDS FOR HOMES.

It would be an ill-advised and deceptive plan which would dump the returned soldier upon an undeveloped, unimproved tract of waste land. Failure would be almost inevitable. Other countries have seen the light and have already adopted comprehensive plans for placing their soldiers upon improved farms. The plan here proposed is for the United States to construct the necessary roads, drainage, irrigation, or other improvement works, provide the necessary house, farm buildings, and fences, level and prepare all or part of the land, furnish implements and equipment so that the settler may immediately begin productive work upon his farm, be self-supporting, and from the very beginning begin to repay the sums expended for his benefit.

COOPERATION WITH STATES DESIRABLE.

Experience elsewhere has shown that the best results in soldier settlement come through cooperation between the Central Government and local authorities. This combines unity of plan and expert direction with the practical knowledge and experience of the localities where development is taking place. The investigations thus far made in this country indicate that States and private owners will be glad to cooperate with the United States in the plan for providing homes by contract or cooperative arrangement under which the lands will be put in cultivation by their owners, the work of reclamation and improvement performed by the General Government, the selection of settlers and supervision of settlement areas to be carried out either by the Federal Government or the State, as circumstances might prove most expedient, and the whole sum spent on reclamation and improvement, including a reasonable price or value for the land, reimbursed by the settler in long-time payments, with interest at 4 per cent per annum.

SECURITY FOR SUMS EXPENDED.

The lands and all improvements thereon would be subjected to such liens, mortgages, or other form of binding and prior security as would make reimbursement of the money expended assured, and one of the prerequisites of undertaking construction of a project would be the subjecting of all lands and improvements to such a lien.

ADVICE AND ASSISTANCE OF OTHER DEPARTMENTS.

No State or privately owned lands would be included in an improvement project until the Federal Farm Loan Board had passed upon and fixed the land values and the States or owners thereof had agreed to this finding. The Department of Agriculture would be asked to cooperate in determining the quality of the soil and the agricultural fitness of the land. The creation of new bureaus or departments will not be necessary, because existing agencies can be utilized therefor.

AMORTIZATION BY SETTLERS.

The plan does not involve any gift or donation to the settler. He is expected to return the entire cost of the land and improvements with interest at 4 per cent per annum from the date he purchases the land. However, by providing for repayment in small installments extending over a period of 40 years, the burden will be light and his investment will very nearly amortize itself.

EMPLOYMENT OF SOLDIERS, SAILORS, AND MARINES.

The work of reclamation and improvement will require the services of many thousand men, from trained engineers to laborers, and thousands of soldiers will thus be provided with immediate and desirable employment in constructive work under the best conditions for their welfare, opportunity to become acquainted with the soil and climate, with the possibilities of the region, and upon accumulation of enough money to make the initial payment upon a farm they will be given the preferential right to secure a home upon the project upon which employed, or any other project as they may prefer.

FARMS AND FARM-LABORER ALLOTMENTS.

It is planned to establish farm units of such area and character as will be amply sufficient for the support of a family; to reclaim or improve the land, so that it will be in condition for immediate farming operations and the production of crops therefrom; to place the necessary farm improvements thereupon and to provide equipment. The farm-laborer allotments are to be of small areas suitable for the home of one engaged in farming or other community labor, probably not exceeding a maximum of 5 acres, to be equipped with the necessary buildings and homes. The purchasers will be required to maintain their residence upon the lands for eight months in each year for a period of not less than five years, unless prevented by illness or other satisfactory cause. The purchaser will also be required to cultivate the land in an approved manner and keep in good order the buildings, improvements, and equipment, and make such provision for insurance or its equivalent as will protect the interests of the State and the United States in the buildings, improvements, and equipment. In the event of the death of any purchaser the rights under the contract shall pass to his heirs or devisees, who may continue compliance with the requirements or surrender the property upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon.

TAXATION.

As stated, the result of the soldiers' settlement will ultimately be a very large addition to the taxable resources of the States and the United States. It is not planned to withdraw the lands included within the projects from taxation by the States, the thought being that the lands and the improvements thereon shall be subject to taxation from and afer date of execution of the contract of purchase by the settler.

EMERGENCY.

The matter is submitted in the form of a short item of authorization and appropriation to be attached to one of the appropriation bills, because the matter involved is emergent and requires immediate action if action be taken at all. Soldiers are being released from service by the thousands and are to-day seeking opportunity and employment. The department has already made preliminary investigations and has numerous projects in sight, some of which could be started at once were funds and authority available. With the necessary authority and money, the plan would be to issue general regulations applicable to the situation, proceed along the plan generally outlined in this statement, and later seek such further authority from Congress as may be deemed advisable.

AN OPPORTUNITY FOR CONSTRUCTIVE WORK.

Billions of dollars have been spent to aid in winning the war. A large part of this expenditure while necessary is now gone, leaving no tangible property of future value to the individual or the country. The small expenditure here planned is for constructive, definite, tangible, and enduring work which for generations will add to the health, wealth, and well-being of the Nation and its citizens. The money to be spent will be reimbursed. Out of waste lands will arise improved farms with comfortable homes, tilled fields, producing orchards, herds of cattle and sheep; definite, tangible, valuable property, adding to the potential and taxable wealth of the States and of the United States.

FEASIBLE PROJECTS.

Preliminary investigations indicate that feasible projects will be found in nearly all of the States and it will be possible to begin work on some of these projects immediately upon authorization by Congress. While no definite plan can be formulated in advance of congressional action, it has been thought that approximately $30,000,000 of the proposed appropriation would be devoted to irrigation projects and the remaining $70,000,000 to the reclamation of swamp, waste, and unused lands.

HOW WILL THIS PLAN HELP THE SOLDIER AND THE NATION?

If the plans now being formulated for creating settlements for soldiers are carried out, it will help returning soldiers and the agriculture of this Nation by—

1. Lessening the expense of subdivision and settlement of large estates.
2. Providing the money or credit needed to improve and equip farms and to furnish land to settlers in small tracts at wholesale prices.
3. Reduce the cost of farm buildings and other permanent improvements by the purchase of material and erection at wholesale and for cash.
4. Giving beginners practical advice about farming operations, and thus prevent costly mistakes and the waste of money and time.
5. Organizing these community settlements for the more effective buying of what they need and the selling of what they produce.
6. Making farming more profitable and attractive by the creation of cooperative organization, and thus bring neighborhoods into close social and business relations.
7. Creating better living conditions for farm laborers and their families.

An interesting and valuable feature is the proposed provision for farm laborers. Many of the returning soldiers will not care to assume the indebtedness or undergo the necessary efforts to pay for a farm and its equipment. They prefer to work for wages, provided they can have a home where they can live with their families in comfort and independence and have living expenses reduced by the production of a large part of their food supply. This will be secured by the creation in these settlements of areas of 2 to 5 acres of land, on which comfortable houses are built and where men who work for wages on the farms or in the industries of the near-by towns can live. The great benefits to wage workers and to their families which come from the establishment of these small holdings in other countries leaves no doubt that this innovation will be a valuable feature of soldier settlements and lead to its adoption as a part of rural life outside.

At a large meeting of the Members of the House before the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, on the 10th of January, this year, Secretary Lane made another very clear, forcible, and convincing statement, and I was instructed by the committee and the other Members present to have it inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in order that his views might be preserved and given publicity for the benefit of the country and the welfare of our boys in the service. And I therefore insert that portion of the hearings containing his remarks, as follows:

WORK AND HOMES FOR RETURNING SOLDIERS.

COMMITTEE ON IRRIGATION OF ARID LANDS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Friday, January 10, 1919.

The committee this day met, Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR (chairman) presiding.

The CHAIRMAN. I take it for granted that everyone here knows the object of this gathering. It is to listen to the Secretary of the Interior present his ideas concerning reclamation matters in connection with providing homes for returning soldiers. The Secretary, as you know, has a very large national program outlined, and he wants the Members of Congress to understand it, and we are anxious to have him explain it to us. We very highly appreciate his appearing before us, and we will all be glad to listen to the Secretary, Mr. Lane.

STATEMENT OF HON. FRANKLIN K. LANE, SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Secretary LANE. Mr. Chairman, this scheme for providing work and homes on reclaimed land for our returned soldiers, which has been talked about a good deal in the press and which I made one of the principal features of my annual report this year, has, as you know, received the indorsement of the President in his message to the Congress of December 2. I was very proud to see in the papers yesterday morning that the last article written by Col. Roosevelt was an editorial for one of the magazines, in which he indorses this plan that I had presented originally in May, 1918, to the President and to the Congress.

So you can see it has nothing of partisanship in it. It is a plan for the development of our country in a very large and in a very real way. It is a practical plan. We know that it is practical, because what we propose shall be done has been done and is being done.

It is a plan that involves the reclamation of lands of various kinds. I recognize most of you as gentlemen from the West, and you know that for 16 years now you have been passing upon the various reclamation projects that have been brought before you. That work we have carried on with more or less success in a pioneer field. This is an extension and an elaboration of the idea upon which the reclamation act was founded.

The reclamation law, as you know, provided that we should take the arid lands of the West and put water upon them. It was at first thought that it was only necessary to divert the water from the stream. Later we found it was necessary to build great dams up in the mountains and to bring those waters down through diverging canals and through tunnels and through ditches into lands 50, 60, or 70 miles away from the place where the water was stored. You gentlemen have been liberal in your appropriations for that work. We have spent approximately $115,000,000 in the last 15 years on it. The works built under the reclamation law are now serving probably 2,000,000 acres under irrigation, comprising land that was worth only a nominal sum before it was irrigated.

It has always been a mystery to me why Congress, in its wisdom, did not see fit to extend the same principle to the lands of the South and the lands of the North. We have a vast body of undeveloped land in the United States. This is an incomplete country. It will be hundreds of years before it is entirely developed, but we know now that there are millions of acres of land in the United States that can be saved ultimately from worthlessness and brought into value and made a permanent part of the United States by drainage, by clearing off stumps and brush, and by reclamation through irrigation.

A clear distinction should, of course, be made between the ultimate possibilities of such reclamation, spread over many decades, and the practical possibilities of the next few years. We know that there are many millions of acres of unused and unproductive land in this country. It is self-evident, however, that much of this land is not feasible for reclamation purposes under present conditions. In many cases the present cost of reclamation would be prohibitive; in others the soil conditions appear unfavorable; in others a combination of factors make such reclamation practically impossible at the present time and under present economic conditions.

An appropriation of $100,000,000 would provide for the construction of projects containing approximately 20,000 farms, or, as a rough estimate, a total of only about 1,500,000 acres of cultivated land. There are at present in the United States nearly 7,000,000 farms, so that the addition of these 20,000 farms would mean an increase of less than one-third of 1 per cent. The improved land in farms amounts to something like 550,000,000 acres, so that the addition of 1,500,000 acres to this area already under cultivation would amount to less than three-tenths of 1 per cent. If continued for 10 years, the increase would be only 3 per cent, while the population is increasing five or six times as fast. It can readily be seen that there is little cause for alarm that overproduction and depression of prices of farm products would result from the construction proposed at the present time.

I have been through the South lately. It is a marvelous country; it was a new country to me. I had no understanding of that land. They have in North and South Carolina a 55-inch rainfall during the year, which is distributed in such a way that it is possible to get three crops; but they are not self-supporting because they devote themselves very largely to one money crop—cotton—and possibly tobacco.

There is an Alabama woman named Mrs. Mathis who is one of the real citizens of this country. She is a farmer, and she discovered some years ago the trouble with Alabama, with quantities of splendid rich land. The whole country is a cotton plantation, and they were bringing down their beef and their mutton and their ham and their bacon and their wheat from Kansas City. So this woman said:

"Why not divide our land up and have three subdivisions in each farm, one devoted to supporting the farmer and his family, providing truck and fruit and taking care of the cow; another part given over to the money crop, to tobacco or peanuts or cotton; and the third devoted to sustaining cattle?"

The only official position this woman has held, so far as I know, is to be the nominal representative of the Alabama Bankers' Association. The result of her position has been that she has really changed Alabama into a State that is self-sufficient; and the same thing can be done in every one of these Southern States. I made a trip from here to the southern end of Florida. On the 15th day of December I picked an ear of green corn, what the South calls a "roastin'" ear, and the seed had been planted on the 15th day of October. There is no reason why we should not have in Washington in midwinter green corn from Florida.

I believe I could safely undertake to say that the territory from here to the southern end of Florida could sustain the entire population of the United States, because not half, not one-third, of that land that is cultivable is cultivated. Much of it that is cultivated is cultivated poorly.

Along the coast—and you gentlemen who know anything about this country know this to be true—along the coastal plain there have been great pine forests that have been cut down. This is true in North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and eastern Texas; there are also great bodies of these lands in Arkansas and in Tennessee. That land very largely needs to be reclaimed by a very simple process of drainage.

I saw a few acres of swamp land in North Carolina; it is marked upon the Government map as swamp, a great green swamp. They are cutting down the timber on it. In the very heart of this swamp I saw what they call stuck corn. A plow never had been through this land; there had never been a hoe upon it. The land was entirely fresh. Boys had passed along the land, in a row, and with a stick made a hole 6 inches deep in the ground and dropped in a couple of seeds of corn; and they had bins full of this corn, which had been grown in that way. That is the kind of land we want to reclaim. And we can reclaim it by a simple system of drainage canals and ditches.

Gentlemen, there are 40,000,000 acres of tillable land between here and eastern Texas as good land as is under the sun, totally unused.

We have the land; we have it in every part of this country, in the North as well as in the South. One of the richest parts of the United States is Aroostook County, Me. Maine has been deserted in part in her farming regions because the boys have had a lust for the western country that I love, and I can not blame them for that; but they have left good farms there. In Massachusetts it may surprise you to know perhaps that we have one little section of country around Cape Cod where there is some of the richest land in the United States, and it has been proved so in the last two or three years; and in the body of the State they have very considerable quantities of land that needs to be cared for a little bit, cut-over land that has been deserted, that needs to be brought into shape, that will make good farm land. The same thing is true in New York.

I was looking over yesterday a plat of New York which showed three drainage possibilities in that State, and we can get a project there of 60,000 acres of extremely rich land that needs only to be drained.

There are in the United States millions of acres of unused and unproductive land, much of which it is entirely feasible, under present conditions, to irrigate, drain, or otherwise reclaim and bring into use. As I have just said, I do not, of course, propose that we shall undertake the huge job of making all that land serviceable in the next few years to the people of this country and to the world. But I do propose that we shall make a beginning at it, and what better opportunity can there be than this, when the boys are coming back?

There is a doubt, perhaps, in your minds as to whether these boys want to go upon the lands. I am not satisfied with the situation as it is to-day in the United States, and I think you men who have vision, who can look forward two, three, four, five, or six months, must yourselves feel that you have a responsibility in regard to this matter that you can not be indifferent to. There is no man here who would rise and say that he feels sure that the labor market will be satisfactory six months from now, or three months from now, or that there will be a job waiting for the soldier who returns, when he gets to New York, or when he reaches his home. What are we going to do for these men? We can not have them floating about the United States looking for something to do. This is no time for that condition in this country, or in any other country.

There is only one way of meeting a situation like that, and that is by prevision; you have got to see what is going to come before it actually arrives; you have got to have the cunning sense of the aviator who knows he is going to meet an air current before he actually strikes it, and adapts himself to it.

We have an incomplete country; we have an undeveloped country; we need tens of thousands of miles of good roads in the United States. I am not saying to you gentlemen that all the money you should put into providing work for these men against a probable surplus of labor should be put into this scheme, but I believe, and I say it to you very seriously, that you ought to be prepared—and upon you rests the initial responsibility—you ought to be prepared to have some work available to which you can assign a man who comes back from France or from one of the cantonments and who has not a job awaiting him.

The time is coming—yes; it has come—when we must feel a real responsibility for providing not merely for returned soldiers but for the man in the United States, no matter who he may be, who is willing to work. I want to say to this Congress, to the Congresses that are to come, and to this Nation that no man who is willing to work should be without a job, and I will agree personally to provide the work which will give the man a job and add to the wealth of his Nation if you will adopt that policy. It is the wise policy to adopt if we are to have a chance in the United States to prove that democracy is the kind of government that the world wants. [Applause.]

These boys are coming home, and they are coming home with the idea in their heads that the United States will see that they have something to do; they are coming home with the idea in their heads that what they want to do is not to work in an office but to work in the open. My boy has come home. When he left he was in the university. He went into the Aviation Corps and has been in France a year. From the university his intention was to go to the law school and become a lawyer. He has abandoned the idea of the university; he says he is too old now to go to a university. He was only 18 when he left. He will not go into law, and I asked him what he was going to do. He wants to go out West somewhere and go on a farm.

I have hundreds of letters here, and I am going to send extracts from some of them to you, which boys have sent to me regarding this proposition from France and from the cantonments in the United States.

We are meeting exactly the same thing that we met in the Civil War. I do not see any Civil War veterans here, but you can probably recall—and it must be so, because it appears in the records of the Land Office—that the boys of the different States wanted to live the life in the open; and it was these boys who largely settled in and made the western prairie country, and the country I come from in the far West. The great rush to the Pacific coast came along in the seventies. And now our boys are all coming back in the same way, in the same spirit, with the same desire, and the same kind of peculiar self-respect as that of the man who came back from South Africa whom Kipling tells us about in his "Chant Pagan."

It is the story of a man who comes back to be a butler or a gardener in an English house. He has been in the Boer War. He reviews his own personal record in South Africa and then he says, "Me, that has been what I have been; me, that has seen what I have seen; they ask me to carry a letter as far as the post office and be sure to return without getting my feet wet." He has an entirely new vision of his own value, and he has an entirely different desire from that which he formerly had as to the kind of life he should lead.

I had a letter yesterday from a man in France. He said he had been talking the matter over with the boys in his regiment and that probably 80 per cent of them would like to go onto farms. We have a little hospital which is supported by the people in the Interior Department, and we find that about 4 out of 10 of these convalescent boys want to go upon farms. Even the women are stirred up about it. These girls we induced as war workers to go into the fields are anxious that there should be one of these projects where women could prove themselves as farmers.

The secret of this whole proposition, aside from the land and the willingness of the boys to go upon the land, lies in the type of the settlement, in the fact that we must not abandon the farmer once we have given him land. Serious thought must be devoted to the development of a farm-settlement project. In the past it has taken about three crops of men—this is about the wastage, and I think you gentlemen from the West will agree with me on this—it has taken about three crops of men to develop a quarter section of land. The first man has come on as the pioneer and taken up his quarter section. He has lived as long as he could, and he has endured. Of course, he has had the benefit of the game and he has lived a hardy life. He has broken a bit of the land, but after a time his money is gone, another crop of settlers comes, and he sells out. The next man struggles as long as he can and finally the third man comes and that third man stays with the land.

We want to develop a system by which men can go to and stay upon farm community settlements which will be planned. And this absence of previous planning is the weakness of the present haphazard method, or lack of method, in settlement all over this country. Woman has the key to the whole situation. She has got to be satisfied, and she will not be satisfied as long as she lives in isolation.

Our insane asylums in the West are filled with the wives of farmers who have gone crazy in the dreary isolation of farm life. We want to have upon each one of these projects a community settlement, and have the farms radiate out from that settlement, all brought in just as near as possible to the one center, and from that center roads radiating out to the farms. In that settlement should be a good schoolhouse, not a one-story affair, but a good schoolhouse which would be the very center and heart of the whole community, a schoolhouse that would be tied up to these farms that encircle it, where the boy would learn as much as he learns on some Indian reservations now. And, incidentally, this is more than is taught in most of the American public schools, for we try in the best Indian reservations to teach the boy how to plant and raise four crops, how to shoe a horse, how to put up a shack; and we teach the girls how to make one suit of clothes for herself, how to make a hat, how to care for a sick baby, how to care for a sick man, and how to cook all her own meals for a month. We ought to have a central school in every one of the settlements where these children would be tied up to the farm life, and the father would realize that the problems which the boy has in school are problems which deal directly with the production on the farm.

In that settlement there should be a good moving-picture house; there should be a good hall. It should be the center of the social life and the center of the economic life of the whole settlement.

We have got much to learn about marketing. Our farmer is a poor cooperator. He does not know how to get together with a mass of men and work together for a common end. The price of crops does not have to fall because there are more crops produced, if growers know how to market their produce. That is proved conclusively by the experience of our citrus growers in southern California. When I knew that crop originally it was 12,000 carloads a year and the farms were falling in value. Those wise men who came from the East to southern California, who knew nothing about raising citrus fruit, said, "This is not business. We are sending our oranges and lemons into places which are already congested with oranges and lemons, and the result is our bills all come back in the red."

After the transportation and the commission merchant's charges were paid off they got no return for the oranges and lemons. What did they do? They employed a man who knew his business as traffic manager at $15,000 a year. A group of farmers employed that man, and they also employed an expert on diseases whom they got from the Department of Agriculture, and they sent him to Spain and to Sicily to find out what diseases they were threatened with and how to cure them.

Then they built a series of warehouses for themselves and put all their crop through a sieve. They graded it, and then made arrangements with the railroad by which all their oranges could be tested out in the different markets, and if there was a glut in one market the car would go to a market where there was a demand, with the result that to-day there are 65,000 carloads of citrus fruits coming out of that State. And the same thing is being done in Florida to some extent. It can be done in Idaho and every section of this country. You can not make the United States simply improve itself. You have got to put thought into it, and the man on the farm has got to put thought into it.

Now, then, we have the boy, we have the land, we have the scheme, and we do not want to leave that fellow alone unprotected there to work out his own salvation. We want to give that boy, in the first instance, an education as to the kind of agriculture he is to carry on, and then we want to leave with him a sensible man, who will give him directions, so that the scheme will be worked out clearly, so that he simply will not be thrown into the world and forgotten.

It is a perfectly simple thing to do. Every one of the agricultural colleges you support in all the States can provide men who know that particular piece of land and who will stay on there as production managers to give advice to these men as to what is the best crop this year and next year, so far as maintaining the fertility of the soil is concerned and how the crop shall be cultivated. We have tried this thing; we know it can be done.

Now, gentlemen, I have asked, and I think Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina has put in an amendment to the appropriation bill for an appropriation of $100,000,000 for this plan. My only regret about that is that the amount is so small. It is ridiculously, absurdly small. If we contributed in the proportion that Australia has contributed to the same kind of a proposition, we would be appropriating to-day $4,000,000,000. Canada makes an offer of 160 acres of land, and an additional 160 acres as a possibility, and $2,500 plus $500, $3,000 in all, to her returning soldier. Canada has erred in just one respect, I think, in that she has not planned the farm and the farm settlement. She has been wise in giving her men an education, even while they are in the field. They have had behind the lines what they called the Vimy Ridge Agricultural College, in which men still in the army are being given an education, and were being given an education two years ago, against the day of their return to Canada.

I do not know whether you gentlemen realize what war costs. You know what appropriations you have made; you know that you were spending at the conclusion of this war over $50,000,000 a day for the conduct of the war. I would like to see you give me at least what war costs for a week. Just throw out the Sunday and give to me what it costs for the other six days to try and take care of these men of our country, to make them more comfortable, more resourceful, and more contented.

We are going to have great problems in this country in the next few years, and the best kind of man whom we can have in the United States is the man who is anchored to our soil and has some satisfaction in his home. There is no way by which you can do this for less money, than the way I have pointed out to you. Let us give to these men, on 40-acre farms or 50-acre farms, not merely the bare land, but a home upon the land, the cottage, the barn, the land fenced in, the land plowed, the first crop put in, the necessary farm implements, and have the place ready so he and his wife can move in immediately and go to work upon that place. Let it be a place where the man can live comfortably and make a decent living and be proud of it.

I would take all these boys personally and say to them, "If, after you have gone to your homes and do not find the old job all ready and open for you, then here is a job for you. We will pay you the current rate of wages while you are clearing this ground, while you are removing the stumps and undergrowth, while you are draining this swamp, digging that ditch or building that dam in the far West; we will give you good wages, we will take care of you in a barracks that will look palatial to you.

"Then, after you have worked for a year or two years upon that project, pick out your farm. You have joined in digging the ditch that makes the farm possible; you will have joined in building that which makes the farm habitable." We will set up a demand for agricultural implements and a great many other things that will stimulate the industries back home so that there will not be so many fellows back there that will need to be taken care of. Then this boy can move out on that farm and be prepared to make a living for himself and for his family; and he should not be called upon to pay for the farm immediately. We want him to be allowed 40 years in which to pay for it, but in the end he will pay every cent of it and pay interest on the money. The soldier does not ask any charity, and we are not going to get a strong, virile people by giving charity, by doing things for them, except giving them opportunities; and that is what we propose this Government shall give these men, an opportunity to make farms for themselves, to make a living for themselves, and then to pay back to the Government the money which the Government has advanced, and to pay that money back plus interest. They can do it easily, paying 4 per cent interest, in 40 years.

We are paying this year, gentlemen, and you may not realize this, $221,000,000 in pensions for the war that closed 54 years ago and the Spanish-American War. When I came into office six years ago the pensions ran up to $180,000,000. There were 300,000 Civil War veterans, practically, still alive, but by the deaths, which came along at the rate of about 30,000 a year, that sum was reduced to $170,000,000. Last year by the addition of different bills you appropriated $187,000,000. This year you have raised it so that we are paying now, or, practically, during the next fiscal year we will pay, under our estimates, $221,000,000 for pensions.

This scheme that I present is far better than any pension scheme that can be presented. It is a scheme by which you make American men, and by which you make American land. It is a scheme by which you add to the territory, the available useful territory of the United States. You do not have to fight for it; you do not have to shed your blood for it. You do not have to put up $50,000,000 a day in order to get it. You do not have to rob anybody or do injustice to a neighbor in order to get it. You get it simply by the expenditure of your own money in advance and have that money brought back to you. Most of these lands are lands that are in private ownership, and those lands can be had at our own appraisement and not at what the owners think they are worth.

We have been through every State, and we find there is a practical project in almost every State. In every State there is a body of men who are solicitous for the soldier, who believe the war is not over until we have taken care of the boys on their return; these men own large tracts of land, and are willing to turn that land over to us, the United States to pay nothing for it whatever except that the owners of the land shall have returned to them whatever we appraise that land to be worth, the money to come in within the 40 years, when we get our money. It is a perfectly practical scheme. We looked over the map yesterday, and I suppose in some of the States there are as many as a dozen possible projects upon that basis.

In the State of Florida there are a million and half acres owned by the State, which they are perfectly willing to turn over to us on this basis, we to drain them. Up in Wisconsin and in Michigan there is some of this land held by the lumber companies which is worthless to-day, not being used, that we can get at our own figure, the lumber companies to get their money back when we get it ourselves, and not until then.

In the West the great bulk of this land is public land, and there we have the basis for large irrigation projects, as our plans include either a great irrigation scheme or a great drainage scheme in every State west of the Missouri River, in every State in the South, and in practically every other State except Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, and we may later be able to develop projects in these States.

We want to distribute these settlements as widely as possible so as to reveal the method by which farm life can be made agreeable as well as successful, and then this current that is running to-day against the country and in favor of the city will run the other way. In this decade that has passed, from 1900 to 1910, the movement to the city was unprecedented, and the relative increase in the number of farms was the smallest in the history of this country. We have got to stop that in some way. You can not afford, as statesmen, to let the people of the United States become dependent upon foreign countries for food supplies. You know we were importing beef from Argentina before this war.

You can not afford to have the people of the United States centered as they are now in the cities of the United States. When I was a boy we had in this country 75 per cent of our population on the farms or in farm villages. To-day we have not 50 per cent. More than one-half of our people are living in the cities—and living upon the people in the country—congested, working to develop American industry, but not working to develop those fundamental things upon which we have found in the last year nations depend.

I do not believe there is any doubt but that we will have the men to do this work, and there is no fear of overproducing. We can not possibly produce more than 20,000 or 25,000 new farms out of this amount of $100,000,000, which is the largest amount we have dared to ask for, knowing how anxious for economy you were. We can not possibly give employment to more than 100,000. There is no danger of taking away from the present farmer any advantage he has. Twenty thousand new farms is about one-third of 1 per cent of the number of farms there are now in the United States. So there is no threat against the present farmer in this proposition.

But we ought to have work for the man when he comes back, and if times become hard three months from now I want you to think about this proposition—that in Michigan and Wisconsin we can put at work just as many men as will be out of employment in the great Central West, and down in North and South Carolina and Florida and Louisiana we can put more men at work—hundreds of thousands of men, if need be, and care for them. All that will be necessary will be to have the money. We can not do it with $100,000,000. We can take care of a few, but there are rare possibilities there, and you gentlemen ought to think of it.

It is an opportunity for us, an opportunity to show gratitude toward the men who made the great sacrifice, who have done the thing you and I were willing to do but that we did not have the chance to do, because Uncle Sam would not take us. It is a great deal better that we should extend to that man this opportunity to make his own living, and make an independent living, and to add to the wealth of this country, than that he should be a dependent for years to come, or that he should be cast adrift, and prove once more that Republics are ungrateful. This Republic is not ungrateful. It never has been ungrateful. It is the most liberal and generous Government that the world has ever seen.

But we are not asking generosity now. We are asking something that is ultimately selfish.

I want you gentlemen, if you will be so good, if you will look upon this as I do, if you believe this is practicable, as the President and Col. Roosevelt believe it is, if you believe this thing is wise, that it is a statesmanlike thing, I want you to see that the members of the Committee on Appropriations, or whatever committee has charge of it, shall bring it to the front at once. We can not wait. We have waited too long.

I made this suggestion to the President and to Congress last May. We ought to have taken it up then. The time is ripe now. We need a word of encouragement from the Government of the United States to these men before there develops in them any feeling that the Government is not appreciative of what they have done. It has got to be done sometime, gentlemen; why not now? You have been thinking in large sums of money; you have passed in a day bills appropriating billions of dollars.

Can we not get to the point where we can visualize the opportunities and necessities of peace as well as the necessities of war? You are going to make this continent by the expenditure of large sums of money, and it is going to support three or four hundred million people; you will have 200,000,000 before this century is out. We are growing at the rate of about sixteen or seventeen millions every 10 years, or we were before the war. We have got to have a place for these people. We want to show you a plan by which they can be taken care of.

One-third of our tillable land outside of the mountains is already occupied and in use. We want to see that the other two-thirds is used and used by men who are Americans, who are tied to the soil, and who are identified with us in interest as well as in heart.

The portion of Secretary Lane's annual report pertaining to this subject contains so much carefully prepared data and is so comprehensive and instructive that I am going to take the liberty of also inserting it herewith, as follows:

THE RETURNING SOLDIER.

Soon, almost immediately now, the men whom we have drawn into war will return. Already those here are being prepared for their reabsorption into the normal currents of our life, and the 2,000,000 and more who have had the glory and the experience of making war upon foreign soil in protection of the liberties of the world will be brought back as soon as their work is done. With conditions as fluent as they are in Europe, I presume that no one can foretell when the last man will be once more in America, but whatever the day of their coming their welcome can not be too warm or our appreciation of their service too hearty.

And the question is pertinent: What shall that welcome be? Is it to be merely one of glad greetings the emotional outburst of a moment, or shall it take on a more permanent form, one which will be adequate in its largeness and lasting in its nature? I am quite sure that we can make of this event something that is real, something exceptional and of the most permanent value to the men and to the Nation.

No one can tell what such an experience will have done for these boys. They have not seen the picture of the war in the broad view that has been given us from day to day. The map which we have studied has not been theirs. To them the sector on which they fought, the valley up which they marched, the ruined villages which they saw, the narrow trench in which they lived, the desolate blasted foreground of No Man's Land—these composed their picture. Life has been a series of incidents, sobering, strengthening, horrifying, democratizing. Through these they will have grown, all of them. They will come back other than they went. They have lived through years in the months they have been gone. They may not have gained the larger view of the great war, being too near to see, but they will have gained a new view of America.

They will return home as victors; proud, no doubt, and becomingly modest, with a new sense of their individual power and new tests set up in their minds as to the qualities which make a man. We will hold them at arm's length and look into their eyes to see what change war has made upon them, the doing of daring things, the taking of ordered risks, the prompt recognition of authority, the steady, long companionship of their fellows, the sight and enduring of suffering, the hard life of dust and mud, and weary walking, and long, sleepless nights. We will look hard into the sunburned, hardened faces to see what the strange life of a few months has done to these boys, these youngsters of but a day ago. They will resent, maybe, as soldiers should, the soft sympathizings that will be poured out upon them, just as they will make light of all that they have done. But out of every mouth and from every heart will come the words, "Well, home sure looks good to me!"

"WHAT IS TO BE MY CHANCE?"

They will be looking at us, too. And in their look will be a query, one thought over in the trench at night and on the long, slow "slog, slog, slog" of the day's march: "What is my life to be when I get home? Am I to go hustling for a job or will the old place be mine? But if a girl has that place and wishes to be her own mistress in the future, what then? School? Oh, I can't go back to school. When I left I was only 21, but now I'm 31. And I have lived with men, fought with them, been sometimes bested by them, learned to know them in all their many littlenesses and their great goodnesses. Responsibility has been mine, and the still silences of the night have given me chance to think and wonder why I am and why it should make any difference whether I ever saw home again or not. I am back now, back for a man's life. This America that called me out has called me back, and it will have something for me to do. Now, what is to be my chance?" This will all be implied in the look that they give us as we hold them by both shoulders to find the mark of war upon their young faces. And what is to be our answer? What answer is due them, and what answer is worthy of us?

Being Americans and being young, they will not ask or expect pensions. They will want work. They will want, if possible, a chance for a home of their own. They would like to know that while perhaps the fortunes of war did not so turn as to bestow on them the medal for distinguished service, the Nation which they served thought well enough of what they had done to give them some evidence of its appreciation.

Now, these hopes, reasonable and manly as they are, can be met, and in a fashion that will not weaken the fiber of the man by making him an object of bounty, and that will add permanently to the strength and the wealth of the Nation.

Why not say to this inquiring soldier man: America offers you a farm if you will help in its making and pay for it out of what you make out of it.

This can be done, and, if it were, it would solve, or tend largely to solve, several problems:

(1) That of the immediate job for the man himself.

(2) That of protecting the labor market against any possible collapse by being swamped with a surplus of labor.

(3) That of providing for many lines of reestablished industry an immediate demand for their products.

(4) That of staying the movement toward the cities and thus more completely decentralizing our population.

(5) That of affixing to our soil a large number of the best-proved Americans.

(6) That of setting up throughout the land the most modern pattern of farm settlement in which the social side of human nature is given consideration.

(7) That of bringing into use those great areas of our land which now lie neglected and of no value to the world.

All of these objects, I apprehend, will be deemed worthy, desirable, and of great concern to the Nation. The questions that arise in the mind will not involve the value of doing these things, but the practicability of such a program.

CONGRESS MAKES THE FIRST MOVE.

To meet this objection, I would recall to your attention the fact that all that I have urged is an extension on a large scale, and somewhat more elaborately, of just what this department has been doing for the past 16 years, through the activities of the Reclamation Service. And Congress has already taken the first step in the direction pointed out by appropriating $200,000 for an examination into the reclaimable land resources of the country, one half that sum to be expended for a survey of possible irrigation projects and the other half for an examination of those lands which need to be drained, and of those huge tracts of lands which once were forests but now are neither forest, pasture, nor farms—the logged-off lands of North, East, West, and South. As soon as this appropriation was made the country was divided into three zones, and engineers were set at work gathering the data which Congress desired.

We are prepared to make report to Congress forthwith, giving a general picture of the extent and nature of these lands and advising as to the practicability of their reclamation. In the large, it may be said that of these three classes of land we have a full 200,000,000 acres which may be converted into farms either by irrigation, drainage, or clearing.

Although no complete survey has ever been made of our land resources, it is estimated that there are from 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 additional acres of at present arid land in the West for which water is available if properly conserved. There are, for example, half a million of acres in the Colorado River Basin which need only irrigation to make them as fertile as the far-famed valley of the Nile.

By far the greater portion of our unused and unproductive lands, however, is comprised in the cut-over or logged-off timberland lying largely within the eastern half of the United States. The approximate area of these cut-over lands by States is shown in the following table, which has been compiled from various sources of information, such as township, county, and State officials, lumber and logging companies, and individuals well informed on this subject in their particular localities:

State.	Acres.
Alabama	14,785,000
Arkansas	13,893,000
California	3,031,000
Florida	10,109,000
Georgia	20,141,000
Idaho	676,000
Kentucky	3,222,000
Louisiana	11,877,000
Maine	6,135,000
Maryland	1,848,000
Michigan	11,686,000
Minnesota	14,022,000
Mississippi	13,203,000
Missouri	8,900,000
Montana	674,000
New Hampshire	2,608,000
New Jersey	1,151,000
New York	5,997,000
North Carolina	12,745,000
Oregon	3,537,000
Pennsylvania	5,297,000
South Carolina	8,994,000
Tennessee	7,833,000
Texas	12,936,000
Vermont	2,070,000
Virginia	9,929,000
Washington	3,330,000
West Virginia	4,634,000
Wisconsin	13,246,000
Total	228,509,000

In their present state these 228,509,000 acres of cut-over land are a picture of desolation calculated to discourage the hardiest pioneer. Only a vast area of stumps remains to mark the former forest, matted with underbrush, and interspersed here and there with saplings. Perhaps as good an idea as any of the appearance of this waste land may be obtained from photographs of former forests which have been shattered by artillery fire. Yet when this land is cleared, leveled, and brought under the plow its soil, rich with the accumulated humus of hundreds of years, possesses extraordinary agricultural possibilities.

Lying also largely in the eastern half of the United States and overlapping the cut-over lands to some extent are some 80,000,000 acres of swamp lands. The approximate extent of these lands, by States, is shown in the table.

Where private enterprise has reclaimed small areas of swamp land the wonderful productivity of the soil has been amply demonstrated.

Under present conditions the problem of reclaiming these vast areas of irrigable, cut-over, and swamp lands could never be sold in its entirety by private enterprise. The huge items of labor and capital involved dwarf into insignificance any work of a similar character ever before undertaken. The great public works of the Reclamation Service and of the Panama Canal, for example, stimulating as they are to our national pride in achievement, fall far short of the possibilities involved in the plan of reclaiming an area one-fifth again as large as the State of Texas.

These lands in greater part have passed out of the hands of the Government and are in private hands, though there are several of the largest bodies of lands needing drainage which are in the hands of the States. On the Government lands alone it would appear now to be unquestionably the fact that we could give employment to every man who would need work, and that almost immediately.

STATE COOPERATION.

But as this proposition has evolved I have found myself coming to the belief that it was not necessary to confine it to those States containing Government lands; that, on the contrary, it might fit in best with the sentiment of the country and to its greatest advantage if the plan were made adaptable to all the States, so that each State out of its unused lands might carve out farm settlements whereon, if they so chose, the soldiers returning to their home States could be located. By cooperation between the States and the Federal Government this can easily be effected. I have been surprised to discover how much land in the older States, such as Massachusetts and New York, for instance, there is that is unused, which once was tilled and which now, with modern methods of farm development and with the advantage of its nearness to the great markets, can be again profitably put to use. The commissioner of agriculture for Massachusetts has advised of land which, put under intensive cultivation, yielded last year more than $1,000 per acre net. And there are many thousands of acres of such land. In New York land by the tens of thousands of acres has been deserted and is advertised by the State, which will produce apples and other fruits of fine quality, besides all the staple cereals and vegetables, but which does not attract as against the distant and alluring lands of the West, because it requires some systematic treatment.

Within 50 miles of the city of Washington, both in the States of Maryland and Virginia, there are large bodies of lands which once were parts of great plantations that can be had for less than any lands within the same distance of most of the larger cities of the West. The mind of the country has been turned toward the development of the raw lands, the free unbroken lands, to the neglect of opportunities nearer the center of the country's markets. In almost every southern State instances can be cited where white men under the wise direction of the Department of Agriculture support their families and make an excellent living upon small farms of from 10 to 30 acres. Yet between this city and New Orleans there are over 40,000,000 acres of unused lands.

THE NEW FARM IDEA.

No one, I believe, can make a study of this question without being convinced, as I have been, that this country can support a population of from three to four times that which we now have, if the people will give over their desire to congregate in industrial centers. The passion for the city is upon us. It has come from a variety of causes—the lack of society in the country, the distance between farm homes, the remoteness from the post office and the newspaper, the assumed superior status of the "city man," the desire for better school facilities for the children, and many more which have been the theme of books without number seeking to reestablish in the heart the longing for contact with the soil. But preachments of any kind will not offset stern repellant facts. There is but one way of dealing with this problem, and that is to answer the questions that are put by developing new conditions. We must turn, as Europe has in her centuries of experience, to the farm village, the settlement of farmers around a center which is their home, in which can be gathered most of the advantages of the city—the good school, the church, the moving picture, the well-outfitted store—and these, with good roads, the rural express, the telephone, the automobile, and the post office will make life on the farm a thing of far different meaning from the isolated life it has been.

Of land, therefore, there is an abundance; land owned by the Government in the West and the South, land owned by private individuals in all the States, which is a burden to its owners and which can be had in great blocks at a very small price. It will not be for Congress to seek for advantageous places in which to locate these men; the difficulty will rather be in the choosing as between so many opportunities.

A POSSIBLE PROGRAM.

My own judgment would be that as an immediate program we should first offer an opportunity upon our present irrigation projects for all who wish work at clearing and leveling the land not now cultivated but for which water is available, or to which water can be brought under the present irrigation system, and that such tracts shall be developed under an appropriate land-settlement plan. This we can do at once and meet whatever labor problem may be immediate. As a second step, I would urge an appropriation for one or more of the largest irrigation schemes for which surveys are in an advanced state. Concurrently it would seem to me wise to undertake the draining of the most promising projects—Government-owned land preferred, but, if privately owned, the land to be bought at an appraisement made by the Farm Loan Board and subject to the approval of the Department of Agriculture as to fertility of soil and desirability of location.

There is an alternative method of dealing with private lands which already has the approval of Congress, being incorporated in the reclamation act. Under this a private owner agrees to sell his land to whoever gets the water right at an appraised price as a condition precedent to our undertaking the construction or irrigation work. Under such a plan there would be no difficulty whatever in securing control of any sized bodies of cut-over or swamp lands that might be desired; the Government would not buy the land, but the owner would look to the new settler for the price, and take it on such terms as the Government itself would exact for its own expenditure upon the land. Supplementing this there should be an opportunity given for the cooperation of all the States upon limited tracts which would be dealt with under State control and subject to the closest Federal supervision. This would be an adoption in the development of farms for soldiers of the method taken by Congress for the construction of national highways.

WORKING FOR A HOME.

With such a national program underway there need be no solicitude as to caring for the returned soldier. Before he left France he could be preparing for his work. More than one-third, probably nearer one-half, it is estimated, of the men who are in Europe have come from farms. They are not farm owners, many of them were farm hands, some of them tenant farmers. Those who thought of taking up this life as independent farmers under the most modern and approved system could be given an agricultural education while still in the foreign camps. Canada, indeed, is already at this work. Then, after their return and when they have received the greetings of home, if the old position is not open or they wish to turn to an independent life, they can have their chance. For each there can be a position at the current rate of wages. The energy and the talent which he has been expending for an ideal and $30 a month he can now use to make a home for himself. There would be laid before him a number of projects which the Government had undertaken in the different sections of the country.

Let us assume no more than three, one an irrigation scheme, another a drainage project, a third the development of a body of cut-over lands. The one would need to have great dams constructed to impound and divert waters, a hydroelectric plant, miles of canal and tunnel, perhaps thousands of acres to be cleared and leveled, fenced, and broken. This would mean years of work at good wages, work in the open under housing conditions that would seem palatial to the soldier of the trench, and at the end a piece of land on which would be erected a house and barn, a farm home in a group of farm homes. For this he must pay. But already he has received wages out of which he can have saved the necessary first installment on his place of 10 or 15 per cent. The balance with interest he can pay in 40 yearly installments, or earlier if he can. He should not be limited to a choice of farms upon the one project on which he works. If the life in Arizona, let us say, is not to his liking he can have the same opportunity after building the Arizona irrigated project to take up a farm upon another Government enterprise in South Carolina where men have drained the old rice swamps or in Wisconsin on a tract of what once was swamp but has been converted into rolling prairie farms.

Four things are the essence of this program—that there shall be work ready for the men on their return, that this work shall be for the making of America, that the money expended shall be returned with interest to the Government which advances it, and that the land shall be platted so as to be a part of an organized community. A farm as a going concern to be a part of a community that is a going concern—this is the ideal toward which we should work; and such settlements, a few of which already exist in Wisconsin, North Carolina, California, and elsewhere, should be the models for the future land developments of the country.

NO SLACKER LANDS.

There is one other feature which should be incorporated in any such scheme of land development—the acreage should be limited to that which will be sufficient to reasonably support a family. Revolutions come from great land holdings, and it should be the first policy of the Nation and the States to discourage in every way possible the gathering into one hand or a few hands large bodies of land. This is politically wise, socially and economically advisable. The spirit of a democracy does not thrive where men live without the hope of land ownership. There is something peculiarly subtle in the feeling that a bit of the soil is one's own. It makes for a stronger, higher citizenship. It gives birth to loyalties that are essential to national life and to a healthy home life.

To be able to say that a living is assured, no matter what one's opinion may be, is at the very center of the free life of a democracy. So these farms should not only be so small that they would not be speculative ventures in unearned increment, but they should be nontransferable to anyone holding any equally large tract of land in the same State. This will prevent their being aggregated in the course of years into great estates. To compel their use, the owner might well be required to live on the land for five years before gaining sufficient title to make any transfer, and during the full period prior to the last payment three years of idleness should make the land subject to forfeiture to the Government upon repayment of the payments which have been made. This is not suggested as an infallible nor an ultimate plan, but it would save to the Government the opportunity to hold in its own hands the fate of these lands and see that they were made to serve. We wish no slacker lands. Enough land for a family, but not enough to make a new draft on the labor supply.

I have attempted here to give a broad sketch of a plan that has found favor generally as one that meets the needs of the moment and reaches far into the problems of our Nation. It is not a fixed program, the whole of which must be taken or rejected. It has the virtue of elasticity. So much of it as is needed can be used to meet the possibilities of the next few months or years. Once entered upon, its benefits and its defects will be made manifest.

THE COST.

How great will be the cost? As much as we wish to spend; as much as we need to spend. Less than many a strike has cost this country. Would it be unreasonable to ask for as much as we will spend this year for pensions to the veterans and their dependents of wars that ended 20 and 50 years ago? Would it be unreasonable to ask that we spend in the next two years on these veterans of the great war as much as it cost us to conduct that war for a single week? Would a people that gave out of hand, out of a noble sense of charity to quasi public organizations, $500,000,000 for the entertainment and care of these boys hesitate to buy the bonds of this country for a like amount to provide peace work, home work, and homes for these same boys, who will ask the question, What is to be my chance? A loan. Not a gift this time. A loan on interest. Those who deal in money tell me that this can be done. But be the amount great or small the plan can be made to fit our needs—raise it as you please, by taxes or by a bond issue (a mortgage on the very land that it reclaims)—is there a better way to insure the future than to direct these strong-armed, big-chested soldier men into a battle against the wanton wastefulness of nature?

We have spent largely for this war and largely we must spend for many years to come. We are to economize that we may meet our debts; this must be the national policy. But to stop growth is not economy. To stand paralyzed in the presence of a debt is to become its victim. England is planning in the hundreds of millions of pounds sterling for housing and land schemes. Canada, with less than 7,000,000 people, is offering to each man 160 acres of land and $2,500 with which to improve it. Surely the United States, which has escaped with so slight a comparative loss in life, will not do less. There is one way to pay out, and that is by harder work and more faith. These are the reasons for our self-confidence. We shall coin work and faith into new wealth and make the new wealth meet the debts. This has been our policy from the first in all great enterprises. To waste is not sound economy; to save is; but sounder still is the economy that invests to create; this is the sowing of seed. And this land is yet but in its infancy. It has 2,000 years to run before it reaches the age of that country which still holds Verdun and is planning now the reconstruction of 350,000 homes destroyed by the invader.

There can be no surer insurance for the Nation than to put its men upon the soil, and there can be no wiser investment that a nation can make than to add to its territory by taking from desert and waters and desolation land that is now useless. Nations make war upon each other that they may have new lands—lands in tropical Africa, in remote Asia. They spend life and go deeply into debt that they may gain small domains already filled with an unprogressive people. And here, under our own flag, we have land as rich as the Valley of the Nile, not ours yet, for it does not serve us, which we can conquer with a little thought and the lending of a little money. This is conquest worthy of a democracy, giving free men their chance to make themselves economically free without the shedding of blood or the breaking of hearts.

In conclusion I can only say to the House and to the country, and to the many thousands of our splendid boys who will be sorely disappointed by this failure of the House to pass this bill or act upon this subject, that I will reintroduce the bill on the opening day of the next session of Congress and push the measure with all the energy I possess, and I sincerely hope and believe that it will be speedily enacted into law. And I also hope that instead of the appropriation being for $100,000,000 that it may be five times that amount; because even then we will not, in proportion to our wealth and resources, be doing anywhere as much for our returning soldiers as is being done by Canada, Australia, and all other English speaking countries. I am not only confident that this measure will be adopted, but I firmly believe it will go down in history as one of the great constructive policies of our country.

HON. GEORGE R. LUNN,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 10, 1919.

Mr. LUNN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to print, I am submitting the following correspondence, which has to do with the important subject of military justice:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 1, 1919.

Hon. GEORGE R. LUNN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. LUNN: I think I can answer your question about the course of military justice during the war more adequately by sending you the inclosed copy of a letter written by Gen. Crowder to me than in any other way. Immediately after the original discussion of the subject in the Senate, I asked Gen. Crowder to give me a comprehensive memorandum covering the whole matter. This letter resulted. Its statements are, I think, most reassuring.

In the meantime, I may say that during the war we investigated and acted upon the cases involving the death penalty and dishonorable discharge from the service. The great number of cases involving long terms of imprisonment could not be circumstantially reviewed under the pressure then existing. The fact of the legality and sufficiency of the trials was inquired into and the cases otherwise put aside for more mature consideration. A board of officers organized in the office of the Judge Advocate General, known as the clemency board, has been at work for some weeks reviewing these postponed matters, and I have already in a good many cases acted upon the suggestion of that board by reducing some of the longer sentences to such terms of imprisonment as would have been imposed for like offenses under the peace-time procedure in force in the department.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

FEBRUARY 13, 1919.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR CHAMBERLAIN: On the appearance of your remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on January 3, 1919, with reference to the administration of military justice during the war, I at once directed that the Judge Advocate General's office prepare such data as are available for your information and that of the Senate dealing with the subject. It is not unnatural that so grave a matter as this should attract widespread public attention and that the humane sentiments of Senators and of the public should be stirred by such representations as were made to you and formed the basis of your remarks.

In the meantime, as I have happened to be a lawyer and to have had considerable experience as an executive in dealing with the administration of criminal law and of prison discipline, my own attention was not unnaturally attracted to the administration of military justice upon my assumption of the office of Secretary of War. Until the entry of the United States into the European war I found it possible personally to examine the records in most of the cases involving serious penalties. This became impracticable with the increasing demands upon my time, and I therefore came to rely for my action in these matters more and more upon the elaborate reviewing machinery erected in the office of the Judge Advocate General to deal with these cases, although when any doubt was brought to my attention, either by division of opinion or from outside suggestion, I either personally examined the records or caused them to be independently examined by lawyers whose relation to the subject was purely judicial. It seemed, therefore, quite incredible that any general and widespread perversion of the principles of justice could have crept into a system with the workings of which I was thus familiar and the organization of which seemed to me so well calculated to secure thorough consideration and the application of most humane policies.

The Judge Advocate General has just handed me a letter covering such preliminary examination as he has been able to make of the situation, which is to be followed by a report much more comprehensive in character; but the inquiry so far made has developed a situation which I think ought to be brought to your attention at once and which I have no doubt you will be glad to bring to the attention of the country in order that the interest which has been aroused in this subject will have before it all the facts which ought to be considered before any judgment is formed or any apprehension created on the part of parents or friends of those in the Military Establishment that soldiers are subject to a harsh and unequal discipline.

In addition to the data presented in Gen. Crowder's letter, I beg leave to express my willingness to produce all other data and information within the control of the department which would be useful or interesting to the members of the committee.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

FEBRUARY 13, 1919.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Upon resuming active supervision of the work of the Judge Advocate General's office early in January of this year, after a year of almost exclusive preoccupation with my duties as Provost Marshal General, I found your reference calling to my attention the remarks of Senator CHAMBERLAIN, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 3, 1919, which voiced certain criticisms upon the administration of military justice during the war. I have been reflecting upon the most appropriate manner of putting you in possession of the facts on the subject dealt with in these remarks.

The subject, in general—I mean that of military justice during the war—is, of course, within my special province as Judge Advocate General of the Army; and it has been peculiarly a matter of the most conscientious solicitude on the part of myself and of the Acting Judge Advocate General, who had the direct supervision of the office during my special preoccupation with the other duties. Of the nearly 100 judge advocates attached to the office in Washington during the past year, some 50 have been assigned exclusively to the Division of Military Justice, scrutinizing the record of every one of the thousands of general court-martial cases arriving in Washington for revision. These skilled lawyers (all but two of them brought recently into the Army from civil practice, and including some eminent incumbents from the judicial bench) have been keenly alive to the demands of the situation. Months before any of these after-the-war criticisms appeared, and from the very outset of the year 1918, when the disciplinary records of the new Army were already enlarging manyfold the work of this office, the Division of Military Justice had begun to apply measures adapted to safeguard the cause of justice to the individual. And, as the year went on, the progress of court-martial practice was closely and continuously followed, with a view to correcting the legal errors, equalizing the sentences in the various divisions, and exercising the appropriate clemency. How notable were the results achieved by this conscientious scrutiny before the close of the year 1918 I will later point out, noting here merely that these results were already accessible to any inquirer at this office before the close of the year 1918.

It goes without saying, therefore, that all the authentic data that would throw light on the correctness of Senator CHAMBERLAIN'S complaints are to be found in the accumulated records of my office. And I could wish that he had afforded me an opportunity, however scanty, to lay before him the general tenor of these records, or any part of them, before advancing publicly the assertions contained in his remarks on military justice.

However, since receiving your reference, my own question has been whether to wait until a full and exhaustive account could be prepared for you, showing the whole range of facts in that field during the war period, or whether, without waiting for that, it would be worth while to offer you, as a provisional step, the facts upon the topics concretely touched on in the Senator's remarks. I have decided to take the latter course, reserving for a later and formal report the entire body of facts concerning military justice during the war period.

The Senator's remarks run along two lines. In the first place, he cites certain individual cases having special features open to criticism. In the second place, he offers certain generalizations involving general conditions and practices. This makes it necessary to deal with his remarks under two separate heads; and, with your permission, I will do so. Whether or not these individual cases are open to the criticism as made is simply a question of the facts in each of these cases; they differ widely in their nature, and each must receive its own separate explanation, based solely on its own facts and no other. But whether the Senator's assertions as to general conditions and practices are correct is a larger and distinct question, ranging over the entire field of military justice, and these assertions must therefore be examined in the light of the entire mass of relevant cases.

I begin, therefore, by taking up the individual cases cited by the Senator for special features; and at the same time it will be convenient to include comments on a few other individual cases cited on the floor of Congress by Mr. SIEGEL from a newspaper article. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 23, 1919, p. 1928.)

I. Individual cases cited for criticism.

1. The first case cited by Senator CHAMBERLAIN is that of a soldier at Camp Gordon (record No. 110595, tried January 24, 1918), who, while patrolling the town as military police was found at midnight in a shop just after a burglary. Being charged with burglary, he asserted that he had entered the shop in search of the burglar. His story was disbelieved, and he was found guilty; the first finding was not guilty, but at the commanding officer's request there was a reconsideration, and the second finding was guilty. On revision of the record no legal error could be found, but this office reached the opinion that though there was sufficient evidence to sustain the finding, the evidence did not go so far as to show his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. In such a situation no supreme court in the United States (with three or four exceptions only) would interfere and set aside a jury's verdict. Nevertheless, this office recommended a reconsideration of the verdict by the reviewing authority. It was, in fact, reconsidered; but the court adhered to its finding. But the feature for emphatic notice is that reconsideration was given not by exercising the "arbitrary discretion of a military commander," but by referring the case to the judge advocate of the command as legal adviser. The judge advocate wrote an elaborate review of the evidence, disagreeing with the view of this office, and recommending confirmation; and the commanding general followed this opinion of his law officer.

This case, therefore, instead of being, as Senator CHAMBERLAIN has been led to believe, an illustration of "the control which the military commander exercises over the administration of civil justice," illustrates exactly the opposite. For, in the first place, the confirmation of the sentence was made, not by the arbitrary military discretion of the commanding officer, but upon the legal opinion of his judge advocate, an ex-civilian lawyer. And, in the second place, the reconsideration which was actually given by the judge advocate on the point of proof beyond a reasonable doubt was a measure of protection which the law does not provide in any civil court in the United States for the control of a jury's verdict. The case is a good illustration of a feature in which the system of military justic sometimes does even more for the accused than the system of civil justice.

2. The second case cited by Senator CHAMBERLAIN is that of an absence without leave from Camp Beauregard (record No. 116490, tried June 6, 1918), in which a sentence of 25 years was imposed on a soldier who had gone home (as he claimed) to see a sick mother after the company had been notified of their impending departure for the battle field in France; he returned to camp just after his unit had left. This offense of leaving for home when the regiment is just on the point of departure overseas is obviously one of the most disorganizing to military plans. In this case it was committed at a time when the allied forces were in daily need of American help, and our units were being rushed with all speed to the ports of embarkation. By leaving camp in this particular week the soldier successfully evaded going into the fight with his comrades. That the seriousness of the offense must be emphasized in the sight of the Army by the penalty imposed needs no argument.

But the Senator errs in implying that the man was dishonorably discharged, for he was not. The sentence of dishonorable discharge was suspended, which means, under the law, that his confinement has practically no minimum, and that if his conduct is good he may be released from confinement and restored to duty at any time.

3. The third case cited by Senator CHAMBERLAIN is a similar case of absence without leave at the same camp (record No. 116800) under almost identical circumstances; but in this case a sentence of 15 years, instead of 25 years, was imposed. This matter of the variability of sentences is later explained by me, in its general aspects. But the difference of periods, however, has in this case not the significance which it appears to have, because the sentence of dishonorable discharge was in this case also suspended, and the offender went to the disciplinary barracks for a period of confinement having no minimum, and upon a record of good conduct he may be restored to duty at any time, and his confinement be terminated.

4. The next case cited by Senator CHAMBERLAIN is a case of sleeping on post at Camp Merritt, the sentence being for 10 years. The Senator's brief description of the case applies to two offenders, tried nearly at the same time. (Record No. 114717, tried Apr. 25, 1918, and record No. 115506, tried May 17, 1918.)

In the one case the sentence was reduced by the commanding officer to six months, probably because the soldier was a youth of 17. This reduction was apparently not known to Senator CHAMBERLAIN, for he does not mention it. There is certainly nothing harsh in military justice in this case.

In the other case the sentence was approved by the commanding general; and on November 22, 1918, the Judge Advocate General's office, on application, after a careful scrutiny of the record, declined to recommend clemency; so that it may be assumed that the circumstances of the case did not merit it. But here, too, the sentence of dishonorable discharge was suspended by the commanding general; the period of confinement has no minimum; and the offender may be restored at any time, after a record of good conduct.

5. The next case cited by Senator CHAMBERLAIN is another instance of sleeping on post, the sentence being for 10 years (record No. 113076, tried on Mar. 21, 1918, at Camp Merritt). As the sentinel had been drinking whisky shortly before going on guard, had actually left his post, and was found asleep in a toilet, the case was plainly one for making an example, and the sentence is therefore hardly to be termed severe. The Judge Advocate General's office, however, after at first declining, on application, to recommend clemency, later considered the case a second time, on December 12, 1918, and notified The Adjutant General that there was no objection to his restoration to duty.

But at this point I must take notice of Senator CHAMBERLAIN'S expression, applied in his remarks to the duty assigned to this soldier, of guarding a sentinel post, as "virtually a watchman's job." I feel sure that even the civilian mind will readily appreciate the high responsibility of a sentinel's post in time of war, and that this expression will be recognized as inappropriate. The war was not only in France; it was in our own country also; and at the post where this sentinel was on guard there were millions of dollars worth of supplies, waiting for early shipment to equip the forces on the battle front, and lying open to destruction by the incendiary agents of the enemy who lurked at every such spot in our own country. That under such circumstances the offense of sleeping on post belongs among the most serious and dangerous misdeeds of a soldier needs no further argument.

6. The next case cited by Senator CHAMBERLAIN is one of disobedience to orders to drill, and of having seditious literature in possession for distribution. The offender was a conscientious objector who had not been given an opportunity for noncombatant service, and who was not attempting nor intending to distribute the literature. The sentence was death; but the Senator adds that it was "disapproved by the President and the prisoner discharged," and he expresses the hope that "the President will exercise the same clemency and show the same mercy in many other cases." Now, the facts of the record demonstrate the precise opposition of what the Senator was led to believe, because in this case (record No. 116790, tried June 17, 1918), it was not the President's clemency that discharged the prisoner; it was the effective operation of that very system of military law which the Senator supposes not to exist. What happened was that the Judge Advocate General's office recommended disapproval of the sentence, on the strictly legal grounds that the order to drill was (under General Orders No. 28, 1918) not a lawful command, and his disobedience was therefore not an offense; and that there was no evidence of the accused's intention to distribute the literature. The sentence was therefore disapproved, and the prisoner discharged on the legal grounds stated by my office. This case, therefore, far from illustrating the Senator's thesis, rather affords an illustration of the operation of military law and justice in entire analogy to that of civil law and justice.

This completes the list of particular cases cited by Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I turn now to the particular cases cited in the newspaper article read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Mr. SIEGEL. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Jan. 23, 1919, pp. 1928 to 1932.)

7. Taking these cases, for convenience sake, in the reverse order of their mention in the article, we are told of three cases of supposedly excessive sentences for the offense of desertion or absence without leave, all three of them being of the type of a return to visit the home family in distress. I should be glad to make any explanations or admissions which these cases might merit, but they are so indefinitely described in their citation that it has been impossible to identify them, even after a careful search of many records.

As they are criticized, however, on no other ground than that of the severity of the sentences, I think that what has been already here said on the other cases of that sort will serve as a sufficient comment.

8. The next instance cited by the writer in question concerns two death sentences imposed in France for sleeping on post in a front-line trench. There are really three distinct questions involved in these cases: First, whether a sentence of death in all cases of this offense should be the inexorable policy; secondly, whether, if not, these particular cases showed sufficient extenuating circumstances; and, thirdly, whether the cases were fairly and fully tried to get at the facts.

Upon the first question, it is enough here to say that Gen. Pershing especially urged the importance of adopting this policy for the protection of his Army's welfare; and his chief law officer concurred in this message; and that under such circumstances no one could have been criticized for acceding to this urgent request and adhering to the principle handed down by all the fixed traditions of military law. I myself, as you know, was at first disposed to defer to the urgent recommendation of Gen. Pershing; but continued reflection caused me to withdraw from that extreme view; and some days before the case was presented for your final action the record contained a recommendation from me pointing in the direction of clemency.

Upon the second question it can be stated that, except for the youth of the offenders (they were about 20 years of age), there were no special extenuating circumstances. The task laid upon these soldiers was no greater in its exactions that was laid upon hundreds of others at the very same moment in the allied forces doing duty in the trenches. The chief of staff's memorandum states the situation with great force:

"The American Expeditionary Force is confronted by the most alert and dangerous foe known in the history of the world. The safety not only of the sentinel's company, but of the entire command, is absolutely dependent on the vigilant performance of his duties as a sentinel. The safety of that command depends in an equal measure upon the prompt and complete obedience of the different men to the lawful commands of their superior officers. There is no doubt but that the members of this court had had the necessity for the alert performance of the duties of a sentinel strongly impressed upon them at the immediate time of the commission of those offenses. Before daylight on the morning of November 3, 1917, the first attack by the Germans upon the American lines took place. A salient near Artois, which was occupied by Company F of the Sixteenth Infantry, was raided by the Germans, who killed 3 of our men, wounded 11, and captured and carried off 11 more. The very next night—that is, the night of November 3–4, 1917—Pvt. Sebastian was found sleeping on his post, and on the night of the 5th Pvt. Cook was found sleeping on his post. Both of these men belonged to the regiment which had suffered in the German raid of 2d–3d. This condition of affairs presented an absolute menace not only to that portion of the line held by the American troops, but to the French troops in the adjacent sectors."

That the decision to exercise clemency was a sound one I do not doubt. But no candid reader of the record could look upon these cases as anything but a distressing instance of the inevitable mental conflict that arises between the stern necessities of war discipline and the natural human sympathy for men who have incurred the death penalty, a conflict which equally agitates every civil judge and every civil executive when such a case is presented for his action. It is unconscionable that this situation should be cited as a pecularity of the military system.

The third question—whether the case was fairly and fully tried so as to present all the facts—would require too extended a survey for giving all the details here. I content myself with assuring you (what you, indeed, know already) that the record was scrutinized by several of the most experienced judge advocates of my staff as well as by myself personally, and that, although the cases were not tried as thoroughly as they could and should have been tried, where the death penalty was involved, nevertheless no reversible error was found and there was no doubt of the facts in either case. The only issue in this case was the severity of the sentence as above mentioned.

9. The writer also cites, in the same connection, two other cases coming at the same time from France; in these the death sentence was imposed for refusal to drill. The circumstances indicated an obstinacy amounting to aggravation. But it was decided by you that clemency should be exercised to the extent of commuting the sentences to three years' penal servitude. And as the writer of the article in question makes no tangible criticisms, but merely couples these cases with the foregoing two, I pass them over.

It should be noted, however, as a sample of the writer's unfair presentation, that he is incorrect, in point of fact, in asserting that "upon their plea (of guilty) alone these two men were sentenced to death." Both men were tried upon testimony adduced by the prosecution after their plea of guilty was entered; both men declined to call any witnesses in denial or in extenuation. The scantiness of the record, however, was of itself sufficient ground for exercising clemency.

10. The remaining case cited in the newspaper article read into the RECORD by Mr. SIEGEL is that known as the "Texas mutineers'" case (record No. 106663, tried at Fort Bliss, Tex., Sept., 1917). The criticism made upon this case is that certain sergeants, having been ordered under arrest by a young officer for a very minor offense, were afterwards, while still under arrest, directed to drill; but as the Army Regulations, properly construed, do not authorize noncommissioned officers to be required to attend drill formations while under arrest, the sergeants declined to drill as ordered. For this disobedience they were found guilty of mutiny and sentenced to dishonorable discharge and imprisonment for terms of between 10 and 25 years.

Now, it may be at once and unreservedly admitted that this was a genuine case of injustice, and that the injustice was due to an overstrict attitude of military officers toward discipline, for it is conceded by all that the young officer who gave the order to drill was both tactless and unjustified in his conduct, and it is conceded that the commanding officer who reviewed and approved the sentence was a Regular Army officer of long experience who failed to appreciate the justice of the situation. That this case illustrates the occasional possibility of the military spirit of discipline overshadowing the sense of law and justice is plain enough. But that it indicates any general condition can not for a moment be asserted.

Moreover, this very case serves also to illustrate the essentially law-enforcing spirit which dominates in the office of the Judge Advocate General. The impropriety and illegality of the sentence in this case was immediately recognized when the record arrived in the office for review. One opinion was prepared pointing out the irregularity and injustice, and directing that the findings be set aside. But the legality of such a direction was questioned, in the fact of a ruling by the Attorney General of the United States many years ago that a sentence of court-martial, once executed, can not be set aside even by the President himself. This raised the general question of the authority of the Judge Advocate General not merely to recommend for clemency (which would not have been an adequate redress for the convicted men in this case), but to direct the setting aside of the findings in a judgment of a court-martial for legal error where the sentence had been already executed (namely, in this case, the sentence of dishonorable discharge). The Secretary of War having sustained the doubt as to the authority of the Judge Advocate General to take such radical action, clemency was extended by the President releasing the men from confinement and restoring them to duty within about two months from the date of their conviction. At the same time a new measure was adopted by the Secretary of War in the shape of General Order No. 7, War Department, 1918, taking effect February 1, 1918, which prevented the recurrence of such instances by directing that the commanding general, upon confirming a sentence of death or officer's dismissal or dishonorable discharge should suspend the execution of the sentence pending a review of the case in the office of the Judge Advocate General. Thus immediate measures were taken to go as far as could be gone under the law, as conceded on all hands, to prevent the recurrence of the situation presented in the Texas mutiny case.

Meanwhile, in order to make more ample and unquestioned the authority of the Judge Advocate General over court-martial trials in matters of legal error, a bill amending the Federal statutes was drafted and was sent on January 19, 1918, by the Secretary of War to the chairmen of the Senate and House Military Affairs Committees. Subsequently the Judge Advocate General testified at some length before the House Military Committee in support of this bill. During the year that has elapsed since the dispatch of that proposed amendment neither the Senate nor the House committee has seen fit to take action upon the proposed legislation. It is therefore apparent that, to the extent that there may exist to-day any doubt as to the amplitude of the authority to reach out and control these legal errors occurring in court-martial proceedings and to the extent that it may be desirable to amplify that authority beyond present terms of the law, the responsibility for failure to take such action is to be laid not at the door of the Judge Advocate General's office, but at the door of the Military Affairs Committees of Congress.

II. General principles and methods in military justice.

Assembling the various criticisms of a general nature contained in Senator CHAMBERLAIN'S remarks, they seem to be reducible to the following six heads:

1. That a soldier may be put on trial by a commanding officer's arbitrary discretion without any preliminary inquiry into the probability of the charge.

2. That commanding officers do thus put on trial a needlessly large number of trivial charges.

3. That the courts-martial themselves, as a rule, impose sentences which are excessively severe and inequitably variant.

4. That the Judge Advocate General's office either partakes in the same attitude or makes no attempt to check it by revisory action.

5. That such attempts as the Judge Advocate General's office does make are fruitless, because its rulings are recommendatory only and are either ignored by the division commanders or vetoed by the chief of staff.

6. That the general treatment of accused soldiers is not according to the rigid limitations of law as embodied in the criminal code, but is according to the arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer in each case.

It is my belief that the candid study of the facts will show that all six of these assertions are incorrect as representing the general conditions and apart from occasional individual cases. But before setting forth the recorded facts bearing upon the correctness of the above six assertions, some general features should be kept in mind as positive features of protection for the accused, possessed by military justice, and wholly or substantially lacking in civil justice.

(a) In military justice there is automatically a double examination of every serious case in the nature of appellate or revisory action by superior and supreme authority. This is in sharp contrast to civil justice, where there is no appellate or revisory action unless the accused insists on it. Every soldier is assured of this double safeguard against illegal or unfair condemnation. The proceedings, except in case of inferior courts, are taken down verbatim, and every word of the testimony, every ruling of the court, and every claim of the counsel is submitted first to the reviewing authority in the field and next to the revisory authority at Washington. The reviewing authority has for his legal adviser a commissioned judge advocate of the rank of major or lieutenant colonel, and since September, 1917, almost all of these have been lawyers of high standing, fresh from civil life, and imbued with the standards and traditions of civil practice rather than those of the Regular Army; hence likely to give fully as careful scrutiny as any civilian judge would give. On arriving at Washington for the second scrutiny, the records go to a staff composed 95 per cent of officers fresh from civilian life, ranking major to colonel. The record goes first for scrutiny to a single officer of the military justice division, who prepares a full summary and recommendation; then to a board of review of three officers, who approve or modify the recommendation; then to the chief of division, who again scrutinizes and approves or modifies; and finally to the Judge Advocate General or Acting Judge Advocate General, who appends his signature if satisfied. Every general court-martial case thus obtains this thorough scrutiny in two separate stages, or virtually four distinct stages. No such guaranties exist in any civilian court of the United States or probably of the world.

(b) Every military sentence as to period of confinement is virtually indeterminate, i. e., it has no minimum, and it can later be reduced to a few months or nothing. After a prisoner's sentence is affirmed he is entitled to ask for clemency every six months. Such application is forwarded automatically by the prison superintendent to Washington and comes to the Judge Advocate General's office for recommendation. The whole record is then again reviewed. How extensively this method results in commuting sentences will be shown later. The clemency section of the Judge Advocate General's office automatically acts on all such applications. Thus there is a further opportunity for correcting possible errors.

(c) The foregoing safeguards are applied without any expense to the accused. Here again is a feature wholly unknown to civilian justice. Reformers have for generations urged that civilian justice give to accused persons the fullest benefit of appellate revision without cost. They have never succeeded. But military justice already possesses this beneficent feature.

In examining the system of military justice, therefore, to see whether it permits results and methods contrasting unfavorably with our notions of civilian justice, let it be kept in mind from the outset that the American system of military justice starts with three great safeguards which are lacking in civilian justice, viz, an automatic double appellate review of every case before sentence is executed, a virtually automatic third review after sentence, and the application of these safeguards without reference to the accused's ability to raise money to pay for them.

I now take up the supposed general shortcomings alleged in Senator CHAMBERLAIN'S remarks:

1. PUTTING ON TRIAL WITHOUT PRELIMINARY INQUIRY.

Every system of penal justice has some method of insuring the exercise of caution by a responsible officer in scrutinizing an accusation before an accused is put to the necessity of defending himself by a formal trial. The traditional method inherited by us in civilian justice, for serious offenses, is the presentment of a grand jury. This method has now proved cumbrous and ineffective; it has been abandoned in a majority of our States. The modern method of those States is a so-called information by the official State prosecutor, filed after such inquiry as he sees fit to make. This modern method is the one to which France and other continental nations arrived some centuries ago, about the time when England developed the grand jury instead. This modern American method is also the one used in our courts-martial; it arrived in the Anglo-American military system some centuries ago by adoption from Scotland, which itself had adopted the French system; for the French were the great military nation of three centuries ago.

By this Anglo-American military system some officer must file charges before any soldier can be tried. This protection is invariable. Often the judge advocate, as legal adviser, additionally scrutinizes a serious charge before it is filed. This is exactly the protection given by the State official prosecutor in the modern American method. How essential and thorough is this protection can only be appreciated by perusing the strict terms of the law and regulations. Paragraph 62 of the Manual for Courts-Martial reads:

"By the usage of the service all military charges should be formally preferred by—that is, authenticated by the signature of—a commissioned officer."

Paragraph 75 reads:

"Submission of charges: All charges for trial by court-martial will be prepared in triplicate, using the prescribed charge sheet as a first sheet and using such additional sheets of ordinary paper as are required. They will be accompanied—

"(a) Except when trial is to be had by summary court, by a brief statement of the substance of all material testimony expected from each material witness, both those for the prosecution and those for the defense, together with all available and necessary information as to any other actual or probable testimony or evidence in the case; and

"(b) In the case of a soldier, by properly authenticated evidence of convictions, if any, of an offense or offenses committed by him during his current enlistment and within one year next preceding the date of the alleged commission by him of any offenses set forth in the charges.

"They will be forwarded by the officer preferring them to the officer immediately exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs, and will by him and by each superior commander into whose hands they may come either be referred to a court-martial within his jurisdiction for trial, forwarded to the next superior authority exercising court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs or pertains, or otherwise disposed of as circumstances may appear to require."

Paragraph 76 proceeds:

"Investigation of charges: If the officer immediately exercising summary court-martial jurisdiction over the command to which the accused belongs or pertains decides to forward the charges to superior authority, he will, before so doing, either carefully investigate them himself or will cause an officer other than the officer preferring the charges to investigate them carefully and to report to him, orally or otherwise, the result of such investigation. The officer investigating the charges will afford to the accused an opportunity to make any statement, offer any evidence, or present any matter in extenuation that he may desire to have considered in connection with the accusation against him. (See par. 225 (b), p. 112.) If the accused desires to submit nothing, the indorsement will so state. In his indorsement forwarding the charges to superior authority, the commanding officer will include: (a) The name of the officer who investigated the charges; (b) the opinion of both such officer and himself as to whether the several charges can be sustained; (c) the substance of such material statement, if any, as the accused may have voluntarily made in connection with the case during the investigation thereof; (d) a summary of the extenuating circumstances, if any, connected with the case; (e) his recommendation of action to be taken."

It will therefore be seen that the regulations require the strictest scrutiny by a responsible officer before any accused can be put on trial by a court-martial.

In Senator CHAMBERLAIN'S remarks occurs the following sentence: "The commanding officer may, without any investigation of the circumstances, order a man tried by court-martial; in the French Army such cases are not sent to trial until investigation can determine whether the man ought to be tried." How is it possible for such an assertion to be made in the face of the law and regulations represented in the quotation above from paragraph 76 of the manual? The safeguard contained in our manual of military justice stands on exactly the same footing with the safeguard contained in the modern method of the State prosecutor and of the French system as cited by Senator CHAMBERLAIN.

But whatever may be the law and the regulations, doubtless it may be asserted that the regulation is not obeyed in spirit. This is, in fact, the precise assertion of Senator CHAMBERLAIN in a further paragraph of his remarks; and to that assertion I now come.

2. EXCESSIVELY LARGE NUMBER OF TRIVIAL CHARGES.

It is asserted by Senator CHAMBERLAIN that commanding officers direct the filing of trivial charges in excessively large numbers. His precise language is: "It is not surprising, under the circumstances, that there are too many trivial cases sent to trial by court-martial."

Let us examine this assertion in the light of the facts of military justice during the past year, as shown by the records.

The United States military forces raised up to November 11, 1918, numbered some 4,185,000; of these about 290,000 were already in service at the opening of the war, of whom 127,000 were in the Regular Army. Thus over 90 per cent were new men, fresh from civilian life. It must be taken for certain that their unfamiliarity with military discipline and the novelty of its rigid restraints would produce an unusual proportion of minor breaches of discipline. In other words, if commanding officers had been merely as strict and rigorous as with the Regular Army before the war in pursuing minor breaches of discipline with court-martial charges, the ratio of trials would be at least as great and presumably far greater than before the war and the accession of the new Army.

But the facts show, on the contrary, that commanding officers must have been far less strict and rigorous than before.

Let us take first the serious charges brought before general courts-martial. The printed report of the Judge Advocate General for the fiscal year 1918 shows that the total number of general court-martial trials in the Regular Army of 127,000 in the year ending June, 1917, was 6,200, or about 1 for every 20 men; while the total in the entire Army for the year ending June, 1918, was less than 12,000, or only 1 for every 200 men (the military forces on May 31 numbering 2,415,000); and during the last six months of 1918 the total was 7,624, or at the rate per annum of only 1 for every 275 men (the military forces on Nov. 11, 1918, numbering 4,185,000). As to special courts-martial for the lesser offenses the number in the Regular Army for the year ending June, 1917, was 2,970, or 1 for every 42 men, while for the year ending June, 1918, it was 14,700, or only 1 for every 165 men. Moreover, as between the Regular Army and National Guard and the National Army or new drafted men, the number of general courts-martial for the year ending June, 1918, was 10,363 for the former and only 1,660 for the latter, or 1 for every 107 men in the Regular Army and National Guard (numbering on May 31, 1918, some 1,112,000, and composed in part of seasoned men), but only 1 in every 800 men for the National Army (numbering on May 31, 1918, some 1,333,000, and composed entirely of new drafted men), showing conclusively that commanding officers were more lenient and liberal with the men fresh from civilian life.

Turning now to the "trivial offenses" referred to by Senator CHAMBERLAIN, they are covered by the summary courts-martial, representing the extremely petty disciplinary penalties not requiring a review by the division commander. The number of trials for the Regular Army, viz, 48,000 in 1917 (rising from an average of 38,000 for 10 years past, due to a proportionate increase in the size of the Regular Army), rose in the year ending June, 1918, to only 212,000, or slightly more than four times the number, although the entire military forces in the year ending June, 1918, rose to 2,415,000, or nineteen times the former size. In short, the petty disciplinary penalties dropped from a ratio of 1 to each 2.7 men to a ratio of 1 to each 11.4 men, or a decrease for 1918 to less than one-quarter of that of 1917.

There could be no more conclusive demonstration that commanding officers, though faced with a situation full of inducement to rigor in enforcing discipline among raw and untrained men, did, in fact, use remarkable consideration and self-restraint in not resorting to the instrumentalities of courts-martial. The facts show, therefore, precisely the opposite of the condition asserted by Senator CHAMBERLAIN.

3. SEVERITY AND VARIABILITY OF SENTENCES BY COURTS-MARTIAL.

The severity and variability of the sentences are two distinct features, and I shall therefore take them up separately, and under each of the two heads I shall further set forth the facts according to the respective offenses, because there can hardly be a common standard of either severity or variability for all offenses. In order to abridge my presentation I have taken the nine most common military offenses. In the tables of figures appended to this letter will be found the detailed data, to which I shall refer in the text of my letter.

(1) Severity of sentences: In considering the severity of sentences it is, of course, necessary to examine separately the different offenses, since obviously the appropriate punishment varies widely for offenses of different moral culpability and different danger to military discipline.

(a) Desertion: No one can approach the subject of sentences for desertion in time of war without keeping in mind the solemn and terrible warning recorded expressly for our benefit by Brig. Gen Oakes, acting assistant provost marshal general for Illinois, as set forth in his report printed in the Report of the Provost Marshal General for the Civil War (pt. 2, p. 29). In impressive language he lays the following injunction upon us:

"Incalculable evil has resulted from the clemency of the Government toward deserters. By a merciful severity at the commencement of the war the mischief might have been nipped in the bud and the crime of desertion could never have reached the gigantic proportions which it attained before the close of the conflict. The people were then ardent and enthusiastic in their loyalty and would have cheerfully and cordially assented to any measures deemed necessary to the strength and integrity of the Army. They had heard of the Rules and Articles of War, and were fully prepared to see * * * that deserters from the Army would be remorselessly arrested, tried by court-martial, and, if guilty, be forthwith shot to death with musketry.

"This was unquestionably the almost universal attitude of the public mind when hostilities began, and the just expectations of the people should not have been disappointed. Arrest, trial, and execution should have been the short, sharp, and decisive fate of the first deserters. * * * The Government was far behind the people in this matter, and so continued until long and certain immunity had thrown such swarms of deserters and desperadoes into every State that it was then too late to avert the calamity. * * * I state these things so that if we have another war the Government may start right—put deserters to death, enforce military law, strike hard blows at the outset, tone up the national mind at once to a realization that war is war, and be sure that such a policy will be indorsed and sustained by the people.

"There are other suggestions to be made in respect to deserters, but the one I have already advanced—the nonenforcement of the penalties provided by the military code for the crime of desertion, especially at the beginning—is, beyond all question, the grand fundamental cause of the unparalleled increase of that crime and of the inability of district provost marshals, with their whole force of special agents and detectives, to rid the country of deserters."

This solemn warning was naturally in our minds at the opening of the present war. But, in spite of its urgency, it was decided to exhibit our faith in the American people and to place our trust in that loyalty and devotion to duty which we felt sure would characterize the vast majority of to-day's young American manhood. We believed that the "short, sharp, and decisive fate of the first deserters" should not be the extreme penalty as urged by Gen. Oakes. And the view was generally accepted in the Army that terms of imprisonment should be ordinarily deemed the adequate repressive measure for the few who might need it. And it is a fact that of the 2,025 convictions covered by the figures shown in Table A there is not a single sentence of death for desertion.

It must, therefore, be kept in mind at the outset that the refusal to adopt the policy of death sentences for desertion was in itself a repudiation of the policy of extreme severity, and that the practice of limiting desertion sentences to terms of imprisonment is in itself the adoption of a policy of leniency. There may be a reproach for variability; but reproach for severity must deal with the fact that the policy adopted disregarded the extreme penalty authorized by Congress.

Turning, then, to the recorded facts, we find (Table A) that the total number of convictions for desertions for the year October, 1917–September, 1918, was 2,025; that the average sentence was 7.58 years; that nearly 24 per cent of these sentences were for less than 2 years; that 64 per cent were for less than 10 years; and that only 35.90 per cent were for a greater period than 10 years. The article of war reads: "Any person who deserts shall, if the offense be committed in time of war, suffer death, or such other punishment as the court-martial may direct." It would seem, therefore, that in point of severity the result of court-martial sentences for desertion can not be charged with erring on the side of severity.

You will notice that I do not here attempt to account for the justice of individual cases. Certain of the sentences for 25 years or even for lesser periods are open to criticism as excessively severe under the circumstances of the individual case. But it must be kept in mind that these trials and sentences were found legally valid by the Judge Advocate General's office; that the only issue of doubt that could arise concerns the quantum of the sentence; and that the scrutiny of the clemency section in the Military Justice Division of the office may be relied upon to detect cases of excessive severity before any substantial portion of such a sentence has been served. Indeed, by the plan already this month sanctioned by yourself and announced to the public, there is now proceeding a general revision of sentences which will include in its scope the majority of all sentences, and not merely the excessively severe ones. But the excessive severity of an individual sentence is not the question here; that question would call for the scrutiny of the particular case. The question here is of general conditions. What the above figures show in respect to general conditions, or the trend of conditions, is that the practice has been one of relatively moderate penalties instead of the severest one permissible under the law.

(b) Absence without leave (Table A, No. 2): Absence without leave is an offense which represents, in many instances, cases of actual desertion; but, owing to the movements of the military unit and thus the difficulty of obtaining the necessary technical proof, the actual deserter is frequently convicted of no more than an absence without leave. It is, therefore, plain that the offense of absence without leave may, upon its circumstances, merit an extremely severe penalty, equal to that of desertion. In time of war this offense may lawfully be punished by any penalty short of death; in time of peace a presidential order limits the maximum penalty to six months' confinement.

For the year ending September, 1918, the total convictions for this offense numbered 3,362; the average sentence was 1.59 years (or only three times the small maximum allowed in peace times); 11 per cent of the offenses received no penalty or imprisonment; 67 per cent received a sentence of less than 2 years imprisonment; and only 22 per cent received a penalty of more than 2 years in prison. When it is remembered, as above pointed out, that this offense is in many cases virtually the offense of an actual deserter, it will be seen that the number of the sentences over two years may not be disproportionate to the probable ratio of cases individually calling for the higher penalties. An average of 1.58 years for this offense, committed in time of war, can not be deemed an exhibition of severity, where, in fact, the act of Congress establishing the Articles of War leaves the court-martial absolutely untrammeled (short of the death sentence) in the penalty to be fixed to this offense.

(c) Sleeping on post (Table A, No. 3): The offense of sleeping on post is punishable by death in time of war, and in time of peace "any punishment except death that a court-martial may direct." There were two sentences of death imposed by courts-martial in France for sleeping on post in the zone of operations and in the front-line trenches; those two individual cases I have already commented on in the first part of this letter. Of the whole 609 convictions, some 575 of the offenses took place in the United States, where it may be supposed that the highest penalty suitable for forces engaged with the enemy would hardly be applicable. And it is a fact that of the entire 575 there was only one sentence over 15 years and only four sentences over 10 years. For 10 per cent of the sentences no imprisonment at all was prescribed; for 62.40 per cent of the sentences, the period imposed was less than 2 years; and all told, only 27.42 per cent of the sentences were for more than two years. Having in view the maximum provisions of the Articles of War, it seems plain that the treatment of this offense by courts-martial can scarcely be called a harsh one.

(d) Assaulting a superior officer (Table A, No. 4). The offense of assaulting an officer is punishable, under the Articles of War, by "Death or such other punishment as the court-martial might direct"; and this irrespective of a state of war or of peace. The total convictions for this offense were only 31, giving an average sentence of 4.10 years; nearly 50 per cent of them being for a period of less than 2 years. Again, one may say that in the face of the capital punishment expressly authorized as a maximum by the Articles of War, courts-martial have not followed a practice which may be characterized as harsh or severe.

(e) Assaulting a noncommissioned officer (Table A, No. 5). The offense of assaulting a noncommissioned officer is liable to "any punishment that the court-martial may direct"; and this irrespective of a state of peace or war. The total number of such convictions was 132; the average sentence was 2.36 years; more than 6 per cent were punished without imprisonment, and more than 57 per cent were punished by imprisonment of less than 2 years. There are half a dozen sentences for upward of 10 years; the justification for these must rest upon their individual circumstances. But the average sentence of 2.36 years, compared with the maximum allowable under the Articles of War, can not be admitted to exhibit a general disposition to severity, but quite the contrary.

(f) Disobeying a noncommissioned officer (Table A, No. 6). The disobedience of the lawful order of a noncommissioned officer is by the Articles of War placed under the same penalty as the assaulting of a noncommissioned officer, that is, the court-martial has complete discretion in choosing the penalties, except that of death. The total number of convictions was 411, and the average sentence was 3.04 years; 8.27 per cent of sentences gave no period of imprisonment; 50 per cent gave a period of less than 2 years.

In itself, this average sentence, comparing it with the maximum allowed by the Articles of War, can not be referred to as a severe one. It is notable, however, that this offense of disobeying a noncommissioned officer, received a higher average of sentence, viz, 3.04 years, than the apparently more heinous one of assaulting a noncommissioned officer, viz, 2.36 years. It may be admitted that some explanation remains to be sought for this apparently anomalous result, but it can be pointed out here that the disobedience of a noncommissioned officer is often of a deliberate character, making the offense a highly serious one, whereas the offense of assaulting an officer is often the result merely of a quick temper without any deliberate intention of resistance to authority, and that it thus deserves considerate attention by the tribunal.

(g) Mutiny (Table A, No. 7). There were 51 convictions for mutiny; the average sentence was 7.93 years; 27 per cent fell between 2 and 3 years, and 43 per cent fell between 10 to 15 years; the other sentences scattering over the various percentages. The Articles of War provide that a person guilty of mutiny "shall suffer death or such other punishment as the court-martial may direct," irrespective of a state of peace or war. When committed in its most significant form, it is, of course, the most heinous offense of a soldier. But it may also be committed under much less culpable circumstances. In short, it gives an opportunity for the widest range of discretion in the imposition of sentences. This inherent quality is reflected in the wide range of sentences actually imposed. In view of the fact that, in an army numbering more than 3,000,000 men at the time covered by these records, there were only 51 offenses in the nature of mutiny or related thereto, out of a total number of offenses of 12,472, it is plain that the number of such convictions is extremely small; and it must be inferred that the commanding officers were not seeking relentlessly for offenses that could be characterized as mutiny, and that the offenses actually characterized as such were offenses which well deserved the name. From June, 1917, to June, 1918, when the Regular Army and National Guard together consisted of less than 300,000 men, the total number of convictions for mutiny was 43; and yet with an Army of 10 times the size, the number of convictions for mutiny increased only one-fifth. It seems obvious that the practice of courts-martial during the year of the war could hardly justify a reproach of severity for the offense of mutiny.

(h) Disobeying standing orders (Table A, No. 8): This offense is punishable under the Articles of War by such sentence of imprisonment as the court-martial may direct. The total number of convictions for this offense was 208; the average sentence is 1.96 years; for 12 per cent of the sentences no period of confinement was imposed; for 60.58 per cent a confinement of less than 2 years was imposed; 10.58 per cent of sentences were between 5 and 10 years; the rest scattering in other periods. In view of the maximum limit permitted to the discretion of the court under the Articles of War, and in view of the variety of circumstances effecting the nature of this offense, it can not be said that the tendency of the courts has been to severity.

(i) Disobeying an officer (Table A, No. 9): The offense of disobeying a superior officer is punishable, under the Articles of War, by "death or such other punishment as the court-martial may direct"; it is covered by the same article of war that deals with assault on a superior officer, but obviously it should usually rank as an offense of lower grade. The total number of convictions for this offense was 785; the average sentence was for 4.34 years; 6 per cent of sentences were punished by imprisonment; 43.69 were punished by confinement of less than 2 years; and a trifle over 50 per cent were punished by some period greater than 2 years, there being 1 death sentence and 18 sentences for 25 years or more. It will be noticed that the average sentence for this offense was almost identical with the average sentence for the offense (No. 4 above) of assaulting a superior officer, and that in both cases a little less than 50 per cent of sentences were for periods of confinement less than 2 years. But these two offenses were treated differently with respect to the sentences for higher periods; the bulk of the long-term sentences for assaulting an officer lying between 5 and 10 years, while for the offense of disobeying an officer, they were spread out over the periods between 3 years and 25 years or more. Comparing the absolutely unlimited nature of the punishment permitted by the Articles of War to be imposed by the court-martial, and observing that 50 per cent of these sentences were for periods of under 2 years, it can not be that the tribunals appear to be seeking to exercise the maximum of severity allowable, but rather the contrary.

This completes my survey of the sentences for the nine principal military sentences.

In the foregoing comments it will be noticed that, since a charge of excessive severity implies the habitual resort to a maximum standard allowable under the law, the standard here to be taken must of necessity be the standard set by the Articles of War as adopted by the act of Congress. Judging by this standard, the practices of the court-martial, to any candid observer, must be vindicated from the charge of the habitual employment of severity; rather have they proceeded in a direction of a lenient use of their discretion.

But the mind naturally seeks to test this issue of severity by any other accepted standard that may be available, apart from the intangible standards of individual notions. There appear to be two and only two such other standards available. One is the standard to be gathered from former practice in the Army; the other is the standard to be gathered from civil courts. Neither of these is entirely appropriate; but it is my duty to see what light can be thrown by them upon the present subject.

(A) Former practices of courts-martial: Unfortunately the records available in the printed reports of former years are but scanty in their application to the present purpose. No data as to the length of sentences have been published in the former reports of my office, except in the report for the fiscal year 1917–18, and then only for the offense of desertion. Taking these data for such light as they may give us (Table XIV, page 31, Report of the Judge Advocate General, 1918), we find that the length of sentence did increase gradually during that year. The figures are as follows:

Desertion.

Month.	Convictions.	Total months' confinement given as part of the sentence.	Average months' confinement (total months' confinements divided by sentences imposed).
1917.
May	3	48	15
June	8	276	34.5
July	17	560	52.9
August	27	540	22.5
September	44	1,604.75	38.21
October	56	2,521.75	45.85
November	52	1,863	36.53
December	93	5,153	57.26
1918.
January	203	9,057	48.43
February	202	8,925	50.14
March	202	13,088.75	69.25
April	228	16,906	79.75
May	194	19,109	99.53
June	224	24,399	112.96
Total	1,553	104,051.25	71.02

It will thus be seen that the average sentence for the year ending June, 1918, was almost exactly six years, as compared with an average of 7.58 years for the period October 1, 1917, to September 31, 1918, and that the average of six years for the period May, 1917–June, 1918, started at between two and three years for the first seven months of the war, and then rose steadily until it was reaching nine years in the fifteenth month of the war.

I do not pretend to be able to interpret the significance of this gradual rise in the average length of sentence for the offense of desertion. So many conditions are involved that any one of several hypotheses may account for the circumstance. I content myself with pointing out, as a possible explanation, the principles already quoted from Brig. Gen. Oakes in his report on desertion in the Civil War, viz, it is quite possible that the military tribunals began with an extremely low penalty, but that as the training of the new forces proceeded in camps a general impression obtained that the protection of the Army against the spread of desertion required a somewhat more stringent penalty.

As to any other offenses than desertion, and as to any periods prior to June, 1917, it is not now feasible to ascertain what were the standards of courts-martial sentences in peace-time practices. But inasmuch as a condition of war transforms the whole situation for military discipline and puts into effect the strictest standards of military behavior, it is not possible to presume that the sentence length imposed in former peace-time practice would afford a suitable standard for comparison with war-time practice.

(B) Standard gathered from civil courts: Here it will be necessary to depart from the list of principal military offenses, which have no counterpart in the civil courts, and to resort to the principal civil offenses represented in the military records. The criminal statistics of the United States are but imperfectly organized for study, and the only available record for the present purpose that could be found, after extensive search, in the report of the Director of the Census for 1910, entitled "Prisoners and juvenile delinquents in the United States." Table 42, at page 64, sets forth the variance in periods of sentences imposed for the various civil offenses. Setting these side by side with the sentences imposed for the corresponding offenses by military courts during the year ending September, 1918, the result is shown in the following Table I.

In the above table the percentages are the significant items. On the whole, it appears that the percentage of long sentences is greater in the military courts than in the civil courts. For example, in the offense of forgery the sentences of 10 years and over were 15.7 per cent of all sentences, while in the civil courts they were only 3.3 per cent; the sentences for 5 to 9 years were 28.3 per cent, while in the civil courts they were only 11.3 per cent.

But this general trend is marked by so many exceptions that it is hardly open to any general conclusions. For example, in perjury the military court gave a sentence of under one year for 64.3 per cent of the cases, while the civil court gave its lowest sentence in only 28.9 per cent of the cases. Similarly for burglary the military court gave its lowest sentence in a larger percentage of cases than did the civil court. So, too, turning to the highest sentence it appears that murder and manslaughter received less severity of sentence in the military courts than in the civil courts; for murder only 41.7 per cent were sentenced in military courts to the death penalty or life imprisonment, while in the civil courts 86.9 per cent received such penalty; and similarly for manslaughter the percentages of sentence of life imprisonment or imprisonment of 10 years or over or imprisonment from 5 to 9 years were only about half as large as the percentages of the same sentences in the civil courts.

Moreover, it must also be remembered that the moral heinouness and danger of even these civil offenses, common to both codes, varies more or less in military life and civil life. Larceny, for example, which to the civilian mind never receives the deepest measure of reprobation among property offenses, has long been deemed throughout the rank and file of the Army as an intolerable offense, for the safety and mutual confidence of military intimacy as fellow soldiers becomes impossible unless every soldier can be assured that his few and precious belongings can be safely left unguarded in his restricted quarters. In those sections of our country where the horse has always been indispensable to every man's daily occupation, the offense of horse stealing is visited with penalties which seem grossly severe to the residents of other communities; indeed, so far has this principle been carried that in one Southwestern State noted for its splendid horses the law (unless it has been recently changed) permits the owner of a horse to shoot the horse thief while in the act of running away with the property, a privilege not accorded by the law of any other State. It is undoubtedly due to this sentiment that in the table above the offense of larceny is found to be visited with sentences of more than two years in percentages considerably in excess of the percentages found in the sentences of civil courts.

I mention the foregoing instances only as a preface to the general suggestion that the use of longer terms of sentences in military courts than in civil courts for some of the above civil offenses may well be explained by the exigencies of internal military life and by the habitual standards of military conduct known to all soldiers, rather than by any disposition on the part of military tribunals to impose heavier sentences for offenses of an identical nature.

I close this part of my letter, therefore, by noting that the general practices of courts-martial, judged by the maximum sentences allowable by the military code, must be deemed not to merit the charge of excessive severity and that, in my own opinion, they rather merit the opposite characterization.

This general condition of things, however, I repeat, must, of course, be sharply discriminated from the question of the excessive severity of a particular sentence measured in the light of the circumstances of the individual case. That is a question totally irrelevant to the judgment to be passed upon the propriety of the practices of courts-martial in general, as judged by their average treatment of the offenses coming before them.

(2) Variability of sentence: When we come to the question of variability of sentences we reach a subject which has been the fertile field for complaint and criticism in civil courts for a century past. It is notorious that the independent judgment of different courts and of different juries seems to be characterized by the most erratic and whimsical variety. Such has been the constant burden of complaint in civil justice, and it can hardly be hoped that military justice could escape a similar complaint in some degree. On the other hand, it must always be remembered that here the individual circumstances vary so widely that a variation of sentences is perfectly natural, and that the more variation of figures in itself signifies very little, where the individual circumstances remain totally unknown to the critic. Nevertheless, a variability of sentences for the same offense is something which naturally excites attention and caution, and it should be the object of appellate authorities to equalize the penalties for the same offense where no obvious reason for substantial difference is found. How far the revisory authority of the Judge Advocate General and the clemency powers of the Secretary of War have been effectual to secure such equalization will be noted later in this letter. At the present the inquiry of fact is whether there has been such variability and at what points it has taken place.

Table A, above referred to and annexed to this letter, summarizes for the nine principal military offenses the variance of the sentences; first, by months of the year covered; and, secondly, by jurisdictional areas from which the court-martial records come up for revision. In summary of these variances, it is here to be noted that such variances obviously exist; that these variances are not in themselves any more striking than those that are found in the sentences of civil courts, as already shown in Table B; and that in seeking the possible source of these variances it appears very strikingly that there has been a slight but appreciable increase in the number of higher-period sentences as we come down to the later months of the war; and that, so far as jurisdictional areas are concerned, there have been notable variances which seem, in some cases, to localize the higher-period sentences, for certain offenses, in certain specific areas.

As illustrating the foregoing inferences, it will be sufficient here to take the single offense of desertion. Examining it by months, it will be noticed that the long-term sentences of 10 to 15 years and of 15 to 25 years and over 25 years increase slightly in their ratio to the whole of the sentences for the month as we approach the later months of the year under examination. For example, for the months of October, 1917, to February, 1918, there were no sentences over 25 years, although the number of convictions increased from 55 to 196 (the increase, of course, being due to the much greater ratio in the increase of armed forces). But during the months of April to July, with approximately the same number of convictions, averaging 225, the number of sentences for over 25 years increased from 4 to 9, to 15, and finally to 33. Apparently, therefore, some conditions in the Army changed as the months advanced so as to induce this variance in the direction of higher-period sentences. Just what those conditions were are not even the subject of speculation without a very careful inquiry; merely the fact is here pointed out.

Again, turning to the jurisdictional areas, we find that the Central Department shows about 9 per cent of sentences for over 10 years, while the Eastern Department shows only 3 per cent; that the Twenty-eighth Division, having 21 convictions, imposed no sentences in excess of 10 years, while the Eightieth Division, with exactly the same number of convictions, imposed 14 sentences greater than 10 years.

As further indicating this variance by jurisdiction areas, a glance at the same Table A, under the offense of "absence without leave," shows that in the Twenty-eighth Division, which exhibited the above leniency for desertion, so the offense of absence without leave was given a sentence of under 2 years for 127 out of 140 convictions, while the Eightieth Division, which had shown a large majority of long-term sentences for desertion, was, on the other hand, lenient for the offense of absence without leave, imposing 16 sentences of under 2 years out of 20 convictions. Comparing again the Thirty-sixth and Thirty-ninth Divisions, with substantially the same number of convictions, viz, about 175, one finds that the former imposed about 20 sentences of above 10 years, while the other imposed 101 sentences above 10 years. This same Thirty-ninth Division had also used a majority of higher-period sentences for desertion, whereas the Thirty-sixth Division showed for desertion a record that averaged with the other divisions.

It will be seen, therefore, than in many, if not in most, cases the extreme variance may be traced to difference of practice in the different jurisdictional areas. Just what conditions existed which would justify in the individual cases, or in the general trend of cases, this variance between divisions can hardly be the subject even of hypothesis. But it must be obvious to any candid observer that there do exist wide differences of conditions, not only in the racial and educational makeup of the different camps but also in the morale and necessities of discipline prevailing in different camps. It is well known that the sentences of civil courts for civil offenses vary widely in the different States. For example, in 1910 (census report above cited, p. 50), the percentage of sentences of 10 years or over was 9.7 in the East South Central States, but was only 0.1 in the New England States; in Mississippi it was 22.51, but in California it was only 2.3. This illustration is mentioned merely to suggest that whenever one discovers that variances in sentences have a certain relation to variances in camps or divisions, the subject becomes at once too complex for hasty judgment.

Whatever may have been done or may now be contemplated as to the equalization of sentences by commutation in the way of clemency, I am only concerned here to point out the facts as they are found in the records relative to the action of the courts-martial themselves, and to note that such variances (apart from peculiar individual cases) as are revealed in any noticeable amount, seem to be due most largely to differences of conditions in the different camps, divisions, and other jurisdictional areas, and the greatest caution must be exercised before passing judgment upon such variances as inequitable, without being fully familiar with the conditions operating in those places.

I can not leave this subject without inviting attention to the enlightened tenor of the principles inculcated thoroughly upon the members of courts-martial by the manual which serves as their guide. This manual is required to be studied by all candidates for appointment as officers in the training camp, and a familiarity with its contents is required. Paragraph 342, on the adaptation of punishments, reads as follows:

"In cases where the punishment is discretionary, the best interests of the service and of society demand thoughtful application of the following principles: That because of the effect of confinement upon the soldier's self-respect, confinement is not to be ordered when the interests of the service permit it to be avoided; that a man against whom there is no evidence of previous convictions for the same or similar offenses should be punished less severely than one who has offended repeatedly; that the presence or absence of extenuating or aggravating circumstances should be taken into consideration in determining the measure of punishment in any case; that the maximum limits of punishment authorized are to be applied only in cases in which, from the nature and circumstances of the offense and the general conduct of the offender, severe punishment appears to be necessary to meet the ends of discipline; and that in adjudging punishment the court should take into consideration the individual characteristics of the accused, with a view to determining the nature of the punishment best suited to produce the desired results in the case in question, as the individual factor in one case may be such that punishment of one kind would serve the ends of discipline, while in another case punishment of a different kind would be required."

It is confidently believed that the principles thus inculcated upon members of the courts-martial will be found not to have been substantially departed from when tested by the results shown in the above figures for 1917–18.

4. ATTITUDE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S OFFICE AS TO SEVERE OR VARIABLE SENTENCES.

The distinct implication running throughout the remarks of Senator CHAMBERLAIN is that there is no central authority which can check, equalize, and correct such severity or variability as may be found to be excessive; in other words, that the Judge Advocate General's office, charged with the duty of revising these court-martial records, either acquiesces in the results of the court-martial sentences as approved by the reviewing authority of the division or department or makes no attempt to check any excesses by revisory action.

It is necessary therefore to emphasize what has been already pointed out above, that the Judge Advocate General's office scrutinizes the court-martial records for the very purpose of discovering not only errors of law or procedure but also excesses of sentence. The law section of the Military Justice Division besides scrutinizing the records for errors of law or procedure has from time to time made recommendations, when sending back the record to the reviewing authority, that the sentence be revised. But, furthermore, the clemency section of the Military Justice Division occupies itself exclusively with the scrutiny of records after the man's confinement has begun and an application for clemency has been filed.

But it is not enough to point out the existence of these powers and practices of the Judge Advocate General's office. Inquiring into the results to see what the facts show I ask: To what extent has the Judge Advocate General's office called for a reduction of sentence by recommendation of clemency to the Secretary of War?

(1) The extent of such recommendations as to number of sentences will be found by taking the total number of sentences for all offenses classified by length of term, noting the number of these sentences recommended for reduction by clemency by the Judge Advocate General's office, and then reckoning the percentage of offenses of each length thus reduced. This gives the following results:

TABLE B.—Distribution of sentence reductions by Judge Advocate General's office according to length of original sentence.

	Total sentences, by length of terms, for 9 principal military offenses, Oct. 1, 1917–Sept. 30, 1918.	Sentences recommended by Judge Advocate General's Office for reduction, 9 principal military offenses, Jan. 1–Dec. 31, 1918.
	Number.	Number.	Per cent.
Total	7,624	947	12.42
Below 2 years	3,886	330	8.49
2 to 3 years	483	174	36.02
3 to 5 years	482	135	28.00
5 to 10 years	1,064	197	18.51
10 to 15 years	626	68	10.86
15 to 25 years	373	33	8.84
25 years or more	159	10	6.28

The important thing to notice about the table is that it shows 12 per cent of the total sentences to have been reduced by clemency exercised on recommendation of the Judge Advocate General. I see no reason to doubt that this 12 per cent is ample enough to cover all the individual cases in which an excessive severity would have been apparent on the face of the record.

The above table shows the reduction in its relation to the sentences of different lengths. The table shows that the largest percentage of reduction occurred in the sentences of medium length, and that the smallest percentages of reduction occurred in the sentences of shortest and of longest periods.

This result is perfectly natural and appropriate. The shortest sentences are those in which there would be the least call for reduction by clemency on the ground of excessive severity. The longest sentences are those in which the reduction on the ground of excessive severity would presumably not bring them to an extremely low period and therefore in which the time for recommending such reduction had presumably not arrived.

(2) How much total reduction did this action effect in the total length of all the sentences acted upon? This will afford some gauge of the thoroughness of the action in the nature of clemency. Table C below shows the number of sentences recommended for reduction, the total years of the original sentences, the total years reduced on recommendation of the Judge Advocate General's office, and the net years of sentence as actually served. The figures are given for the nine principal military sentences, as well as for the total thereof.

Referring to the table for details as to the specific offenses, I will point out here merely that the total reduction effected was a reduction of 3,876 years out of an original period of 4,331 years, or a reduction of 89⅓ per cent. In other words, action of this office, in effecting reductions in the 1,147 sentences selected on their merits for reduction, cut them down to 10.50 per cent of their original amount. Presenting the same result in another form, the same table shows that the average original sentence of these 1,147 sentences was for a period of 3.78 years (or nearly four years), and that the average sentence as reduced was only 0.40 of one year, or less than five months.

These figures as to reduction effected in the length of the sentences demonstrate that the action of this office was a radical one, and must have served to eliminate the excessive severity in those sentences. That the sentences selected for such recommendations of clemency included all of the sentences meriting the term "severe," neither I nor anyone else would be in a position either to affirm or deny without a consultation of every record. But I think that it is fair to assume that the scrutiny of the officers of the Judge Advocate General's staff presumably included all of those cases in which an excessive severity was obvious on the face of the record.

5. EFFECTIVENESS OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL'S OFFICE.

But the foregoing demonstration of the extent of mitigation of severity effected by the Judge Advocate General's Office, through its recommendations, is vain and meaningless, according to Senator CHAMBERLAIN. In his remarks I find it repeatedly asserted and implied that the commanding officer of the division or department—in technical expression, the reviewing authority—is not obliged to follow and does not follow these recommendations. "Court-martial sentences found by the reviewing authorities to be null and void for want of jurisdiction," he states, "have been allowed to stand." "The military commander is not obliged either to ask for legal advice or to follow it when he has asked for it and it has been given to him by responsible law officers of the Army." "Courts-martial should be required to accept the interpretation of the law by a responsible law officer."

Here again we have arrived at a simple question of fact. There is, to be sure, a question of legal theory involved. The records of courts-martial come to the Judge Advocate General to "revise"; and what legal effect this "revision" ought to have in theory is a mooted question of law and policy on which it is needless to enter here. Suffice it to say that a difference of view exists and that the judgment expressed by the Judge Advocate General in his appellate capacity is customarily phrased in terms of a recommendation to the commander in the field. But this question, after all, like many questions of fundamental principle, may become practically irrelevant in the light of the facts. The assertion made in Senator CHAMBERLAIN'S remarks is an assertion of fact, viz, that the commanding officer does not follow the legal advice which is given him and does not accept the rulings of the responsible law officer.

On the question of fact, let the facts themselves answer.

The cases fall necessarily into two groups. One class of cases coming to the Judge Advocate General for revision under United States Revised Statutes, section 1199, the thirty-eighth article of war, and General Order No. 7, January, 1918, require and receive no other revision or approval than that given by the Judge Advocate General. The other class of cases includes all sentences of death and of dismissal of officers, which, under the forty-eighth article of war, require confirmation by the President, as well as certain other cases in which error of law has been found, but the execution of the sentence has not been suspended by the reviewing authority. The former class of records go directly back from the Judge Advocate General to the reviewing authority in the field; the latter class of cases go from the Judge Advocate General through The Adjutant General and the Chief of Staff to the Secretary of War, and sometimes to the President. The question of fact is, therefore, in what proportion of cases does purely military authority fail to give effect to these revisory rulings of the Judge Advocate General?

The results in both classes of cases are shown in the following Table D:

TABLE D.—Effect of action of Judge Advocate General's office, October, 1917, to September, 1918.

Cases recommended for modification or disapproval on legal grounds.[1]	Number of cases.	Recommendations given effect.		Recommendations not given effect.
		Number.	Per cent.	Number.	Per cent.
To reviewing authority	125	121	96.8	4	3.2
To War Department	141	135	95.7	6	4.3
Total	266	256	96.2	10	3.8

[1] Does not include a few cases in which the recommendation referred only to the place of confinement.

It thus appears that out of a total for the period covered of 266 cases recommended by the Judge Advocate General for disapproval on legal grounds, there were only 10 cases in which the Judge Advocate General's ruling was not followed; of these cases, 4 were not followed by the reviewing authority in the field, and 6 were not followed in the Secretary of War's Office.

In the light of these facts, I think I am justified in asserting that the records disclose no foundation for the assertion which Senator CHAMBERLAIN has been led to make. It is not a fact that the military commander or that any military authority proceeds to follow out the dictates of his own discretion regardless "of the interpretation of the law by a responsible law officer," nor that he fails to follow the legal advice "when he has asked for it and it has been given to him by the responsible law officers of the Army." Whatever may be the legal theory of the function now placed by statute in the Judge Advocate General as the law officer or appellate tribunal for military justice in the Army, that theory becomes virtually immaterial in the light of the facts during the period of the war. The state of things supposed by the Senator to exist, simply does not exist. Virtually the recommendations of the Judge Advocate General are given practical effect in the same manner as the trial courts in civil justice give effect to the mandate of the supreme court of the State.

6. MILITARY LAW AS DEPENDENT ON THE MILITARY COMMANDER'S DISCRETION.

But this brings me naturally to the last and most general assertion contained in the Senator's remarks, viz, that the general treatment of accused soldiers is not according to the strict limitations of law as embodied in the military penal code, but is made to depend upon the arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer in each case; or, to use the Senator's own language, "the records of the courts-martial in this war show that we have no military law or system of administering military justice which is worthy of the name of law or justice; we have simply a method of giving effect to the more or less arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer."

As a concrete demonstration of the incorrectness of this assertion, the foregoing facts, taken directly from the records of the courts-martial, appealed to by the Senator, must suffice as a principal refutation. And yet the Senator's remarks call for more than the citation of concrete facts to the contrary. I will, therefore, take the opportunity to point out briefly what general difference does exist between military justice and civil justice.

The substance of my counter assertion is that although the theory of military justice does differ slightly from the theory of civil justice, yet in substance and in practice both of them, in our inherited Anglo-American system, are fundamentally identical, in that justice is founded upon and strictly limited by the requirements and safeguards of strict rules of law.

The only kernel of correctness in the abstract statement of Senator CHAMBERLAIN is that the theory of military justice is in its general purpose somewhat different from the theory of civilian criminal justice. The contrast of theory between the two is well set forth in a statement of Gen. William T. Sherman, made 30 years ago, in discussing our Articles of War:

"The object of the civil law," he says, "is to secure to every human being in a community the maximum of liberty, security, and happiness, consistent with the safety of all. The object of military law is to govern armies composed of strong men, so as to be capable of exercising the largest measure of force at the will of the Nation."

This definition of Gen. Sherman shows that the objects to be attained are different, in that military justice aims to make the man a better soldier or to eliminate him from the military organization if he can not be improved, while civilian justice looks to the ultimate protection of the community at large.

But, once this difference of theory and purpose is conceded, the two systems proceed in identical method, viz, by the application of strict rules and regulations so drawn as to give equal and fair treatment to all men, and to protect them against mere arbitrary discretion on the one hand, and the inflexible rigor of automatic penalties on the other hand.

The former end is attained by a system of courts, procedure, and definitions of offenses, which contains the counterpart of civilian justice in virtually every respect; and which, as already noted, is superior to the civilian system in its ample provision for automatic appellate review in every case. These rules and regulations are fully set forth in the Manual for Courts-Martial; every officer is required to be familiar with this; and a new edition of 50,000 copies, revised to date, was just printed in October.

The other aim, to protect the offender from the harsh consequences of a rigid system of penalties, is secured by the method of indeterminate sentences, i. e., virtually a probationary sentence for every man whose offense is not so heinous as to require immediate separation from the Army. For seven years past military justice has possessed an indeterminate sentence and probation system which is in advance of that of any State of the Union; for it possesses virtually no minimum limit. How effective it is in mitigating and commuting the sentences originally imposed has been seen in the figures already set forth.

The system of military justice thus established is one of law and orderly procedure, not one of arbitrary discretion of the commanding officer. The proceedings are so conducted as to preserve for scrutiny of the superior authority every point of law which can possibly be raised for the protection of the accused. The accused is furnished a copy of the proceedings on request. This record goes up to the reviewing authority, and then to the Judge Advocate General. The Judge Advocate General's rulings on revision represent the application of all those legal principles which are required by law and regulations to be observed—definition of offenses, organization of the court, due procedure, sufficiency of proof, limitations of penalty, and so on. And the judgment of the Judge Advocate General, embodying those principles, is practically enforced and put into effect by the commanding officers with virtually the same effect as the decision of an appellate civilian court. The picture drawn of an arbitrary commanding officer contemptuously ignoring the limitations of law as embodied in the opinion of the Judge Advocate General is incorrect. In justice to officers of the Army who have in the stress of war acted as convening authorities it should be dismissed from the minds of the American people.

The foregoing figures and facts amply show this. But another and convincing way to understand it would be to read a few records from the Judge Advocate General's office. They bear all the familiar marks of a record in any civilian court of criminal appeal. Except for the subject being a military offense, the spirit permeating them is essentially not different from that of the records of a civilian court—the same raising of legal questions as to the allegations of the offense, the jurisdiction, the procedure, the evidence, and the judgment. The whole record is redolent of legalism. No one can read these records and not admit that the system of military justice is as full of legal limitations as any civilian system. Some might even infer that the technicalities of civilian criminal law are too prominent. But none could assert the contrary.

That military justice can not be improved in many details, could certainly not be maintained. Much might be said on this subject. But neither does any one maintain that civilian justice is perfect. The experience of the last year and a half, when carefully studied, will doubtless reveal numerous details in which improvement of the military code can be secured. It will first be necessary to compare divergent opinions, based on differences of local experience and of important policies. But the same is true of each one of our institutions, civil as well as military, that has passed through the crucible of war time. What we possess is a system of military justice founded on the Constitution, the statutes of Congress, and the President's regulations, administered in the trial courts by officers required to be familiar with it, and scrutinized in the appellate stages by professional lawyers whose sole object is to insure conformity in every substantial detail to those requirements of law.

E. H. CROWDER,
Judge Advocate General.

Hon. Jouett Shouse.

HON. DUDLEY DOOLITTLE.
OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 19 1919.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, seldom, if ever, has it been my privilege to know so confidently the qualifications of a man appointed to high office as in the case of our colleague from Kansas, Congressman JOUETT SHOUSE, who has accepted the position of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, notwithstanding his primary rejection of the offer because of his personal wishes and private business interests. His duty to accept the place of public service was made plain to him, and as soon as he saw it he consented promptly, knowing full well the personal sacrifice. This decision of acceptance marks one of his outstanding traits—generosity. He is the most generous person I ever knew—so generous in fact that he keeps himself poor despite the handsome income from his extensive properties, including one of the finest and best equipped live-stock ranches and wheat farms in the West.

JOUETT SHOUSE is the ideal Kentucky gentleman and Kansas is proud to claim him as her distinguished citizen. His greatest pleasure seems to lie in hard work and in making his friends happy. No task is ever too large or the outlay too heavy for him to initiate and consummate. A man of this sort is sure to be deservedly popular, and JOUETT SHOUSE is the most popular man in Kansas. He was born a gentleman, therefore, his wonderful success in every line of undertaking has but augmented his personal attractions. His intellect has engaged the admiration of his fellow Members in Congress, and this keen mentality has made its impressions throughout the National Capital in every official, professional, and social circle.

The story of the pedigree and history of my friend and colleague I shall leave to more adept pens, in whose statements I concur fully and adopt them as my own. From the scores of press notices and editorials I have chosen these few comments as illustrative of his character, capacity, and personality. The facts prove the veracity of the glowing compliments and time will verify in complete detail the fondest predictions. President Wilson and Secretary Glass have shown rare judgment in thus picking from the Congress of the United States this gifted young statesman who is destined to rank as America's foremost financial genius.

The truth was never more beautifully spoken than in the following editorial from the Lexington (Ky.) Herald:

JOUETT SHOUSE.

Twenty-two years ago almost to the day a tall, graceful lad of courtly manner came into the old Herald office on Upper Street and asked for work. He seemed so young that it seemed unfitting that he should start to work, and after a brief conversation the unasked advice was given that instead of going to work he should go to college. Then he revealed that, though scarcely 17 years of age, he had already graduated from college and was ready to take up the work and prove himself fit to assume the burdens of a man.

A long time ago that was. The Herald was then struggling, battling with the waves, with the result in grave doubt whether it would be submerged or weather the storm that it had invoked by its opposition to free silver and corruption in politics. It was fortunate in the crew that manned its ship. W. C. P. Breckinridge was its editor, Samuel Gill Boyle its managing editor, and there was a group of most remarkable youths who served it as reporters. When JOUETT SHOUSE joined that group it seemed probable that one so young, so inexperienced, would find the standard set by them difficult for him to reach. The Herald can not refrain whenever the occasion arises from recalling and paying tribute to those boys, now men, who in the troublesome days of 1897 and 1898 showed the qualities that in after life have won for nearly every one of them marked distinction.

JOUETT SHOUSE quickly proved himself the peer of any one of that group in intellect, industry, and executive capacity. By 1898, within scarcely a year of his coming as a college lad, he had become city editor, then managing editor, then business manager, then editor and general manager of the Kentucky Farmer and Breeder. In every position he revealed rare qualities of executive and intellectual capacity. As secretary of the chamber of commerce, as secretary of the Blue Grass Fair, in whatever position chance or duty called him he showed remarkable capacity for intensive labor, coupled with a keen, incisive, and vigorous intellect that in the opinion of those who knew him best forecast a distinguished career.

That forecast is now being fulfilled. Fortunate beyond even his deserts in winning for a wife a gentlewoman, a college graduate, a woman of culture and intellect, he went with her to Kansas. In 1912, within the briefest period after choosing Kansas as his abiding place, he was elected to the State senate in a district that had been overwhelmingly Republican, the division between the Republican and Progressive Parties giving him the opportunity of which he availed himself. In the senate he won instant recognition and was made chairman of the most important committee on revenue and taxation. In 1914 he was nominated for Congress on the Democratic ticket. It seemed a hopeless contest. The district was overwhelmingly Republican, the normal Republican majority ranging from 12,000 to 20,000. But in spite of the seeming insurmountable Republican majority JOUETT SHOUSE, with the same tireless, persistent energy he had shown as a lad and demonstrated as a man in Lexington, so organized that district that before the election every voter had from him or his political managers a personal explanation of the reasons he should vote the Democratic ticket. And to the surprise of all who were not thoroughly conversant with the vigorous campaign he waged, he was elected.

His election attracted the attention of the leaders of the House of Representatives, some of whom were already his friends by reason of various ties. Upon his entrance into Congress he was given most important committee assignments, including an assignment to the Committee on Banking and Currency, which committee was charged with the duty of framing the bill to create the Federal reserve banking system.

In 1916 he was reelected in spite of the fact that he spoke and voted in favor of measures for preparedness and for war, which many of his fellow Members thought unpopular in the Middle West, predicting that his votes would insure his defeat. In the Sixty-fifth Congress he has been one of the foremost advocates of preparedness, one of the most earnest supporters of every policy looking toward the quick and decisive victory of this Nation.

In 1918 it seemed certain that he would be reelected, many Republicans publicly proclaiming themselves in favor of his reelection. But the drawing tight and clear of the line between Republicans and Democrats in the last days of the election led the Republicans of Kansas to return to their former party allegiance, with the result that Mr. SHOUSE was defeated, though he ran some 10,000 votes ahead of his ticket in his district.

Upon the resignation of Secretary McAdoo the President appointed as Secretary of the Treasury the Hon. Carter Glass, who had been chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which Mr. SHOUSE was a member. Among the very first official acts of Secretary Glass was the request to JOUETT SHOUSE to accept the position of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. SHOUSE had already made definite business connections which promised large financial returns, but when this offer came, with the appeal to assume direct charge of the War Risk Bureau and the Internal Revenue Department, with their complicated details, he instantly surrendered the advantageous business arrangements he had made and accepted the onerous and difficult task of straightening out the complicated and confused details of the War Risk Bureau and putting into effect the provisions of the tax laws that will come under the Internal Revenue Department. Yesterday he was confirmed by the Senate; to-day he assumes the duties of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, which involves tasks so difficult that they might well daunt the bravest.

The Herald predicts that within as brief a period as it is possible for him to familiarize himself with the duties of this new position and to organize the War Risk Bureau, the complaints that have arisen because of delays and mistakes in that bureau will vanish; that within the year it will be a model for other departments of the Government. It would be too rash to predict that the bureau of the Treasury Department by which the income tax and the excess-profits tax will be collected will ever be popular. But the Herald does predict that that law will be administered in such a way that citizens can understand its provisions, and that it will not be necessary for a man with a taxable income of $50 to employ an expert at $100 to fill out his return.

Knowing JOUETT SHOUSE through 20 years of intimate and affectionate companionship, the Herald feels that the Treasury Department and the country are to be congratulated upon his selection for the position and his acceptance of the position of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. It does not at present indulge in prophecy, but it does believe that if his health be spared there are far higher political honors awaiting him in the future than have come to him yet. In the honors that have come to and the honors that the Herald believes will come, thousands of Kentuckians take both pleasure and pride.

And, Mr. Speaker, here is the opinion of a great newspaper of the Middle West:

AN HONOR TO KANSAS.

[Editorial from the Kansas City Star.]

The appointment of JOUETT SHOUSE, of Kansas, to the position of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury is complimentary both to Mr. SHOUSE and to Kansas.

It is known by Mr. SHOUSE's friends in Kansas and elsewhere that he did not desire the place. He accepts it as a sacrifice to his business interests, and only the urgent argument of his friends that the Middle West should be represented in the department and the insistence of Secretary Glass that he should accept the place persuaded Mr. SHOUSE to give his consent. Added to these reasons is Mr. SHOUSE's fine sense of duty to public service.

It is unfortunate that for such responsible duties the Government pays salaries that are hardly sufficient for living expenses in Washington, and only rich men can afford to hold such positions. To a personal friend sometime ago, when the position was first offered to Mr. SHOUSE, he wrote that the necessity for his return to Kansas, to look after his business interests, and the fact that he would be compelled to devote all his time to the work in Washington if he accepted the place, made it almost impossible for him to take the position.

However, Kansas will be delighted to know that he finally has consented, and the State will feel honored by the fact that it has such a representative in the Treasury Department.

The high praise accorded Mr. SHOUSE by Dr. Burris Jenkins is recorded in the next editorial from the Kansas City Post:

JOUETT SHOUSE—HIS RECORD.

Congressman JOUETT SHOUSE, of Kinsley, Kans., has been selected First Assistant Secretary of the Treasury by the new Secretary, Mr. Glass. This strikes us as a most excellent appointment. JOUETT SHOUSE is a coming young man, fascinating, daring, able. He will be equal to the large responsibilities that he assumes. This part of the country is recognized and honored by the appointment.

We know all about JOUETT SHOUSE from the time of his birth in Midway, Ky., through his education in the public schools of Lexington, the blue-grass capital, to his graduation from Transylvania University (formerly Kentucky University), and his service on the newspapers of that city. We know about his happy childhood and youth, the girls he used to tease and play with and later on "escort." We know his effervescent spirit and never-failing good humor, his platform ability, and his skill with the pen. He would have served well as the hero in one of James Lane Allen's novels. Keep your eye on JOUETT SHOUSE.

They say that ministers' boys are the worst boys in town—which is a fallacy. They are more observed than others, perhaps, and who is there who stands too close inspection? Now, JOUETT SHOUSE is just another one of the long list of public men whose families knew the penury and the careful training of a minister's home. The Shouse family was a big one and a merry one, and big families are conducive to unselfishness. The attrition of a large household rubs off the rough corners and smooths up character. Certainly this son of a minister was polished and refined in the process.

It may seem odd that Horace Greeley's advice, "Go West, young man, and grow up with the country," should have led this young Kentuckian clean out into western Kansas to find a career; but the mystery of the situation is cleared up when you realize that it was the visit of a Kansas girl to the heart of the blue grass which turned young JOUETT'S steps westward. Having married the banker's daughter and settled down in the short grass, JOUETT began to stir things. He dared to accept the Democratic nomination in a Republican district for State senator, and persuaded a majority, by his fascinating eloquence, to elect him. Once elected, the Republican presiding officer made him chairman of the ways and means committee. This emboldened young JOUETT to run for the National Congress on the Democratic ticket, and, to everybody's surprise, he was elected. He served two terms in the House of Representatives and is within a month of the close of his second term now, at the moment of his choice for the Treasury Department. He was elected the first time by a majority of 1,500 and the second time by a majority of 6,500. But, as he himself calmly expressed it, he was "caught in the late snowstorm of Republican votes." Fortunately he now has a higher position.

The Post is going to invite him to Kansas City at the first possible opportunity to make us a speech, so that we may extend him a glad hand. It is young men of this stamp who will save the day for the Democratic Party in time to come. JOUETT SHOUSE would make a good candidate for the United States Senate from Kansas. It would be interesting if Kansas should astonish the country as she has so often and so wisely done and should send him—a Democrat—to the Upper National House.

Now, permit me to insert a few excellent items from the Kansas press, Democratic and Republican, and all so true:

[From the Pratt (Kans.) Tribune.]

MAN FOR THE JOB—SELECTION OF MR. SHOUSE TO REORGANIZE WAR-CLAIMS BUREAU COMMENDED.

The appointment of Congressman SHOUSE to reorganize the War Claims Bureau in the Treasury Department is generally recommended by the Washington newspapers. The War Claims Bureau is a new department, and over 30,000 persons are employed in this branch of the service. Ever since its organization there has been considerable criticism of its management and efficiency. Immediately after the appointment of the Hon. Carter Glass as Secretary of the Treasury, he announced that there would be a sweeping reform and reorganization in this particular department of the Government. Mr. Glass was associated with Mr. SHOUSE on much important financial legislation and is thoroughly acquainted with his capacity for hard and exhaustive work. His selection of the seventh district Congressman for this important job is a distinct recognition of brilliant and meritorious achievements and a compliment to the seventh congressional district of Kansas.

It was Mr. SHOUSE's intention to retire from political life at the close of his term, March 4. He told the writer a few days before Christmas that he had no personal regrets over the outcome of the last fall's election and that no inducement would cause him to accept a Government position. He was anxious to get back to private life and was considering several tempting propositions of a business character. If he concludes to take this appointment, it will not be because he wants to continue in Washington but rather because he may conclude that the public interests and the opportunity to render a patriotic service demand his acceptance.

[From the Medicine Lodge Index.]

The seventh district is just beginning to appreciate what it lost in failing to reelect Congressman JOUETT SHOUSE. His able service and his fine ability have called him to the second place in rank in the United States Treasury Department. During his four years in Congress Mr. SHOUSE never failed to reply to a letter received from a constituent and gave his personal attention to every request made of him by every person who asked for his service, no matter how unimportant it may have seemed. His invaluable labors in connection with financial legislation and his tireless and effective work in behalf of the wheat growers of the country have so far not been appreciated as fully as they should have been, but after the people of Kansas will no longer have the benefit of his ability, energy, and industry they will realize what they have lost. Mr. SHOUSE's defeat was a personal gain to him but it was a positive loss to the people of the entire West.

[From the Pratt County Union.]

Congressman SHOUSE accepted the place as Assistant Secretary of the United States Treasury, and no better man could have been selected. His excellent work in Congress and his wide experience in public affairs especially fit him for this work. The seventh district is pleased with this appointment. Even Republicans who knew the good work that Mr. SHOUSE has done for the people are pleased. Carter Glass, Secretary of the Treasury, selected Mr. SHOUSE for the job of reorganizing the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and the people will have confidence that the work will be well done.

[From the Osborne (Kans.) Farmer.]

JOUETT SHOUSE, Democratic Congressman down in the seventh district, has been recognized by the Federal Government. That's all right, too. JOUETT SHOUSE is a clean-cut American citizen, admired by all who know him, regardless of party politics. He has brains, fairness, and cleanliness and will render good service wherever he may be placed.

[From the Garnett Review.]

The selection of Congressman JOUETT SHOUSE, of Kansas, as First Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, is a merited recognition of the ability of one of Kansas's brightest young men. Secretary Glass (successor to William G. McAdoo) evidently had his eye on this young Kansan.

[From the Pawnee Rock Herald.]

President Wilson's decision to appoint JOUETT SHOUSE, a Kansan, to the Assistant Secretaryship of Treasury, which Mr. SHOUSE finally decided to accept on January 29, Kansas Day, was entirely appropriate. It is a job that requires a lot of hard work in straightening out the soldier pension claims, and SHOUSE was picked as the man most able to get results.

SHOUSE TAKES JOB—KANSAS CONGRESSMAN TO BE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Representative JOUETT SHOUSE, of Kansas, has decided to accept the appointment as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and as soon as he is confirmed Mr. SHOUSE will resign his seat in Congress from the seventh Kansas district. Mr. SHOUSE wanted neither the position, in spite of the high honor it was to be named, nor to leave Congress until his term was up, but Secretary of the Treasury Glass insisted that he should accept the appointment and take charge at once, so Mr. SHOUSE's resignation from the House will be forthcoming within 10 days.

"While I will have no vote for the remaining month I would have served, I shall continue to look after the interests of my State and my district in particular, just the same as if I were still a Member," Mr. SHOUSE said to-day.

As Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. SHOUSE will have under him two general divisions of the work, the management of the War Risk Insurance and the general oversight of the Revenue Divisions. The post is regarded as next in importance to that of the Secretary himself.

"I had all my plans made to return to Kansas and go into business," Mr. SHOUSE said to-day. "I hated to give them up, but my close friend, Secretary Glass, insisted that I should come to the Treasury and tackle this big job for him. He put it to me as a matter of service, and I accepted against my wishes."

Because of the short time elapsing until Congress adjourns, probably less than a month, it is not believed here there will be a special election called to choose a successor to Mr. SHOUSE.

[From the Kingman Journal.]

CONGRESSMAN SHOUSE TO TREASURY PLACE—RESIGNS SEAT TO BECOME ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE FEDERAL TREASURY—HIGHEST APPOINTIVE POSITION TO BE HELD BY ANY KANSAN IN RECENT YEARS—NO ELECTION OF SUCCESSOR PLANNED.

Congressman JOUETT SHOUSE has been appointed Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and will assume his duties at once. The interests of his constituents in the seventh district, however, will be looked after by himself just as before, to the end of his term as Representative in March, the end of the term being too near at hand to warrant the calling of a special election to fill the vacancy.

Mr. SHOUSE thus again becomes intimately associated with Carter Glass, now Secretary, who, as Congressman, was head of the House Committee on Banking and Currency. The late Congressman Neeley distinguished himself on that committee at the time of the financial probe in New York, and Congressman SHOUSE, who succeeded him, was closely associated with Mr. Glass in framing the vast financial measures of the last few years that have practically put the country beyond any chance of a panic and made the Treasury and banking system able to stand the tremendous strain of war without a quiver. The two have been intimate friends and have done a lot of work together, and Secretary Glass doubtless wishes to retain a valuable coworker in Washington while the Treasury Department is on the job of readjusting the country's finances to peace-time conditions.

Mr. SHOUSE thus comes into the highest departmental position held by any Kansan in recent years. He is next to the head of the Treasury.

And in the last one I have selected I recur to my friend's native State:

[From the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal.]

JOUETT SHOUSE WILL BE AID TO TREASURY CHIEF—FORMER KENTUCKIAN IS NOMINATED AS ASSISTANT TO CARTER GLASS—IN CHARGE OF TWO BUREAUS.

A retiring Member of the House who was a former resident of Kentucky was honored when the President sent to the Senate to-day the nomination of Representative JOUETT SHOUSE, of Kinsley, Kans., to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. The nomination of Mr. SHOUSE, who was born and reared in Midway, Woodford County, and was engaged in newspaper work and other enterprises at Lexington from 1898 until 1911, is expected to be confirmed in a few days.

Mr. SHOUSE will succeed Thomas B. Love, who recently resigned as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. He will have charge of the Bureaus of Internal Revenue and the War Risk Insurance, the latter particularly being now in a chaotic condition. The position pays a salary of $5,000 a year.

Mr. SHOUSE, who is 39 years old, was educated at the Mexico (Mo.) High School and at the University of Missouri. He is a member of the Phi Delta Theta fraternity and is a tennis expert. Following his graduation he returned to his native State and spent 13 years in business at Lexington. Eight years ago Mr. SHOUSE moved to Kansas, where he engaged in farming and stock raising. On October 18, 1911, he married Miss Marion Edwards, who was graduated from Wellesley College in 1907.

Mr. SHOUSE served in the Kansas State Legislature in 1913 and 1915. He was elected to represent the seventh Kansas district—a rock-ribbed Republican stronghold—in the Sixty-fourth and Sixty-fifth Congresses. He was defeated for reelection to Congress last November.

During his service in the House Mr. Shouse has done much in assisting other Democratic leaders to carry out the administration's policies. His service on the Banking and Currency Committee, of which Secretary of the Treasury Carter Glass was formerly chairman, has been of such merit that Mr. Glass without hesitation selected Representative SHOUSE for the important berth in the Treasury Department.

Mr. SHOUSE, one of the most popular Members of the House, spent a busy day receiving the congratulations of his friends on Capitol Hill.

My own friendship for JOUETT SHOUSE has sometimes made me wonder if I were unduly prejudiced in my favor of him, but I know that when this admiration is shared so universally that true worth is behind it all.

OF

HON. FRED A. BRITTEN,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, the report of the special committee of the House of Representatives selected to investigate the National Security League, shows that the league was conceived in London, nursed to strength and power in New York by foreign interests, and later used in the elections by the same interests, and in this connection I desire to present to the House my extended statement before the committee to further and more completely show the hypocrisy practiced by the officers of the league under that much-abused word, "Loyalty."

Out of 435 Members of the House of Representatives, the league's chart gave credit for full patriotism to only 47 Members. Out of the 47, 45 represented congressional districts along the Atlantic seaboard, where the income tax gathers the largest revenue.

As a matter of fact, the league cared nothing whatever for a candidate's party affiliations. What chiefly concerned them was how his attitude would affect certain interests that would be the subject of legislation by Congress during the reconstruction period.

The report of the committee says, "Upon entering the league's office in New York one could see only Mr. West, the lobbyist; Mr. Orth, the sisal importer; and Mr. Harvey, the newspaper reporter without a job, but if the curtain were only pulled back, in addition to the interests heretofore enumerated the hand of Rockefeller, of Vanderbilt, of Morgan, of Remington, of DuPont, and of Guggenheim would be seen, suggesting steel, oil, money bags, Russian bonds, rifles, powder, and railroads."

The committee further finds that "the greatest injustice has been done to many loyal, patriotic men who have given the Nation the benefit of commanding ability, unquestioned courage, and unalloyed patriotism, by men seeking partisan ends and undertaking to hide their self-interest beneath the cloak of public service and national good. The National Security League and like organizations in their political activites constitute a serious menace to representative Government."

The report further says: "Men in public life are given by them to understand that they must be subservient to the demands of such institutions, and upon their failure to do so they will be held up to public scorn and humiliation by false accusations.

"The fight made by the National Security League upon the loyalty of men of the highest patriotism was so glaringly unjust and so patently false that it failed of its purpose, but the failure was due to an error of judgment on the part of the league and not because of the lack of vicious purpose.

"In the judgment of your committee the National Security League has violated the corrupt-practices act, the penalty for which is a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment not longer than one year, or both."

The report of your special committee indicates conclusively that the league was more interested in the candidates' prospective attitude on matters affecting the reconstruction period after the war than it was in his true war record.

The committee specifically finds that the league was largely a political organization, and that it had violated the provisions of the national laws as such.

BEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE.

"Mr. BRITTEN. Until the last campaign I had always felt that the National Security League, the Navy League, the American Defense Society, and other like organizations were strongly in favor of my retention in Congress because of my constant activity in the House and in committee for such Army and Navy legislation as would protect our country against attack or aggression from any foreign foe. In fact, I was an honorary member of the American Defense Society in New York because of that activity, and I had no reason to believe that the National Security League was not actuated in its propaganda for measures of national safety by the very highest patriotic motives.

"It was not until the last election that the Security League was forced out into the open and its true colors, that of a great political, profiteering organization operated for the selfish interests of those more or less directly in control of its machinations, were shown to a disgusted public.

"It was but natural that my vote against war with Germany would be displeasing to those having British blood in their veins and whose predominant desire at that time was to help England. It is also natural that those millionaires controlling great steel and manufacturing plants having millions of dollars tied up in war contracts would be equally displeased with a vote which would interfere with their further profiteering at the expense of American lives and property.

"It has been shown that these interests combined contributed $619,165.28 to the National Security League during the past four years and that the league sent broadcast more than 2,000,000 pieces of literature since January 1, 1918.

"With the searchlight turned upon the league, it is conclusively shown that officials active in its management are not those whose names appear on the league's stationery, but, on the contrary, a self-seeking, unreliable set of men have been using the membership, dues, and contributions of the league for profiteering, high salaries, and purely selfish ends.

"The principal opposition to my election came from members of the Chicago chapter of the Security League, who were either born in England or who were connected with enormous enterprises that profited by the war, and I am quite satisfied that their income-tax schedules will show that they made considerably more money during the war year than ever before in the history of their lives.

"Among those who testified before the congressional committee investigating the league was one of my most energetic assailants, Samuel Insull, head of a number of public-utility corporations in Chicago, a Britisher, recently referred to in one of the London daily papers as the most prominent Englishman in America, and who up to within the last year ate all of his Christmas dinners in London—sent his turkeys and sweetmeats over for his holiday feast with relatives and friends in London.

"I merely recite this fact to show where his heartstrings are and to indicate why he would oppose anything not in the interest of his fatherland. As I intend to make every effort toward a larger and more efficient Navy, for commercial control of the high seas, for American financial domination and other measures equally offensive to Mr. Insull, I realize that I will merit a continuance of his enmity.

"It is perfectly natural that Insull would oppose my reelection, for his heartstrings have ever been in England, and he cared little what tremendous sacrifices might be made by American youth or finances just so long as his dear old England was benefited. His constant aim was to help England, but I notice that his son, who was plenty old enough and big enough to go into our military service, was kept safely at home, while Americans of unquestioned loyalty and patriotism allowed their boys to go across with the colors. Insull was 100 per cent British, while my first thought was for America.

"Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Britten, if I may interrupt you—you say that it is perfectly natural that this gentleman should be against you. Do you mean by that that his opposition to you would be inspired by his loyalty to England as distinguished from his loyalty to America?

"Mr. BRITTEN. Positively so. He told me personally that he could not expect his American-born boy to feel toward England as he does, or to feel toward me as he himself did. That was prior to the election, when he told me that he was going to do everything in his power to defeat me—and he did.

"I am glad that the special congressional committee brought a lot of these skyrocket patriots out into the open, for it substantiates my campaign contention that a small group of rich men were doing everything in their power to defeat me for reelection to Congress.

"When asked by Congressman BROWNE if he had taken any part in the campaign of 1918, Mr. Insull said, "Yes; I did my level best to prevent the nomination and to prevent the choice at the primary of Mr. BRITTEN," and he said further that he had taken no active part in any other congressional campaign, which indicated that this small group of lip patriots were interested in but one congressional district.

"Insull testified before the committee that he had contributed money to Fletcher Dobyns, the Republican candidate, also to James Poage, the Democratic candidate for Congress in my district, but neither of the gentlemen admit it in their sworn statements to the Clerk of the House, and I hardly blame them, for no one wants to be associated publicly with Sam Insull. He has been repeatedly called a burglar, a robber, a thief, and a gold-plated anarchist in the public press, but up to the present time he has not made his accusers prove it in court.

"Mr. REAVIS. Aside from that you think he is all right?

"Mr. BRITTEN. Aside from that he may be all right.

"In Dobyns's list of contributors, besides an amount of $1,000 from William Wrigley, he shows such reputable names as Alexander H. Revell, Robert W. Hunt, Clifford Arrick, Howard Elting, Frank Logan, W. J. Chalmers, Walter Schuttler, A. W. Armour, Eames McVeagh, and Tiffany Blake, while the Poage statement gives prominence to such excellent citizens as Le Verne Noyes, Benj. Rosenthal, Oscar F. Mayer, and Thomas H. Cannon. No one could reasonably blame either of my opponents for "forgetting" contributions from such men as Insull and Edgar A. Bancroft.

"The testimony before the committee shows that the political activity of the league just prior to the recent election brought in considerable money from men representing corporations who had benefited enormously by the war. It is very simple for men of the Insull type to make large contributions in various directions, so long as they are giving away money belonging to thousands of stockholders, some of them widows and orphans, but I notice that their personal contributions are usually niggardly. I observe that the Edison Co. gave $1,000, the Peoples Gas Co., $1,000; the Consumers Co., $500; the Chicago Electric Railways, $500; the Chicago Elevated Railway, $4,500, etc., to the Chicago branch of the Security League. It would appear that the gentlemen having control of the finances of these various corporations are quite liberal with other peoples' money.

"Among the others who testified before the committee was Edgar A. Bancroft, a corporation cootie, who has made more money during the last year than he ever did before in his life.

"Mr. REAVIS. What is his occupation?

"Mr. BRITTEN. He calls himself a lawyer. Represents the Harvester Trust and several other big corporations. Directly after the sinking of the Lusitania, and long after Belgian neutrality had been violated, and the destruction of life and property by German submarines had accumulated to an appalling degree, Bancroft wrote a letter to the editor of the Chicago Tribune on June 3, 1915, in which he said, and I quote his language:

> There is no reason for a war. No foreign nation has intentionally given us a cause for war. The violations of the rights of American citizens of which our Government has complained, were resulting incidents of a plan of campaign against the enemy in the present war. They were not inflicted with hostile intent toward us. * * * But that furnishes no warrant for such a further destruction of innocent lives, American and foreign, as would result from a war. The torpedoing of the Lusitania was not an intentional act of hostility toward our Government or its citizens, but was done to destroy the property and injure the commerce of an enemy. Germany's program of a war zone controlled by submarines has developed a difference of opinion as to what international laws permit, but such questions find their proper forum not upon the battle field but in an international court of arbitration. If our arbitration treaties mean anything, they mean that an honest difference of opinion between our Government and a foreign nation is not a cause for war, even with a nation with which we have no arbitration treaties.

"Mr. REAVIS. Now, did you publish that letter?

"Mr. BRITTEN. No; he did. It was published in the Chicago Tribune under the caption, "The Voice of the People," on June 5, 1915. Now, just listen to this:

"During my campaign this acrobatic patriot attacked me for not having voted for war, and among other things said that he could not understand why I failed to have been moved by the German atrocities and, to further substantiate his now warlike spirit, I notice on page 1552 of the printed Hearings before the committee that this loyal contortionist said:

> "When we did go into the war I breathed freely for the first time after several months, because it seemed to me we were losing our soul by standing by in the face of such things as Belgium and France had suffered.

"And it must be very evident from these contradictory views that Bancroft was called on the carpet by his corporation bosses and made to do a somersault from his 'peace at any price attitude' to that of 'war at any cost.'

"Mr. REAVIS. You know that to be a fact?

"Mr. BRITTEN. No, I do not; but his complete acrobatics would indicate that something of that character had transpired.

"Mr. REAVIS. Was there a change of position on the part of Bancroft, as announced in the Chicago Tribune, before the declaration of war, or did the change come after the declaration of war?

"Mr. BRITTEN. Well, of course, it is impossible for me to tell that. I do know, however, that a complete change did occur, and either his corporation bosses cracked the whip or the light-headed Bancroft forgot all about his letter to the Tribune, which was so contrary to the desires of his masters.

"Mr. REAVIS. Now, as I recall his testimony, yes, he bottomed his opposition to you in large measure on certain legislation proposed by you to the effect that the sons of German parents should not be conscripted. What about that, Mr. BRITTEN?

"Mr. BRITTEN. I don't know just what he based his opposition on. I did introduce a bill in Congress exempting those having warm blood ties in the enemy country—Germany, Austria, etc.—from combatant service abroad, upon their own request; not exempting them from the draft, not exempting them from any rules or regulations of the War Department, but exempting them on their own request from combatant service, which was in complete accord with War Department regulations applying to the American Red Cross.

"Mr. REAVIS. Well, Mr. BRITTEN, in view of subsequent events, what is your present opinion of that legislation?

"Mr. BRITTEN. As soon as my bill was introduced, Mr. REAVIS, I communicated with the Secretary of War in the premises and asked him for his support of the measure, because its theory had been advanced by many of our expert military men—that unless a man's heart was in his duty he would make a poor soldier. One of our most able fighting generals—not a swivel-chair general but a fighting general—told me that my bill was an excellent one and should be passed. His version of it was that if one weak-hearted American was backed up against the wall with a couple of stout-hearted Yankees on either side of him, and they were face to face with an equal number of big Germans or Austrians, that that one weak link in the chain of three would cause the destruction of all of our men, and he said that he would not send that character of man abroad. The War Department refused to send those having warm blood ties in the enemy country across in Red Cross work for the very reason that their sentiment might influence the value of their work.

"In the course of time the Secretary of War replied that he did not think my bill was a good one, and I therefore let the matter drop.

"Mr. REAVIS. That is, you took the judgment of those in authority?

"Mr. BRITTEN. Very naturally. I was for the war wholeheartedly after the declaration had been passed by the House. Congress had determined that war should prevail, and I was for it; and, of course, I was not going to embarrass the administration or the War Department or the Secretary of War with a bill which they had determined would not prove militarily desirable.

"Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. BRITTEN, did you go before that committee there that was appointed for the purpose of taking up their records with Members of Congress?

"Mr. BRITTEN. Yes, I did, I am sorry to say, for I had expected to meet with a group of gentlemen who were following sincere, patriotic motives in the interest of all good Americans; but, on the contrary, I came into the presence of some seven or eight men, a great majority of whom lived outside of my district, and whose only ambitions were to make political capital for my opponents.

"Among those present were Emil C. Wetten, a well known publicity seeker, who acted as chairman of the meeting, and who subsequently appeared before the congressional committee investigating the league, when he said that there were a large number of disloyal citizens in the district I have the honor to represent in Congress.

"Either Mr. Wetten is a fool, a liar, or an undesirable citizen, and as I have known him for many years, my guess is that he is simply a conceited fool, made reckless by the prominence given to his association with the Security League.

"Ordinarily I would not dignify his opinion with even scant recognition, but when newspapers having wide circulation print such an utterance in their valuable columns, it becomes necessary for some one to refute a deliberate misstatement.

"It is not long since Mr. Hinton G. Clabaugh, representing the Department of Justice in the Central States, told me personally that the Ninth (north side) district was exceptional in its order and adherence to the many laws and regulations enacted during the war, which is in complete contradiction to the baseless statement of the brainless Wetten.

"If Mr. Wetten knew there were many disloyal citizens in the district I am proud to represent in Congress, he should, in the interest of the public safety, have reported them to the Department of Justice for proper apprehension. His failure to do so makes him as undesirable to his unsuspecting neighbor as the most disloyal citizens in or out of jail.

"Emil C. Wetten is known by the legal profession as a political "fixer" rather than as a real lawyer, and those who know him best simply smile when his name is mentioned in connection with law. As a counterfeit, he is 100 per cent proficient, and as a legitimate lawyer, a 100 per cent failure.

"You probably will remember that it was this same Wetten whose childish, flippant ignorance of important existing conditions was so evident that one wonders how he ever gets home alone after dark. His answers to simple questions caused one of the members of the congressional investigating committee to remark:

"Now, Mr. Wetten, without any desire to be offensive, I don't think I have seen more manifest, complete misinformation in my life than your answer.

"Another of those present was Mr. James A. Patton, the millionaire gambler in foodstuffs, of Evanston, Ill.—outside of my district—of whom Congressman KING said:

"Mr. Patten was the man who, just prior to the declaration of war, bought up millions and millions of bushels of wheat for the National Biscuit Co., and had it stored away out of the reach of the common masses.

"Another of those present was William B. Austin, of whose former loan-shark proclivities I will have something to say at a more opportune time.

"Another present was Peter Lambrose, of Rogers Park—outside of my district—a member of the executive committee, who said:

"The only thing that was wrong about Mr. BRITTEN was the fact that he circulated his speech in the month of June to harm the noble cause of the war.

"What a weak ground upon which to base the terrible stigma of disloyalty upon an American whose father fought and suffered in defense of the Union in 1864.

"Another present was Harry H. Merrick, a former stockyards employee, who lives in Hyde Park (also out of my district), who presented himself to the congressional committee as a "reformed lawyer." If he has reformed, he must have been awful before he took the cure. I am sorry that he did not go a little further and tell just what he had reformed from. A Chicago paper on February 1, of this year, referred to Merrick as follows:

"On every possible occasion Merrick impertinently attempts to pose as the official representative of the city. He makes speeches which convey that impression, and through the press issues proclamations which * * * are targets for the ridicule of the few who waste their time in reading them.

"Merrick is a cadaverous-looking individual with large goo-goo eyes and takes himself very seriously.

"Another present was Joseph W. Moses, whom I do not know and who also lives out of my district. There may have been one other whom I do not now recall.

"Each of these men had supplied himself with a Dobyns campaign booklet and were not at all interested in my congressional record of six years, but desired only to harp upon a few votes played up by Dobyns and upon which there could reasonably be a difference of opinion. By so doing they intended making political capital for my opponent. The subsequent testimony of some of these gentlemen before the congressional committee shows that of all the Members of Congress who voted against war, my name was the only one mentioned in any letter or document sent out by the league.

"The mockery and deception practiced during the war under the guise of loyalty by this small group of rich men in Chicago should forever brand them as unworthy of any public confidence or trust.

"Officers of the league paraded themselves in the interest of loyalty and patriotism and in many instances did not even know the Member of Congress in whose district they themselves lived, and yet they attempted to dictate a congressional policy for the people of my district.

"Doesn't it seem strange that these rich men, many of whom hardly knew the name of their own Member of Congress, should come from all parts of the city into the ninth district in order to educate my people how to vote?

"Not one of the men whose names I have mentioned had a son in the military service during the war, and just why the ninth district should be inflicted with this gratuitous insult from them is something my district could not comprehend, and notwithstanding their supposed influence and money, backed by the then misunderstood Security League, which has since been shown by the congressional committee to have been dominated by hypocrisy and self-advertisement, at the expense of an unsuspecting public, their candidate, the noisy Dobyns, was defeated by almost 3 to 1.

"Mr. REAVIS. What faction do you belong to?

"Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. REAVIS, I think I was assisted by a large majority of the workers of the three Republican factions in Chicago—the Brundage faction, the Thompson faction, and the Deneen faction.

"Mr. REAVIS. The league and its officers in their testimony in Chicago stated that they were inspired solely in their activities to get Congressmen from the city of Chicago and the State of Illinois who were whole-heartedly for the United States in this war, and yet when we called upon them to give their activities in that regard we found out that they had not called a single Democrat before their committee.

"Mr. BRITTEN. Well, just at that point, if you please, if they were whole-heartedly for the election of Congressmen who would stand back of the President, why didn't they show some endeavor for Poage, who was a very estimable gentleman and who would have made a valuable Member in the House of Representatives? The truth of the matter is that when their pet, the shouting Dobyns, was defeated they had no further interest in the selection of loyal Congressmen and they allowed the entire matter to drop. More complete hypocrisy was never practiced.

"Mr. REAVIS. The National Security League, or the executive committee of the National Security League, was so intensely opposed to you that before the primary they sent letters not only to your district, but through the whole State, calling in question your record as a loyal Congressman and appealing to the membership and the friends of the membership to do everything lawful to defeat you. As soon as you were nominated their activities ceased. Now, I want you to state, understanding the situation much better than I do, whether this deduction is justified; that their opposition to you was inspired to nominate your opponent and not to keep you out of Congress, because when they failed in that desire they did nothing to defeat you for Congress. Do you think that that deduction would be justified?

"Mr. BRITTEN. That is perfectly true.

"Mr. REAVIS. Let me ask your opinion of this: If their opposition to you was inspired by the patriotic desire to keep you from going to Congress, why did not they seek to defeat you in the election rather than confine their activities to the nomination?

"Mr. BRITTEN. Well, now you get back again to that little rich clique on Lake Shore Drive, who were for Dobyns, and when they failed to nominate him their opposition to me as a general proposition ceased. They should have fought me harder in the general election than in the primary. They had plenty of money and they had a tremendous organization.

"Mr. REAVIS. Then your idea of that campaign, based upon your intimate acquaintance with it and the activities of the league, was that the Chicago branch of the league wanted to nominate Dobyns for personal reasons rather than to defeat you for patriotic reasons?

"Mr. BRITTEN. There is no question about it, and Dobyns was to have been their rubber stamp in Congress.

"Mr. REAVIS. Now, Mr. BRITTEN, everybody manifestly has more or less of an affectionate regard for his constituents. Mr. Wetten, who claims to have lived in Chicago a great many years, and has been very active in politics, and who modestly made the statement that he was the one man in the district that could beat you, or that you thought he was the one man in the district that could beat you—he made the statement that there was a great deal of disloyalty in your district. Do you want to put anything in the record with reference to that?

"Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; as to Wetten being the one man in my district, will say that he is a habitual candidate, always allowing his name to be mentioned in connection with any prospective office, but never seeking election. In this regard he differs from the silly Dobyns, who also is a habitual candidate, and who has been humiliatingly defeated three or four times, but who continues to run either for the publicity or for the gain he can make through financial contributions. Wetten could not be elected dog catcher in a dogless neighborhood, and no one knows it better than he. I am sincerely sorry that Wetten's hair-brained assertion about the disloyalty in my district was given such wide publicity. He has hurt Chicago considerably by it.

"Mr. REAVIS. What is your observation, based on your personal experience in that district?

"Mr. BRITTEN. I had been a member of the Chicago city council from that north-side district for four years prior to coming to Congress, and I am sure that the police records will show that there are fewer arrests in that neighborhood than in any other neighborhood in Chicago. The fire marshal once told me that as far as fires in that neighborhood were concerned he might just as well have no engine house at all. The sterling type of citizen that make up that community is of the peace-loving, home-loving type who owns his little home and who makes the finest citizen on earth.

"It was said of the old twenty-third ward that it did not contain a pauper nor a millionaire, a very unusual big-city condition indeed. It was made up of the nationalities of the world, with many Germans, Austrians, Swedes, Italians, and Irish. In that north-side community those people would own their little cottages on a 25-foot lot, and after years of saving and thrift they would move that cottage onto the back of the lot and in its place erect a little two or three flat building, but you may be assured that they themselves would continue to live in the little cottage on the back of the lot until their building loan had been paid up, when they might move to the front house in their old age. They are that type of citizens who would remain home all day on the Fourth of July in order to protect their property and the surrounding property against fire. The policeman in a neighborhood like that knows practically everybody on his beat, and they call each other by their first names. Arrests are most unusual. Only a publicity-seeking fool will say that there are a great many disloyal American citizens in that community.

"Mr. REAVIS. Then you think that the citizenship in that district will compare favorably, from the standpoint of loyalty, with any other district in the city of Chicago?

"Mr. BRITTEN. With any other district in America, and its personnel is largely superior to Mr. Wetten himself.

"Mr. BROWNE. You have seen this chart purporting to give the records of Congressmen in the Sixty-fourth and Sixty-fifth Congresses regarding the eight acid tests?

"Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; it was circulated in my district. I am credited with having voted wrong three times out of the eight acid-test votes selected by the Security League, and yet Congressman FOSTER of Illinois was credited with having voted wrong five times, while Congressmen RAINEY and MCKENZIE were marked wrong four times out of eight, and Congressman RODENBERG six times out of eight, yet none of these gentlemen were requested to come before the league nor were they opposed for reelection.

"Mr. BROWNE. Did Mr. Wetten speak in your district?

"Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; he did; several times.

"Mr. BROWNE. They stated—I am interrogating you on that question because Mr. Wetten stated that he made no speeches at all in your district.

"Mr. REAVIS. He made that statement positively?

"Mr. BRITTEN. He did. He is going to prove, evidently, what I said about him a few moments ago.

"Mr. REAVIS. My recollection of Mr. Wetten's testimony was that he did not appear in your district at all.

"Mr. BRITTEN. He was questioned from the floor at one meeting that I know of.

"Mr. REAVIS. Well, he stated that he had been making speeches at every political campaign for a great many years, and left the impression with the committee that he was in such demand—he may have forgotten that he was in your district—a man making as many speeches as he indicated he had been.

"Mr. BRITTEN. The truth of the matter about Wetten is that he always has been a publicity seeker and a limelight artist, with no brains, but a big mouth, who caters entirely to the corporations. He has been a candidate for office for many years, but never runs. You have referred to Wetten as a lawyer; you will pardon me, he is not a lawyer, but is merely admitted to the bar. He comes from that class of lawyers known as political fixers, and will charge his clients a good round fee for having cared for some matter very easily arranged through political influence."

Mr. Speaker, when Hon. WILLIAM E. MASON was before the congressional committee he was asked the following questions:

"Mr. REAVIS. Can you see anything to distinguish the National Security League in Chicago from a regular political organization within the party?

"Mr. MASON. I can not; I never have.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. REAVIS. But, as I understood you, a reliable man on whose word and in whose integrity you put the utmost reliance, told you that any question—told you, in effect, that any question the National Security League might have regarding your loyalty they were willing to abate if you would support the street-car franchise.

"Mr. MASON. Yes, sir; and that a certain newspaper——

"Mr. REAVIS (interposing). And that this organization, inspired by the desire to serve the country in the time of its need and to elect patriotic Congressmen, were willing to subvert the very purpose of its organization itself if the street-car franchise could be put across?

"Mr. MASON. Yes, sir.

"Mr. REAVIS. So that while their avowed purpose was a patriotic purpose, the real purpose and the one in which they had the most interest was the street-car proposition?

"Mr. MASON. That, I think, was their purpose.

"Mr. REAVIS. That is logical, isn't it?"

* * * * * * *

Mr. Speaker, when Hon. ROSCOE C. MCCULLOUCH, of Ohio, was before the congressional committee he branded the National Security League as a "tool of Wall Street and the interests" and urged "punishment commensurate with the great wrong they had done."

The Late Senator Gallinger.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. JOSEPH G. CANNON,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, January 19, 1919.

The House had under consideration the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER, late a Senator of the United States from the State of New Hampshire.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of the exercises of this day, shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, two men have crossed over in the last few months who were truly great men, one from Illinois, JOHN A. STERLING, the other from New Hampshire, Senator JACOB H. GALLINGER, one a lawyer, the other a physician by profession, both of them school-teachers in early life, one well grounded in the legal profession, the other well grounded in the medical profession, who later on in life were selected on account of their ability and high character for services in the Congress. Senator GALLINGER served in this House two terms, and then he served, I believe, continuously in the Senate of the United States until his death. Each one served his constituency well. They could not have served their respective constituencies well without serving all the people of the United States well. A Senator represents one State and a Representative serves one district, but when we come down to it, whether it be in the Senate or in the House, whether a man comes from far-away California, or way down East in Maine, or in New Hampshire, or from the central portion of the country, he votes for legislation that spreads over the whole country, and we are just as much interested from a practical standpoint in every one of the 435 districts, each of which sends a Representative to the House, or to any of the 96 Senators, as we are in those whom we select from our respective States and districts. I believe that through all these years that I have served in the House that on the average in the House and in the Senate the people who were chosen have represented the public sentiment of the respective States and districts first, and second, and on all fours with the public sentiment, have represented the whole people.

And, everything considered, I believe the average representation in both House and Senate measures the average sentiment and intelligence of those who send them here. Sometimes there is complaint that there are too many lawyers in Congress. Well, there are a good many lawyers in Congress, but they are selected not because they are lawyers but because they have to do with voting for legislation. Some people say there are too many business men in Congress; that there are too many farmers, and so on. Now, the whole object of our Government is to enable us to live under laws which under our fixed law, the Constitution, will protect the weak and the strong. God forbid that it should ever be to the contrary. And it never will be to the contrary while our form of government lasts.

There are certain great characters in war and in peace—Presidents, Members of Congress, and the coordinate branch of the Government, the judiciary, that stand out in history and will continue to stand out in history. But, after all, it is the one hundred millions of people, plus now, that select the men who are to legislate and who are to fill the Executive chair and, in the end, under the Constitution hold the judiciary positions. And those places will not be more worthily filled than by the majority sentiment, the common sentiment, of the people who give men their commission. George Washington, the Father of his Country; Alexander Hamilton; Thomas Jefferson; Patrick Henry; the Adamses, all dwell in history, but we would not have gotten far if it had not been for the Continental Army. We would not have had a Constitution if it had not been for the wise men who framed it and the people who ratified it. After all is said and done, men whose names are forgotten, great masses of men, the average population of the country, selected those great characters who performed the function that was cast upon them, and they did it well. I fancy if you would call the roll of the Membership of the House of Representatives you would find that nine-tenths of them, under the hand of necessity early in life, learned to make their way by labor, physical and mental. I know the Illinois delegation pretty well. They are descendants, in the main, of pioneers—a great folk. From one ocean to the other we are still pioneering; we are crossing the continent; we are settling up the area of the United States in order that we can continue to take care of the great increase in population for a thousand years and live, if we are forced to do so, within ourselves. We have not been forced to do so, but we could.

Now, these two men, JOHN STERLING, school teacher, lawyer, and legislator on the one hand, and Senator GALLINGER, having pretty much the same kind of training that STERLING had, were both strong factors. While Senator GALLINGER was not a lawyer, practically he was quite six while other men were half a dozen in framing legislation. They did not lack industry. The two men in many respects were alike. They or any of us, substantially, will not live as Webster will live in history or as Jefferson will live in history, but Webster and Jefferson and all of those people could not have succeeded so well if it had not been for their forbears that stood for them and by them. And so in speaking of the whole people we must consider them as being competent for self-government. There never was a man bright enough and strong enough to develop another's legs by walking for him, and there never will be. A child when he learns to walk can be instructed and aided, but he must do his own walking and his own growing.

JOHN STERLING was my personal and political friend and I was his. I recollect the night before the election in the campaign of two years ago, when I closed it at Bloomington, in his district, at which there was a wonderful demonstration. That was the night before the election. They had been talking that there was a hot contest that promised to defeat Mr. STERLING. But he came out of it with a greatly increased majority not by virtue of what I said but by virtue of his ability, character, and service.

We only know about to-day. What of the future? I believe there is a future. I believe that each man, each human entity, finds its place amongst those like unto it. That is my faith. I am not a believer in people being cast in a fiery furnace that is a thousand times hotter than the one in which Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego were cast and being burned forever and ever. No; no. We all hope, and that is the strong evidence, for life hereafter.

Sometime ago I had the pleasure of dining, on the invitation of Representative PORTER, of Pittsburgh, with a great manufacturer and a great business man. There were present, if I recollect, 18 or 20 guests at his house here in Washington. The guest of honor was Mr. Brashears. That gentleman is the great lens maker of the world. He commenced life as a puddler, but in off hours he turned his attention to the stars. He married, but there were no children. As he studied the stars and began to make lenses his wife was his assistant. He made great progress in his art. He made the great lens for the Lick Observatory, and other great lenses have been made in his laboratory. We made him do most of the talking by asking him questions, first by one and then another.

I asked him, "How far can you see into space with the strongest lens that you have produced?" He said the strongest lens ever produced in the world was produced at Pittsburgh in his laboratory. I said, "How far does that lens reach into space?" "Ah," said he, "I am something of a mathematician; we know the velocity of light; that lens can reach so far that if a sun in space were to be extinguished this minute, the light that started from that sun would not reach the earth for fifteen hundred years. Space is but another word for something without boundary."

Then somebody asked him, "When was it that your wife died?" He answered, "Two years ago." Then somebody asked, "Where is she buried?" His answer was, "Beneath the laboratory. And there I shall be buried, and on my wife's memorial"—in substance I give the words: "We have searched the stars together, worked together, made lenses together; we have become familiar with space, so far as human eye by human invention and aid will allow; and that Power which made the universe and placed law upon it will care for us after this life."

So I have faith to believe that that Power will care for Senator GALLINGER, will care for JOHN A. STERLING, will care for the loved ones that have crossed over. I do not know; perhaps I am not orthodox. We can not shape our future lives except as we come under general law, and the great First Cause that called matter into being was not only wise but omnipotent, which means just and merciful. It is a favorite thought with me with respect to my loved ones, when I think about them, who have been crossing over, it seems to me, every few years since I can remember, that I shall meet them there. Such is the universal desire. While the legislative record of our deceased colleague here, Mr. STERLING, and of the honored and able Senator GALLINGER is lodged in the official archives of the House and Senate, while we sympathize with the friends that survive, yet if we are welded by work, by wisdom, by fidelity, crossed on courage, I shall hope and be content if we can reach men in the great eternity like unto Senator GALLINGER and JOHN A. STERLING.

Unliquidated Damage Claims, $4,000,000,000.

HON. EDWARD C. LITTLE,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 8, 1919.

The House had under consideration the resolution (H. Res. 487) providing for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13274) to provide relief where formal contracts have not been made in the manner required by law.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I want the House to understand the amount of the bills for whose payment they are providing in the matter of the claims for damages to people who did obey the law of 1862 as to contracts. In the hearing before the committee the Comptroller of the Treasury said:

This bill will confer on the War Department the settlement of more equitable claims in amount, in my opinion, than Congress has settled since the beginning of the Government.

That is what you are arranging for. Can you not spend a day on that? He says again:

Probably the amount of money in equitable claims which will be covered by this bill is more than has been acted upon by Congress through its Committee on Claims since the beginning of the Government.

And you are taking 80 minutes to discuss it.

How fast are they going to settle it? Mr. Warwick, the Comptroller of the Treasury, says:

I understand the War Department, if this proposed legislation is enacted, could settle with the contractors within 30 days after the law is passed by Congress.

He testified that there are 6,669 of them.

Mr. GORDON. Six thousand.

Mr. LITTLE. Six thousand six hundred and sixty-nine claims already. And the gentleman from Ohio came up here and told us he had investigated them and that they were all right. An old lady came home from the drug store in great haste and she said to Mike, who was smoking by the stove, "They have got a complexion powder down at the drug store that will give me the complexion of a baby." He looked her old mug over kindly and he said, "It will be a dandy if it will do it." [Laughter.] And yet that is what you want to do. You want to authorize the War Department in 30 days to pay out $4,000,000,000 to 6,669 different claimants, and more to follow. Great God, gentlemen, they will think you are crazy in a hundred years from now when they read this bill.

They tell us that these are contracts. There is not a contract here. The Comptroller of the Treasury has turned down every one of them as illegal.

The chairman of this committee says this bill is to provide for contracts that were not valid contracts. That is what is the matter with these alleged contracts. Mr. Dorr says, in the hearings, "an agreement may not be a contract, and it was not a contract in this case, because the law prescribes that it shall not be a contract until it is signed in a certain way." You are here to protect the public. You are not here to only take care of the contractor. You represent the taxpayers and it is your business to interpret these laws for their benefit.

You come here and tell me that they can not pay a wounded soldier. Has any rule been brought in here to fix a way by which the soldiers can get their money quickly? There are thousands of poor women who are not getting their allotments. Has anybody brought in a rule here to authorize a system to hurry up the payment of these allotments? Yet you come in here with a rule for the benefit of manufacturers, who have millions back of them. Why does not somebody appear here and ask for a rule for the benefit of the wounded soldiers and the widows and orphans? [A voice, "Whoo-ee!"]

Who says that? Some contractor? Some speculator? Some profitteer? Is there anyone here who would vote to pay the unliquidated damage claims of millionaire manufacturers and then jeer when some one speaks for the soldiers' wives who do not receive their allotments, for the orphan, the widow, and the unpaid wounded soldier? They tell us he who argues for the millionaire is a conservative statesman and then turn around and declare the man a demagogue who says that the soldier who fights for his country should receive as much financial consideration as the contractor who profits from it. They lie.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I have not time. The gentleman from New York is the one who said to the department satraps in the hearings, "You think you are God's anointed and want to do it in your own way." He was right. What is the matter, where is the Senegambian in the woodpile? In 1862 they made a law that every man down there who made a contract should make an affidavit that he was not interested in it. That is the mystery and that is the trouble. You talk about a contract. There is no affidavit in one of these pretended contracts in which the man says that he was not concerned in it. Some fellow with a major's epaulets on his shoulders probably made these agreements, or most of them, and then ran off and made no affidavit, because he was afraid that he would get into the penitentiary.

Yet he wants us to authorize him to settle up and pay the entire claims because he knows all about them. He certainly does. He knew too much to swear to them. I would not vote to pay anyone until the affidavits required by the law of 1862 are made. A commission of these nonaffidavit workers would be a farce. We put the "conscientious objectors" to military service in jail. We ought to put these "conscientious objectors" to making affidavits demanded by law in jail with them. The latter class is much more dangerous to the Nation. Yet they can get big business and little business and the press with them, while the first has only the War Department. A commission sufficiently large should be appointed with authority to take evidence and make a thorough examination. It should report to the Congress of the United States, which appropriates the money to pay these damage-suit claims.

Some of these contracts are probably just. I will vote for a commission to investigate them and report here, and will vote to pay them as fast as they are proven honest, but I will not vote to spend a nickel on one until the fellow with spurs on his heels will make an affidavit that he was not interested in it and then comply with the law of 1862, passed in the country's greatest emergency. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OTIS WINGO,

OF ARKANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a song of Uncle Sam, by G. M. Comstock, Uniontown, Ark., as follows:

A SON OF UNCLE SAM.

(By G. M. Comstock, Uniontown, Ark.)

Somewhere in France in a war-torn place,
Out there in no-man's land,
Two burly soldiers met face to face—
One bade the other stand.
"Well, who's the one," spoke up the Hun,
"To halt me where I am?"
In tones of pride the other cried,
"I'm a son of Uncle Sam."

"And why, I pray, did you cross the sea
To come to a foreign shore;
And why depart from a land that's free
To hear the cannons roar?
The Kaiser bold, so I've been told,
Compares you to a lamb,
And said, 'They're right, but will not fight,
Those sons of Uncle Sam.'"

'Twas then the boy in the khaki suit,
With pride and a curt grimace,
Said, "Come with me, for I'll not dispute
With Bill or you or your sin-blacked race.
So face about and do not shout,
Just close up like a clam;
You're going back to my old shack
With a son of Uncle Sam.

There are two million of us in France,
With eyes by grief made dim,
Who watch and wait for the glorious chance
To storm your great Berlin.
We long to see the world made free,
Without a doubt or sham;
This war be closed and you exposed
By the sons of Uncle Sam."

SPEECH

HON. EDWARD C. LITTLE,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 9, 1919.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13274) to provide relief where formal contracts have not been made in the manner required by law.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, in the first place I want to call attention to the exact facts in this case. The gentleman asked, Do you want to cheat any honest man out of his money? I do not, and I do not want any grafter to "get his." Some of these claims are honest and some are not. I do not want the friends of the grafters to get behind the friends of the honest men and get anything that is not coming to them. I want to say this in behalf of the honest men and the honest claims: Every lawyer here, if he will be frank with himself, will concede to himself, if he will not in public, that this law is probably unconstitutional, because it places judicial power in the hands of the Executive, and if an injunction is applied for the injunction will be granted. I am not sure that we are doing the honest man any favor by putting him in this position.

Now, I want to call attention to the elementary facts. The law provides, in Revised Statutes, section 3744, enacted in 1862 for this very purpose, that every contract shall be in writing on these matters, and that an official should make an affidavit that he made the contract and that he in no way profits thereby. These alleged contracts are not in writing and were not verified by the affidavit, in my opinion often omitted by legal advice. Now, gentlemen, we hear much said about contracts. There is no contract at issue here, because the law says it shall not be a contract until these things are done. That is not all. There is no legal contract, and there is no equity in it. Every man that comes into a court of equity must come with clean hands himself.

If A and B undertake to make a contract, in writing, and A says he will do this if B will make an affidavit, and they do not execute any writing, but B turns around and undertakes to set up an equity, and has not made the affidavit, he has no equity. He does not come with clean hands. If any man undertakes to get in under this law, where an affidavit is essential, and he in any way assists in getting away from that affidavit, he has no equity. There is no legal right and no equity, because they can not come in with clean hands to avail themselves of it.

Instead of being contracts these are felonies, and this law ought to read at the beginning not to confirm informal contracts but for the relief of formal felonies. That is where you start, gentlemen, and that is all there is to it. A great many of these men are honest men and have no intention of violating the law. What is the result? They have been placed in a position where they may be brought up for a felony and prosecuted for a felony. If the felony is not there, why do you put in a provision by amendment that you reserve the right to arrest every one of them?

In the hearings December 9, 1918, the character of these unliquidated damage claims is fully developed. The evidence presented there shows that they are merely unliquidated damage claims. Mr. Warwick, Comptroller of the Treasury, says, page 30:

> There is no real liability on the Government for these claims. The Court of Claims and the Supreme Court would give judgment to the United States on any case that is intended to be covered by this bill.

He says, page 31:

> This bill does not cover cases where the material has been delivered.

And, page 31:

> I mean the contractor would get his money without this bill where he has delivered the articles and the Government has accepted and used them. He would get the fair value of the article.

Comptroller Warwick says, page 28:

> The Supreme Court of the United States holds that, so far as the man (p. 29) who has delivered under an informal contract is concerned, he is entitled to quantum meruit.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. Against the Government?
> Mr. WARWICK. Against the Government; oh, yes. But this bill does not cover that. This bill covers articles not delivered.

You can see that the claims this bill is calculated to pay are not intended to provide a fund to pay for anything the Government has received. The Supreme Court has provided the method for meeting that. These claims are for unliquidated damages somebody claims for nobody knows what. They will amount to over $4,000,000,000, and perhaps never cease. Here are our soldiers straggling home out of employment, and men who advocate the expenditure of billions to meet demands that are nothing on earth but damage suits will absolutely refuse to make any serious preparation to reward the soldiers for their sacrifices and enable them to get a new start. What has John Smith to complain of when he talks about some contracts that were never made and never carried out when John Jones comes home with a wooden leg and no job?

Where the claims are just they will be met, but thousands of crooked grafts will sneak in here if this bill goes through, when the Government by the law of 1862 made such things impossible. On page 34 of the hearings before the Military Committee on December 9, 1918, a member of the committee, the gentleman from New York, says:

> When these contracts were made there was talk in the Halls of Congress and on the streets of our country to the effect that men formerly employed by these great contractors were the people who were giving the contractors all the contracts. Under this bill those men will be put on boards to pass on the question as to what their former bosses are going to get when the war is over. After we have won, there is no need of paying a tribute for winning the war.
> Mr. WARWICK. That is not a question directed at me, is it?
> (Thereupon the committee adjourned.)

Well, I should think it would adjourn. There is not a man in the world who dare answer the question. Ah, you know, they sent their employees here with majors' shoulder straps and jingling spurs to pose at a desk as "experts" and secure contracts for the men for whom they worked at home. Then they discovered the law of 1862 that required the fellow in these spurs and straps to make an affidavit that he was not concerned in the matter, and consulted their attorney. Of course any intelligent attorney would instruct them not to make the affidavit, as it would take them to the penitentiary. They violated the law about the affidavit, and therefore violated the law that required them to make a contract in a certain way. Then the Comptroller of the Treasury refused to allow the pretended contract to be paid, and they come here and ask Congress to enact legislation that will authorize the Department of War, of which these shoulder-strapped individuals are clerks and officers, to pass upon and settle the very contract these felonists made. Why should they pass upon it after they were afraid to make an affidavit that they were not concerned in it? If they had obeyed the law, we would not need any more legislation. It must be obvious to any intelligent man that this is simply a law to compound a felony.

The bill presented by the Department of War could not get 20 votes here; the amendments only make it able to pass. What are they? Safeguards, they say. Why so many "safeguards"? Because we all know something is wrong; but the safeguards get nowhere.

What happened? The Comptroller of the Treasury refused to disobey the law, made to protect taxpayers from profiteers, and declined to allow any of these claims to be paid. The very fellows who assisted them in committing this violation of the statutes come in here and say, "a felony has been committed; we committed it, let us straighten it out; we are the fellows who can do that; we know all about it." That is exactly what has happened, and you need not try to get away from it. I concede that does not alter the fact that a lot of honest men have honest claims, but there is not one of them coming here who is in a position to go into a court of equity and demand equity, because he can not show clean hands.

This is not a grant of equity. This is to grant mercy, and it should be granted. It droppeth like the gentle dew from heaven, and here is a good time for Congress to drop some, but it is not necessary to give it to any grafter. A year and a half ago I saw this Congress appropriate $640,000,000 for airships in two hours, and when somebody got up and said, "Who is to make them, and how much will they cost," some man answered, with flamboyant oratory, that "You must not delay; you must trust the War Department," and we did, and where is your $640,000,000?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We did not get a machine.

Mr. LITTLE. Not a thing to show for it! I do not want you to say "hurry" to me again. I made up my mind at the time there was something wrong then. I did not object because of the phenomenal conditions. But I shall not be flimflammed again if I know it. The emergency is gone and I am objecting now. There is no Hun at our throats to-day.

Mr. MCKENZIE. It is too late as to the machines.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; the gentleman from Illinois says that it is too late to object to the $640,000,000, but it is not too late to object to the $1,600,000,000. The statements already show in these hearings that it has run up over $4,000,000,000. Four billion dollars! Why, every grafter in the United States will be in on this thing. Every man who can think of some reason why he should come in will be in, and you gentlemen who wish to help the honest men should aid to establish some system by which they could differentiate between the honest man and the crook. I will help you do everything that I can toward that consummation. The law of the land is against all of these people. We must now devise some means by which real justice and equity can be done, although not one of them is in a position to demand it legally. A proper commission will do it.

Oh, I know these damage-suit people are yelling bloody murder because they do not get their money. They are crying "Hurry, hurry, hurry," that business will be ruined and a panic will be precipitated if they do not get their money. Yes; the boys over in France who were not paid once in nine months sometimes were in a hurry, too, but you never did a thing about it. The soldiers' wives at home with big families in need cried "Hurry, hurry, hurry" for their allotments, but you never raised a finger to put in a rule to bring up their bill and you never had a committee report any bill for them. Why is it that every eagle owned by a rich man "hollers" so much louder than the eagle owned by a poor man when they are both squeezed? Why is it that society hardly hears the wail of the hungry, the hoarse cry of the soldier, but has its ear attuned to catch the slightest whisper of distress from what we call the business interests?

These people are simply the agents of society to carry out certain economical features, and most of them make big money by doing it, but the people you have forgotten, the soldiers' wives and the wounded at the front, are the sacred charge of the Congress of the Republic, and I do not like to see men come in here with a rule to put through, almost without discussion, payments that are admitted to amount to $1,600,- 000,000—and will really be over $4,000,000,000—to men whose claims are described by the Comptroller of the Treasury in the terms I have quoted.

If they were in such a hurry, why did they not comply with the law of 1862? If the payment of this money was so important that a delay might ruin society's business interests, every man that failed to make an affidavit that the law required to expedite it ought to be in the penitentiary as a malefactor of the most dangerous kind. They should be held to the strict performance of that legal duty which was thrown upon them by the statutes for the protection of the Treasury against the raids of just such men as some of them evidently are. This country, as a result of this war, has become indebted in the sum of thirty billions of dollars. Of this, four billions, practically one-seventh, will be paid to the men who did not comply with the law, but sought to evade it by this very failure to make these affidavits. I suggested to a gentleman who is most ardent in favor of this legislation that we support a bill to pay the soldiers a bonus for their services according to a suggestion I made. He said, "My God, that would cost the country five hundred millions of dollars. Where do you think all that money is coming from?" It never occurred to him as to where this four billion was coming from to pay the manufacturers who had violated the law, yet his hair curled with indignation when I wanted to pay $500,000,000 unliquidated damages for their sacrifices to the gallant boys who left their jobs and salaries, who left their business, who gave up all their opportunities in life and went off and risked their lives for America.

Talented orators tell us that these big business men took these great risks on account of their loyalty to their country. Well, some of them did and some of them did not. That style of argument has been given full sway here. But we do know that the soldiers who fell on the fields of France, went down into the Argonne never to return, who sleep in Belleau Woods, who rest forever at Chateau-Thierry, and who made the breach at Cantigny heard no call but that of duty, no enticement but that of loyalty. They had nothing to gain and everything to lose, and they lost it; and every man that pleads for them with the word loyalty on his tongue will be denounced as a demagogue, and every man who comes here to upset the laws of his country to plead for profit makers and profiteers, with the argument that they sacrificed for loyalty, has forever estopped himself from saying demagogue to anybody who talks of the soldiers' sacrifices and a pecuniary award to them. The business men of this country have good lawyers, and they were told what the law was. They should accept the situation they created and get their money just as all the rest of us get ours when we fail to obey the law.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests that we appoint a board of Members of Congress to survey these claims. A gentleman sitting by me who is an ardent supporter of this bill remarked, "I would not be a member of that for $10,000 a year in addition to my salary." I said, "Why?" He said, "Because I do not know anything about these claims." He does not know anything about it, yet he wants to and will vote for allowing $4,000,000,000 of these claims. One member of the committee told me that he knew of a $1,000,000 steal that was to be presented under these claims, but he had secured an amendment under which he could head that off. How many more are there that ought to be headed off? If you do not think some of these are crooked, why have you made so many amendments to the bill first presented by the War Department? If you were so afraid of the bill presented by the War Department to the Military Committee that you had to add amendment after amendment, how do you know that it is all right now? If you could not trust the War Department to make the bill, how can you trust them to pay out the money without any supervision? These people are no better than the rest of the country, and injuries to them are no more dangerous to business than damages to other business men. They should be given an opportunity to secure their money by proving their claims, just as all the rest of us do when we get into trouble.

We do that by going through forms of litigation provided to do justice between men. There is no reason why these men should have any more privileges than the rest of us who try to obey the law. This House should provide some special proceeding, in the nature of a commission, with authority to take evidence and to do justice to all concerned, including the taxpayers, who will have to put up this $4,000,000,000. The rest of this country must adopt such a system as that to pursue its unliquidated damage claims. Of course, these people will complain that that is slow, but—

> No rogue e'er felt the halter draw,
> With good opinion of the law.

If you hold these men to the methods the rest of the country must follow hereafter, you will have no difficulty in protecting the taxpayers against improper contracts in the War Department. If you authorize the men who violated the law to have full charge of the settlement of their own illegal claims, you will make a precedent that will endure to plague the taxpayers for centuries to come. As for the honest men with just claims, they will be willing to get their justice from the law, as other men do, and we should make that provision for them.

I yield back half of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] and half to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. THOMAS L. RUBEY,
OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 2, 1919.

The House had under consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. WILLIAM J. STONE, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Missouri, and the Hon. JACOB E. MEEKER, late a Member of this House from the State of Missouri.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of their distinguished public careers, the House, at the conclusion of the exercises of this day, shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the families of the deceased."

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, more than 40 years have passed since the Members of this House have been assembled to pay a tribute of respect to the memory of a Missouri Senator. On September 20, 1877, Lewis V. Bogg, then a United States Senator, died while serving his first term, and since that time no Member of that body from Missouri has died while in office until April 14, 1918, when WILLIAM J. STONE, then serving his third term, passed away. Missouri during her little less than 98 years of Statehood has had 26 Senators, 4 of whom have died while in office. Besides those already mentioned, STONE and Bogg, the third and fourth Senators, Alexander Buckner and Lewis F. Linn, passed away while in office. Buckner served only a little more than 2 years, while Linn served nearly 15 years.

I trust that it will not be considered inappropriate if I briefly touch upon some facts and incidents of history relating to the long line of illustrious men who have occupied seats in the "upper House" from the great Commonwealth I have the honor to represent in part in the "lower House" of Congress.

During the early years of her Statehood the people gave to their Senators long tenure of office. For 35 years she was represented by only six men; two of these died in office; otherwise the number would have been less. From 1855 to 1881 no man succeeded himself in office with the single exception of John B. Henderson, who was appointed to succeed Trusten Polk in 1862, and who subsequently was elected to fill out his unexpired term and reelected for a full term. Henderson's length of service was a little over 7 years. During this brief period of 26 years no less than 15 men occupied seats in the United States Senate from Missouri. With the reelection of Francis Marion Cockrell in 1881, the people returned to their former custom of giving long service to the faithful; and, as if to emphasize that fact, they reelected Senator Cockrell four times, giving him 30 years, a record equaled only by Thomas H. Benton. To be exact, Senator Cockrell's service exceeded that of Thomas H. Benton several months, due to the fact that while Benton was elected in 1820, Missouri was not admitted until August 21, 1821. The shortest term of service was that of David F. Jewett, who was appointed to fill a vacancy, and who served from December 19, 1870, to January 21, 1871, a period of one month and one day. He had a close second, however, in James Shields, who was elected to fill out the unexpired term of Lewis V. Bogg and served from January 24, 1879, to March 4, 1879, one month and eight days. Only one of Missouri's Senators has ever resigned. That was Charles D. Drake, who resigned to accept the appointment of chief justice of the Court of Claims. Two of our Senators were foreign born—Carl Schurz, who was born in Germany, and James Shields, who was born in Ireland. Schurz, after representing the State in the United States Senate, became a member of President Hayes's Cabinet, and later located in New York City, where he became a very distinguished editor and author. Shields had the very great distinction of representing three States in the United States Senate. First Illinois, then Wisconsin, and last but not least, Missouri. David R. Atchison is the only Missourian who has had the distinction of serving as President of the United States. He was President pro tempore of the Senate on Sunday, March 4, 1849; and as Gen. Taylor was not sworn in until March 5, Atchison for one brief day was President of this great Republic.

WILLIAM J. STONE, in honor of whose memory we meet to-day, was the twenty-fourth Senator from Missouri. In length of service he was exceeded only by Senators Cockrell, Benton, and Vest. Elected in 1903, reelected in 1909, and again in 1914, the last time by popular vote, he was just entering the sixteenth year of service at the time of his death.

The old State of Kentucky has been very generous to Missouri. She has furnished us with some of our most distinguished citizens, among them Senator STONE. He came to the State early in life and was educated there, graduating from the university at Columbia. Every official position he ever occupied came to him as the result of the confidence and esteem in which he was held by Missourians—prosecuting attorney, Member of the House of Representatives, governor, United States Senator. Remarkable career, one of which any man might well be proud. In every position, from county attorney to the exalted position of United States Senator, he served his people with fidelity and distinction. Of all Missouri's distinguished governors, Senator STONE is the only one ever elected to the United States Senate after serving a full term as governor. Trusten Polk was inaugurated governor and in a few days was elected to the Senate, while B. Gratz Brown was elected governor after having first served in the United States Senate.

My acquaintance with Senator STONE began in 1892, when he made his memorable campaign for governor of Missouri. His opponent in that race, Hon. William Warner, attacked the record of the Democrats and selected as his slogan "Poor old Missouri." Mr. STONE accepted the challenge, defended the Democratic record in Missouri, took as his watchword "Grand old Missouri," and from one end of the State to the other proclaimed the greatness and the glory of that splendid Commonwealth, of which some one has written:

> The winds of heaven never fanned,
> The sparkling sunlight never spanned,
> The borders of a better land
> Than this our own Missouri land.

That remarkable campaign of 1892 added to the luster of STONE as an orator, won for him the governorship, firmly established him in the affections of his people, and eventually made him United States Senator.

In his political speeches Senator STONE was unselfish; he always talked for the "other fellows" rather than for himself. In every campaign he ever waged he never lost sight of his associates on the Democratic ticket, and each one of them received from him strong words of praise and commendation. No man I have ever known was truer to his friends than he. He firmly believed in and faithfully practiced the sentiment—

> The friends thou hast and their adoption tried,
> Grapple them to thy soul with hoops of steel;
> But do not dull thy palm with entertainment
> Of each new-hatched unfledged comrade.

Of Senator STONE it may be truly said, "He died in harness." On the way to the Capitol, where he was to have made a speech in the Senate, he was stricken. He lingered in a semiconscious state only a few days. Once in a while he would revive, and in those moments he would insist that he must go to the Senate, that he was expected to speak, and that he must be there ready to do his duty.

He died, I am sure, as he would have desired could he have been consulted. There was no long and lingering sickness full of pain and consequent suffering of sympathizing loved ones powerless to give relief. On the contrary, after an illness of only a few days, surrounded by his devoted wife, son, and daughters, he peacefully breathed his last and passed to the great beyond. That his going brought sincere sorrow and mourning to the great hosts of faithful friends was manifest on the return of the body to Missouri. From the time the funeral train crossed the Father of Waters—the Mississippi River—and reached Missouri soil until the very end of the journey, at every place where a stop was made the train was met by vast crowds of people. At St. Louis, the first stop, that great, magnificent station could not begin to accommodate the friends who were there to pay their tribute of respect. The vast throng lined up on either side of the long platform and stood with bowed and uncovered heads as the body was borne from the train. Tears flowed down their cheeks, giving mute and unmistakable evidence of the sadness which filled their hearts. The next stop was made at Jefferson City, the State capital, where the body lay in state in the rotunda of that magnificent new statehouse so recently erected upon the bluff of the Missouri River. On this historic spot had stood the old capitol building in which for four years Senator STONE had served as governor. The new capitol, erected at a cost of nearly $4,000,000 to replace the old one destroyed by fire a few years ago, was just being completed, and Senator STONE's body was the first of Missouri's distinguished dead to lie in state there. The casket containing his remains was placed in the great rotunda, in the recess formed by the great winding stairways leading to the floors and galleries above. It was banked with the most beautiful array of flowers I have ever looked upon—tokens of love, affection, and esteem sent from far and near. All day long there was a constant stream of people passing the bier of Missouri's distinguished Senator. They came from everywhere; nearly every county was represented. Old men, with the weight of years showing in their tottering footsteps and their whitened hair, paused and looked upon the face of the dead, wiped the tears from their eyes, and with saddened countenances and throbbing hearts passed on. These were the friends of other days—men who had known him, honored him, and stood by him in the days gone by, and who now came to look for the last time upon the face of their friend and pay to him this last mark of their affection and esteem for him. Men and women passed by the thousands. The children came from the public schools; the business men closed their doors and came to pay honorable tribute to the dead. No one who viewed this truly wonderful scene at Jefferson City can for a moment doubt the esteem and love of the people of Missouri for this man who had served them in the threefold capacities of Congressman, governor, and United States Senator.

The funeral train left the capital at night, arriving at Nevada, Mo., early the following morning. Here again we were met by vast crowds of people who came from the surrounding counties. This was the old home of Senator STONE. Here it was he began his political career. Here it was we were to meet his old-time friends, those who had known him from his early manhood. The manifestations of sincere grief and sorrow shown both at the funeral and at the grave told the story of their affection for this distinguished man far more eloquently than it can possibly be related by me. Home! He was back home again; he had taken his last earthly journey and had come back to make his final resting place near his old home. We laid him to rest in the beautiful cemetery at Nevada. There in the silent city of the dead he rests to-day, surrounded by friends and loved ones who have gone before and where he will be joined in the days to come by other loved ones and other friends who must so surely follow.

The body of WILLIAM J. STONE, all that is mortal of him, lies out there in that cemetery; the grass will grow green above his grave, the flowers will bloom, the birds will sing their carols in the trees; friends and relatives will come to visit that grave, to spread flowers upon it, and to water them with their tears; in time, no doubt, friends and admirers will erect a suitable monument, so that future generations may know that the body of a distinguished statesman and citizen lies buried there. WILLIAM J. STONE is not there; his immortal spirit took its flight when the breath left the body. He has gone to meet his reward in the great beyond. On that bright day in April, nearly a year ago, his immortal spirit winged its flight—

> To that mysterious bourne
> From which no traveler returns.

And to friends and loved ones who put their trust in Him "Who doeth all things well" there comes that sweet consolation:

> We'll meet thee and we'll greet thee
> On the never ending shore;
> We'll dwell with thee in glory,
> To be parted nevermore.

HON. JACOB E. MEEKER.

Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives meets to-day to pay respect not only to the memory of a Missouri Senator but to a Member of the House of Representatives as well—Hon. JACOB E. MEEKER, of the tenth district of Missouri. That there is nothing more uncertain than life nor more certain than death is illustrated in the case of Dr. MEEKER. I saw him just a few days before his death, the very picture of health—hale, hearty, and robust—and yet in just a little while there came flashing over the wires the sad news of his death. I did not know him well; I had never met him until he came to take his seat in this body in December, 1915. He very soon impressed me as a man not only of marked ability, but a man of very decided views—one who had opinions of his own and was not afraid to express them. He was a fluent and forceful speaker, and almost at once took rank as one of the best debaters in the House.

A native of Indiana, his body was taken back there for burial and was laid to rest in the country churchyard in the neighborhood where he was born and where he had spent the greater part of his life.

Dr. MEEKER died in St. Louis and the congressional committee met the funeral party at Attica, Ind. The funeral ceremonies took place some 12 or 15 miles from there, in a beautiful country church near the old Meeker homestead. On the way out we passed through the most wonderful farming country I have ever seen. Detouring a few miles from the direct road, we were taken by the farm and had pointed out to us the large, spacious farmhouse where Dr. MEEKER was born. It was an ideal country home, situated in the very center of a tract of some two or three thousand acres of the very best land that can be found in the State of Indiana. I was impressed with the prosperity which was in evidence on every hand—splendid, well-kept homes, fine barns, excellent rock roads—all going to show that the people were prosperous and well to do.

The people came in great numbers to pay their respects to one who had formerly made his home with them, who had gone to a distant State, where he had won honor and distinction, and who at his own request was to be buried among them. The church was crowded even beyond its capacity. The casket was surrounded by flowers in great abundance, tokens of affection and esteem from friends and loved ones. After an impressive sermon by the pastor, Representative L. C. DYER, of Missouri, on behalf of the congressional party, delivered an address in which he spoke eloquently and feelingly of our departed colleague. In the beautiful cemetery adjoining the church, near the home of his childhood, among old-time friends and neighbors, we laid to rest all that is mortal of JACOB E. MEEKER, who, although comparatively a young man, had by his zeal, energy, and determination won for himself high political honors and a lasting place in the esteem and affections of all who knew him well.

Collection of Rulings Made by Mr. Saunders of Virginia as Chairman at Different Times in the Committee of the Whole.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS U. SISSON,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend remarks in the RECORD I include a collection of rulings made by Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia at different times as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole:

An amendment in the nature of new legislation is not in order on an appropriation bill, unless it is germane to the subject matter of the bill, and operates ex proprio vigore to reduce expenditures.

On February 9, 1912 (RECORD, p. 1903), the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the Army appropriation bill, when the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted an amendment, as follows:

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, at the end of line 8, after the word "dollars," insert the following:

"Provided, That on and after the 1st day of July, 1912, there shall be 10 regiments of Cavalry, and no more, in the United States Army, and that the officers who shall be rendered supernumerary by this reduction in the number of Cavalry regiments shall be retained in service and shall be assigned to vacancies in their respective grades as such vacancies shall occur in the Cavalry, or, in the discretion of the President, to such vacancies in their respective grades as shall occur in any other arm of the service."

To this amendment a point of order was made, and after debate the Chairman ruled as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia is that it changes existing law. This is admitted. But it is urged in support of the amendment which is confessedly germane that it comes within the Holman rule, and is in order on the ground that it retrenches expenditures.

The Chair desires to place its ruling upon a foundation of authoritative precedent, and to follow the established and familiar rules of parliamentary construction.

Many rulings have been made under the Holman rule. The Chair has examined these rulings in detail. Some of them are conflicting in part. Others are absolutely irreconcilable. Still others are harmonious and consistent, and may be cited as authorities in point. One of these rulings was made upon an amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. De Armond, to a pension appropriation bill. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 52d Cong., 1st sess., p. 1792.) This amendment consisted merely in the addition of the words "or other," to the existing law.

The point was promptly made that the amendment did not show on its face that it retrenched expenditures.

In this connection it is proper to state that it has been expressly held by Speaker Kerr, and concurred in by Chairman William L. Wilson, that in determining whether an amendment will operate to reduce expenditures, the Chair can look to the law of the land, so far as it is applicable. (Hinds, vol. 4, p. 595.)

The effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. De Armond, was to increase the number of persons prohibited from receiving the benefits of a particular clause of the pension law, thereby reducing the number of pensioners, as a necessary sequence. A reduction in the number of pensioners carried with it a reduction in the amount that would be paid out for pensions under the general head of pension appropriations. The De Armond amendment was held to be in order. It will be noted that this amendment was not directed to the amount of money actually appropriated by the bill. In terms it did not reduce the aggregate amount specifically carried for the payment of pensions. But the Chair was justified in concluding, certainly it so concluded, that in the execution of the pension laws the amount otherwise required for the purposes of pensions would be reduced by the De Armond amendment.

There are a few general principles heretofore announced for the interpretation of the Holman rule, proper to be stated in this connection. I quote again from Mr. Chairman Wilson, concurring with Speaker Kerr.

The purpose of the rule (the Holman rule) is most beneficent and proper, and it should have a liberal construction in the interest of retrenchment. (Hinds, vol. 4, p. 594.) Mr. Kerr was universally recognized as a learned and skillful parliamentarian. Mr. Wilson was an exceptionally brilliant and accomplished scholar.

In this connection, the Chair will state that for an amendment to be in order it is not necessary that it should be specifically directed to a reduction in terms of an amount carried in a bill. Of course, if it is addressed to such an amount, and reduces the figures of the same, it will be in order. As, for instance, if the sum of $1,000,000 is appropriated for a designated purpose pursuant to the requirements of existing law, and an amendment is submitted, reducing this amount to $995,000, this amendment will be in order. Such an amendment does not depend upon the Holman rule to be in order. It is in order on other grounds. The language of the Holman rule is to the effect that germane amendments changing existing law are in order provided they retrench expenditures, by the reduction of the amounts of money covered by the bill.

The words "amounts of money covered by the bill" refer not only to the amounts specifically appropriated by the bill, but to the amounts required under the different heads, or items of expense to which the bill relates. And if the necessary effect of an amendment upon the operations of the department, or bureaus, for which appropriations are made, will be a reduction of the amounts otherwise required under any one, or more heads, or items of expense, then a retrenchment has been effected by a reduction of the amounts of money covered by the bill. It is only in this view of the rule, that the De Armond amendment was in order. This amendment contemplated that in a system involving payments to pensioners, whatever the appropriations might be, the amount actually required for the administration of the law would be appreciably reduced by a reduction in the number of pensioners. The Chair is not unmindful of the proviso in the second section of Rule XXI, but whatever meaning may be given to the proviso, it should not be construed to take away powers definitely given by the preceding paragraph. This paragraph permits germane amendments to change existing law, provided they retrench expenditures in one of three ways. The proviso allows further amendments on the report of the committee having jurisdiction, provided they reduce expenditures. If the committee offers germane amendments, reducing expenditures in any way, they will be in order, and it will not be necessary to refer them to one of three heads. Power of action being plainly given by the paragraph standing alone, the proviso will not be deemed to take it away, unless such intention is plainly manifested. The two sections will be construed to stand together, and amendments offered, whether under the first paragraph or the proviso, will be tested by the requirements of the head under which they appropriately fall. This is certain to give a liberal construction to the rule as a whole in the interests of retrenchment.

The Chair will further say that it is not enough for the Chair to think that an amendment may reduce expenses, or that it is likely to reduce expenditures.

The precedents hold in this connection that the amendment, being in itself a complete piece of legislation, must operate ex proprio vigore, to effect a reduction of expenditures. The reduction must appear as a necessary result—that is, it must be apparent to the Chair that the amendment will operate of its own force, to effect a reduction. (Manual and Digest, p. 409; Hinds, vol. 4, p. 595.) But it is not necessary for this conclusion of reduction to be established with the rigor and severity of a mathematical demonstration. It is enough if the amendment, in the opinion of the Chair, will fairly operate by its own force to retrench expenditures in one of the three ways indicated. This result must be a necessary result, not a conjectural result, or a problematical result. It is true that having reference to the difference of minds, one Chairman might hold that retrenchment would be the necessary result of an amendment, while another Chairman, or the committee on appeal, might be of a different opinion. But this is inevitable. The law is clear, for instance, that at times a court upon the facts can hold as a matter of law that there was no negligence. But, upon the same facts, one court will derive this conclusion, while another court, on appeal, will reach a different conclusion. The ruling of the Chair on these points of order is subject to appeal to the committee.

What does this amendment propose to do? The present law provides for an establishment of 15 Cavalry regiments. The proposed amendment limits the number of Cavalry regiments to 10. It is difficult for the Chair, by any fair process of reasoning, having reference to known facts, and the relative proportion between the branches of the Army, to see how 15 regiments of Cavalry can be maintained as cheaply as 10, or to hold that a reduction of the Cavalry regiments from 15 to 10 will not effect a necessary reduction in the amount which would be otherwise expended on this branch of the Army under existing law.

This amendment looks to the future, and while it provides for the officers, there is no provision for the retention of the men. But even if the men are retained, there will be a necessary reduction in the matter of horses, equipment, forage, and so forth, in the case of 10 regiments, as compared with 15. Moreover, fewer officers will be required for the military establishment upon a basis of 10 Cavalry regiments as against the existing 15. These results are certain. It is altogether problematical that such additions will be made to the Infantry that the economies effected by reducing the Cavalry regiments from 15 to 10 will be required to meet these additions to the Infantry, or to other branches of the service. Fairly considered, the necessary effect of the reduction in regiments proposed by the amendment under consideration will be a retrenchment of expenditures. If the Chair was required to determine the precise amount saved by this amendment, he would be compelled to rule it out of order. The precise amount of reduction could not be determined. That would be a matter of speculation. But it is clear that a reduction will be effected by the necessary operation of this amendment.

The Chair will cite some additional precedents in support of his ruling:

In an amendment providing that a certain class of persons, now on the pension rolls, shall hereafter not receive pensions, the retrenchment of expenditure is apparent and the amendment is in order. (Manual and Digest, p. 409.)

To the pension appropriation bill, a proposed amendment transferring the Pension Bureau from the Department of the Interior to the War Department, also providing that the offices of Commissioner and Deputy Commissioner of Pensions be abolished, and that the duties of these offices be performed by Army officers, to be designated for that purpose, without additional pay, was held to be in order, being germane, and retrenching expenditures in the manner provided by the rule. (W. L. Wilson, chairman, Hinds, vol. 4, 3887.)

An amendment to the pension appropriation bill providing that no fee shall be paid to a member of an examining board, for services in which he did not actually participate, is not subject to a point of order under this rule, since while it changed existing law, its effect is to reduce expenditures by decreasing compensation. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 52d Cong., 1st sess., p. 1792.)

The Chair does not undertake to fix in terms the amount of reduction that this amendment will carry, but that a reduction will follow seems to be a fair and necessary conclusion from its provisions. [Applause.]

The Chair wishes to say, in conclusion, that it has sought to construe this rule, in conformity with the precedents and its manifest intent, so as to give it vital force and effect, and enable the committee operating under its provisions to accomplish some positive results in the way of economic achievement. In the words of Speaker Kerr, it is a beneficent rule. It should be construed to secure beneficent results.

This ruling of the Chair does not take from the committee a particle of authority. As a condition precedent to holding that an amendment is in order under the Holman rule, the Chair must be satisfied that the necessary effect of the amendment will be a retrenchment of expenditures, in conformity with the rule; but from this ruling of the Chair holding the amendment to be in order, an appeal may be taken, and the committee in the exercise of its authority of ultimate interpretation can reverse the Chair, if it is in error, and fix the interpretation which the committee in its wisdom thinks the amendment should carry. The Chair overrules the point of order. [Applause.]

On February 15, 1912 (RECORD, p. 2093), the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the Army appropriation bill. An amendment purporting to reduce expenditures was offered and a point of order was made against the amendment. After debate the point was sustained on the ground that on the whole it did not sufficiently appear that the amendment would reduce expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not weary the committee by a restatement of principles heretofore announced in a previous decision, but before ruling will advert to certain arguments advanced in the debate of Tuesday.

In that debate it was contended that under the Holman rule in ruling on amendments to or provisions of a bill under consideration the Chair must look to the face of the paragraph, or amendment to determine from such paragraph, or amendment without extraneous aid or assistance, whether it will effect a retrenchment in expenditures. This is error. Speaker Kerr expressly ruled, and this ruling has been uniformly followed, that in determining whether an amendment will operate to retrench expenditures the Chair can look to the pending bill, the specific section or amendment under consideration, the law of the land so far as applicable, and the parliamentary rules and practices of the House. Keeping these aids to a decision in mind, the Chair must determine whether the amendment or paragraph will operate of its own force to retrench expenditures. The mere fact that the Chair may think that it is likely that a paragraph, or an amendment will very probably save a considerable sum of money to the Treasury of the United States, is not a sufficient ground on which to hold that such an amendment or paragraph is in order. In the judgment of the Chair, there must be something more. The amendment or paragraph must necessarily bring about such a result of reduction, ex proprio vigore, to be in order.

Further the view was urged upon the Chair that if the conclusion of retrenchment from the operation of an amendment or paragraph is assailed in debate, or if it requires evidence to establish such conclusion, then it does not appear from the provision itself that it will work a retrenchment, and the same will not be in order. This again is error. Any proposition may be the subject of debate. Conceding that the Chair is limited to the inspection of the face of an amendment or paragraph, even then the proper conclusion to be drawn therefrom may be very appropriately debated. The opponents of the amendment may contend with vehemence that no result of retrenchment will attend its operation, while with equal vehemence and superior logic the friends of the amendment may be able to demonstrate that such a result would be an inevitable sequence of its operation.

Hence the mere fact that the effect of a proposition may be assailed in debate will not operate to establish its invalidity, or put it beyond the pale of the Holman rule. The true doctrine is that with, or without discussion, the Chair must be satisfied, as a condition precedent to holding an amendment to be in order, that the necessary effect of the same operating by its own force will be a retrenchment of expenditures in one of the ways indicated by the rule.

The legislative provision which is under attack provides that hereafter all enlistments in the Army shall be for a term of five years. The present law provides that such enlistments shall be for a period of three years. In each case a man may reenlist at the expiration of his term. Provision is made by law for a bonus and an increase of pay on reenlistment. It is perfectly manifest, except under conditions so extraordinary that they may be eliminated from consideration, that under the five-year system of enlistment, compared with the existing three-year system, say, for a period of 15 years, there will be more reenlistments under the three-year than under the five-year system. Hence the system that will reduce the number of enlistments will effect a retrenchment of expenditures under this head. It is contended, however, that certain other results will attend the five-year system which will make it on the whole a more expensive system than the other. But these results are purely speculative and problematical, and though vehemently asserted are with equal vehemence denied. In its first and immediate operation this provision will certainly effect a manifest and considerable retrenchment.

The Chair is not satisfied that there will be any result, as a consequence of the five-year system, which will make this system on the whole more expensive, or even as expensive, as the three-year system. The Chair is satisfied as to the immediate retrenchment which will be afforded by this provision, and is far from being satisfied as to any other results. Standing alone this paragraph is in order. The next sentence of the section under consideration is in the form of a proviso, which provides, in substance, that hereafter no changes shall be made in the uniforms of officers and enlisted men, except such changes as may be made in the uniforms of enlisted men without loss or additional expense to the Government. This provision is designed to secure economy of administration, but looking to the bill, and to the law of the land so far as applicable, will this result be necessarily secured by this language standing alone? Does it require the department to do anything that it can not do, or that it may not do, under existing law? Non constat but that the department, in the absence of this provision, will pursue the very course which the proviso is intended to prescribe. It may decide of its own motion, without compulsion, to make no changes in the uniform of soldiers, save such as can be made without loss or additional cost to the Government. Hence, it can not be said that the necessary compelling effect of this proviso is to secure retrenchment. This situation is not like the one presented in the preceding section. In that case a three-year term provided for by law, and in present operation, is proposed to be substituted by a five-year term. Hence a comparison can be made between the two systems. Unless the present law is changed the department has no volition save to live under the law of three-year enlistments as it is written. In the instance under present consideration the department is under no compulsion to make changes in uniforms that will cause loss or add expense to the Government. There is no way of demonstrating that in the future it will pursue such a course. Hence, as the Chair has said, there is no way of showing that this proviso will compel a course of action other and different from that which would be pursued in its absence.

Unless it can be reasonably shown that the course hereafter to be followed by the department will add cost and expense to the Government in the matter of uniforms, and that the adoption of the proviso is necessary to compel a different course and reduce that expenditure, then this proviso does not come within the principle of the Holman rule.

The Chair is not unmindful that many amendments are likely to be offered under this rule which are on the border line of order, requiring nice discrimination to determine the side of the line to which they appropriately belong. But the Chair must be satisfied that an amendment is in order to support a favorable ruling. In the present instance the Chair is of opinion that the latter portion of the section is not in order. The point of order is made to the whole section, and under the precedents, if sustained at all, it must be sustained in its entirety. The point of order is sustained to the whole section.

On February 15, 1912 (RECORD, p. 2114), the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the Army appropriation bill. A point of order was made against a paragraph on the ground that some of the contents of the paragraph, considered as isolated propositions, did not effect a reduction of expenditures and therefore the entire paragraph was not in order.

After debate, the Chair held that the paragraph was submitted as a single proposition of related parts and was therefore to be considered as a concrete whole.

Viewed in this light, the paragraph was held to be in order on the ground that it effected by its own direct operation, a considerable reduction in expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will proceed to dispose of the point of order. Some of the arguments that have been advanced in the discussion of this point have been considered in two previous rulings, and the Chair for the purpose of defining its attitude will refer the committee to those rulings without restating them in this connection. The Chair wishes to call the attention of the committee to an essential and obvious distinction between this section, and the one upon which he ruled this morning. The section ruled on this morning contained two provisions not related to each other, not dependent the one upon the other, but associated as two separate and distinct propositions. The precedents agree that when a paragraph is objected to as a whole, and any portion of the paragraph is not in order, then the point of order when sustained goes to the whole paragraph. The Chair in ruling simply followed the precedents, though the Chair must say as to these precedents that they seem to rest on no sound, or sufficient basis of reason.

But the Chair did not feel itself at liberty to overrule them. In the present case a section is presented by the committee as a concrete whole. It is constructive legislation, in which each part bears an appropriate relation to the whole. It is an entity of related parts. It is submitted as a complete legislative proposition. This being so, it should be considered as a whole, and not in segregated items. The section is presented as a whole, and when considered as a whole, it conforms to the requirements of the Holman rule. A paragraph here and a sentence there, taken as isolated propositions, may not retrench expenditures, but the Chair does not think that a really single proposition should be picked to pieces and destroyed in this fashion, when as a correlated whole the section effects a large retrenchment. This is the reverse of the proposition of this morning. In that case the point of order went to the whole section, for an independent part of it was not in order. In this instance the point of order is not good against the whole section, for, viewed as a whole, it effects a considerable retrenchment, and is not subject to a point of order. The Chair will not entertain a point of order to a paragraph unless the different elements of the paragraph are not necessary parts of the complete proposition. The committee having jurisdiction has reported a concrete section carrying independent legislation. It should be considered as such. Looking to the correlated parts as a whole the section effects a reduction. It has not been denied in argument that this section as a whole will effect a considerable retrenchment. The Chair is of opinion that there is a manifest and distinct difference between the pending proposition, and the one upon which it ruled this morning, and that the principle which controlled the prior ruling can not be invoked in the present instance. The point of order is overruled.

On February 15, 1912 (RECORD, p. 2116), the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the Army appropriation bill, when the gentleman from New York, Mr. Fitzgerald, offered the following amendment:

Add, after the word "law," line 5, page 53, the following: "Provided, That on and after July 1, 1912, there shall not be maintained in the District of Columbia more than one disbursing office for the Signal Corps or for any one of the staff departments of the Army.

To this amendment a point of order was made by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Prince. The Chair sustained the point of order, holding that the amendment was legislation and did not necessarily retrench expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not informed whether the existing law provides for more than one disbursing officer; but suppose, for argument's sake, that it does. The Chair can not say that the necessary effect of the amendment will be to reduce expenses. One disbursing office might have as many officers in it as two disbursing offices would have. The rent for a building for one disbursing office might be as great as the rent for two buildings for two disbursing offices. This amendment does not appear to the Chair to necessarily retrench expenditures, and the point of order is sustained.

On February 16, 1912 (RECORD, p. 2127), the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the Army appropriation bill, when a point of order was made to a paragraph in the bill, on the ground that it was legislation. After debate, the Chair overruled the point of order, on the ground that while the paragraph contained legislation, it would manifestly retrench expenditures, and was therefore in order under the Holman rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already stated somewhat in extenso its opinion of the proper construction of section 2 of Rule XXI. It is impossible, in view of existing law, and having in mind at once the cost of the employees to be replaced and the cost of the employees that will take their places, not to conclude that a reduction will be effected. The amount to be paid to these employees, respectively, is fixed by law. Hence a comparison can be made. This is a constructive piece of legislation which it is competent for the committee to report by virtue of authority given it by Rule XXI under the prescribed conditions. The Chair thinks that it is manifest that this section will effect a retrenchment. The point of order is overruled.

On February 21, 1917 (RECORD, pp. 3823–3825), the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the Army appropriation bill, when an amendment was offered reducing a total, and proposing the repeal of the nitrate section of the act of 1916. A point of order to this amendment was made, and argued. The Chair held that a motion to reduce a total, coupled with an unrelated legislative proposition would not be in order under the Holman rule, for the manifest reason that the motion to reduce the total was in order without regard to the Holman rule, while the associated legislative proposition did not effect the reduction in the total, and was in no wise related to it. Hence as a part of the amendment was not in order, a point of order directed to the entire amendment was good. The point of order was sustained.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LONGWORTH: On page 48, line 2, strike out "$150,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$140,000, and that section 124 of an act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, is hereby repealed."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] contains two parts, one a proposition to reduce the amount appropriated in the bill from $150,000 to $140,000, the other a proposition for the repeal of a section of existing law. It is insisted that this amendment is in order under the Holman rule. The Chair has had occasion heretofore to construe this rule on various occasions, and in these rulings has been disposed to give the rule a liberal interpretation. But this latitude of interpretation has never been extended to mean that a motion to reduce an appropriation, makes in order an unrelated and ungermane proposition of accompanying legislation. The principles announced in the decisions cited do not support the contention that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is in order. The motion to reduce the amount appropriated, is in order without regard to the accompanying repealing legislation. It is plain that the reduction will not follow from the proposed legislation. It is in no wise related to it, much less a necessary product of it. It is in order as a separate proposition on its merits, and the fact that it is coupled with unrelated legislation, does not operate to make that legislation in order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I interrupt the Chair at that point?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What would be the necessary result if this nitrate scheme be repealed? Would it not be that the Government would be under less expense investigating this whole proposition and spending money to pay Army engineers' expenses therefor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will proceed to answer the query of the gentleman.

Mr. FIELDS. The engineers doing river and harbor work are not appropriated for in this bill. They are 21 in number, and they are appropriated for under the river and harbor bill, as is stated in the hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. I am asked what would be the effect of the legislative part of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, if adopted? The answer is that this repealing amendment, if adopted, would effect a great reduction of general expenditures, but it does not follow therefrom that this legislation will be in order, as an amendment. What is the connection between the two propositions embraced in the amendment? As pointed out heretofore they are unrelated. The precedents require that there must be some necessary relationship between the legislation proposed, and the reduction to be effected in the expenditures comprehended in the bill under consideration. The amount carried in the bill can be reduced by a motion to that effect, which as an independent proposition will be in order. This motion would relate to the expenditures in the bill. But the reduction intended to be effected by the repealing legislation is outside of the bill. The Holman rule requires that amendatory legislation on an appropriation bill must not only effect a retrenchment in the expenditures carried in the bill, but must be germane to the bill. To what language in the paragraph under consideration is the proposed legislation germane? In this connection the Chair will call attention to the language of the paragraph—

For expenses incident to military engineer operations in the field, including the purchase of material, etc., and such expenses as are ordinarily provided for under appropriations for engineer depots, civilian assistants to engineer officers, and "maps, War Department."

How can it be argued that a proposition of legislation which proposes to repeal the nitrate plant section of the act of 1916, is germane to the language cited? It has already been pointed out that an independent proposition of legislation can not by mere association with an unrelated proposition to reduce an item in a bill, be thereby rendered in order. If this proposition of legislation effected the reduction proposed, and was germane to the bill under consideration, it would fall within the principle of the Holman rule, and be in order. Plainly, however, this legislation is neither germane to the paragraph, nor related to the motion to reduce the appropriation in the bill from $150,000 to $140,000. The point of order is sustained.

On June 16, 1916, the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the Army appropriation bill. Mr. TILSON, of Connecticut, offered an amendment containing legislation, coupled with a reduction of a total. A point of order was made to the amendment. The Chair held that an amendment reducing a total, and including legislation that did not effect this reduction, and was in no wise related to it, was not in order. A proposition of legislation to be in order on an appropriation bill, under the Holman rule, must patently reduce expenditures. This was held not to be true of the legislation in the amendment proposed.

Amendment by Mr. TILSON: Page 12, line 23, strike out "$2,877,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$2,874,500: Provided, That hereafter when any officer who has been retired for disability is found by an examining board, to be appointed by the Secretary of War, to be physically and mentally qualified for active service, the President may, in his discretion, reinstate such officer upon the active list as an extra officer, with the rank and relative position he would have held if he had not been retired: Provided further, That such officer shall continue as an extra officer only until such time as a vacancy shall occur in his grade and arm of the service, and if again retired for disability he shall be retired with the rank and pay received by him before his retirement."

The CHAIRMAN. Having in mind the possible number of restorations that will reasonably follow upon the enactment of this amendment, and the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Roberts, that an officer who was retired in one rank might be restored in an advanced rank carrying larger pay, it is perfectly clear, to the Chair at least, that it can not be reasonably ascertained that the operation of this amendment will reduce expenditures. The view taken by the Chair is that the crucial test of a proposition submitted under the Holman rule is whether it will effect a retrenchment. In this connection I am referring to the legislative feature of the amendment. The Chair, before holding such a legislative proposition to be in order, must be satisfied to a reasonable certainty that in its working effect it will reduce expenditures. I am not satisfied that a reduction of expenditures will attach to the operation of this amendment. Hence it is not within the rule, and the point of order must be sustained.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, one moment. The amendment itself carries a reduction.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but the Chair has ruled heretofore that a reduction can not be made a peg on which to hang any sort of unrelated legislation. If the legislation brings about the reduction, that is another situation; but the mere fact that a part of an amendment proposes a reduction in the figures of an appropriation, will not justify accompanying legislation which can not be reasonably regarded as the efficient cause of the reduction. The legislation must be the efficient inducing cause of the reduction.

On March 12, 1918 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 3405), the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the legislative bill. Mr. RUCKER of Missouri offered an amendment alleged to be in order under the Holman rule. A point of order was made to the amendment. The Chair sustained the objection holding that it was not clear that the amendment would reduce expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RUCKER offers the following amendment: Insert as a new paragraph, following line 6 on page 107, the following:

"Appointment shall not be made to any of the positions herein appropriated for in the classified service of the Patent Office not actually filled June 30, 1918, nor shall more than 25 per cent of other vacancies actually occurring in any grade in the classified service of that bureau, during the fiscal year 1919, be filled by original appointment or promotion. The salaries or compensation of all places which may not be filled as hereinabove provided for shall not be available for expenditure, but shall lapse and shall be covered into the Treasury. The provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to any position with a salary of $2,250 or above that sum."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to the amendment that it is legislation, and that it can not come under the Holman rule, which retrenches expenditures. There are no vacancies in the Patent Office, such as exist in the Pension Bureau, and this is therefore an entirely different proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The vacancies referred to, as the Chair understands the situation, were of record, and undisputed. The Chair will call attention to the fact that the amendment proposed presents an entirely different situation from the one heretofore ruled upon. It may be very likely, indeed highly probable, in the light of experience, that there will be vacancies during the time to which the amendment relates. But that is a purely speculative proposition. In the case referred to there were actual existing vacancies which could not be filled, provided the paragraph remained in the bill. The retention of that paragraph kept those vacancies from being filled, and that result was, in effect, a reduction of existing employees of the Government, and of official salaries. That reduction brought the paragraph within the benefit of the Holman rule. But the case in hand is, as stated, a speculative proposition. There may be vacancies hereafter arising. It is highly probable that these vacancies will occur, but that is as far as we can go. The Chair can not say that there is a moral certainty that these vacancies will take place, and unless it is a moral certainty that they will occur, thereby taking that occurrence out of the domain of speculation, the amendment proposed will not operate ex proprio vigore, to reduce expenditures. The Chair sustains the point of order.

On January 16, 1913 (RECORD, p. 1635), the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considering the Army bill. An amendment to reduce a total, coupled with unrelated legislation, was submitted. To this amendment a point of order was made. After debate the Chair held that the legislation would not effect a reduction of expenditures, and the amendment therefore was not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. First, in relation to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that the amount covered in this bill will be reduced, it may be said that the suggestion is well taken. The aggregate total is proposed to be reduced by the amount of $2,500. Having this reduction in mind, it is argued that germane legislation sufficient to account for that reduction would be in order. It is true that germane legislation effecting a reduction would be in order. But unrelated legislation can not be attached to figures representing reduction and thereby made in order. An amendment reducing a total does not require the authority of the Holman rule, and hence it can not be used to make in order legislation which is not the necessary and efficient cause of the reduction. Using the reduction in the total as a peg, it is not in order to hang on the same all sorts of unrelated legislation. The reduction must be accounted for by the legislation, and the point that the Chair undertakes to present in this connection is that, after listening to the contention of the participants in this debate, and looking to the amendment, he is unable to perceive that in its necessary operation the amendment will effect the reduction of $2,500, or any portion thereof. If it will not effect this reduction, then it is not in order. If it does account for it, the Chair will hold that the amendment is in order. From the arguments submitted, the Chair understands that the possible effect of this amendment will be to restore an indefinite number of officers to their old pay, or possibly to greater pay, since their grade may be advanced. This may, or may not render the promotions of other officers unnecessary, or reduce the number required. For a time at least they might receive this increased pay without rendering service. It is difficult to see that in its operation as a whole, this amendment will reduce expenditures. In fact its economic operation is altogether problematical. The Chair sustains the point or order.

On January 16, 1913 (RECORD, p. 1645) the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considering the Army appropriation bill, when Mr. Cox, of Indiana, offered an amendment reducing a total, coupled with unrelated legislation not effecting a reduction of expenditures.

A point of order was made, and sustained by the Chair.

Amendment by Mr. COX: Amend page 14, by striking out lines 20, 21, 22, and 23, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"For mileage to officers, dental surgeons, veterinarians, contract surgeons, pay clerks, and expert accountant, Inspector General's Department, when authorized by law, $392,855: Provided, That hereafter all officers of the Army when traveling under orders shall be paid their actual traveling expenses and no more."

The CHAIRMAN. Before ruling the Chairman will make a statement of the essential facts. The principles of the ruling having been heretofore announced, it is unnecessary to restate them.

First, with relation to the reduction in the total amount, it may be stated that an amendment to this effect does not require the Holman rule to make it in order. The gentleman from Indiana can offer an amendment effecting a reduction in any aggregate total without reference to this rule. But in respect to the legislative portion of the amendment, the Chair will say that if the allowance of 7 cents a mile was merely intended to cover the cost of railroad transportation the Pullman charges, tips, and meals on the train, the Chair would not have the slightest hesitation in reaching the conclusion that a provision for actual expenses would necessarily reduce expenses, having reference to common knowledge of the facts of the cost of railway travel.

But another feature is presented. It appears that this allowance of 7 cents a mile is intended to cover expenses other than the cost of travel on railways, tips, Pullman fares and the cost of meals. When the party entitled to this allowance reaches his destination, his expenses for an indefinite period are to be paid out of the same fund. Sometimes the allowance might be more than sufficient to pay the cost of travel and the additional costs accruing at the point of destination. At other times this allowance might be insufficient. Having reference to the aggregate of expenses it is a matter of speculation, whether an allowance of 7 cents a mile, or the payment of actual expenses would be the cheaper policy for the Government. But looking in the hearings to the testimony of one man who ought to have some practical, I might almost say expert knowledge on the subject (I refer to the testimony of Gen. Aleshire), I find that he states that in his judgment, under the policy of paying actual expenses, as compared with an allowance of 7 cents a mile, the Government would be the loser, and the officer the gainer.

Having in mind then all the facts, including the statement of this witness, how can the Chair conclude that this amendment will reasonably and sufficiently operate to reduce expenses? And yet to hold that this amendment is in order the Chair must be reasonably satisfied that the legislative portion of the amendment operating of its own force will effect a reduction of expenditures. This is the whole question as the Chair sees it. So far as the Chair is apprised, this amendment will not necessarily effect a retrenchment. The Chair sustains the point of order to the amendment.

On June 10, 1916, the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considering the Army appropriation bill, when an amendment proposing a comprehensive scheme of legislation was offered to a paragraph in the bill. A point of order was made to the amendment and discussed at length. The Chair held that a paragraph in an appropriation bill, embodying legislation may be perfected by an amendment germane to the legislation in the paragraph, but that additional legislation affording further illegalities was not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The chief difficulty that the Chair has had in this matter has been the difficulty in arriving at the facts necessary for a decision. The gentleman from Illinois seeks to bring this amendment within the rule relating to perfecting by amendment a paragraph, originally not in order, but which has become in order by the failure to raise the question of order. The existing law which the paragraph in the bill proposes to suspend is as follows:

Not more than one-half of all of the officers detailed in said corps shall at any time be stationed or assigned to or employed upon any duty in or near the District of Columbia.

The language in lines 8, 9, 10, and 11 of the amending paragraph is intended to suspend the operation of the above-cited law, under certain prescribed conditions. Should the paragraph containing this language remain in the bill, the President in time of actual war, or in an emergency, will have authority to call all of the detailed officers to Washington. An amendment germane to this particular proposition would be one providing, for instance, that some number of detailed officers less than the total might be stationed or employed in or near the District of Columbia. Other germane amendments will naturally suggest themselves. But the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is not limited to affecting or controlling the number of officers that may be assigned to duty in, or near the District of Columbia. It proposes a comprehensive scheme of legislation in the guise of a perfecting amendment, and falls within the following principle:

To a bill amending a general law on a specific point, an amendment relating to the terms of the law rather than to those of the bill was offered and ruled not to be germane. (5 Hinds, sec. —.)

It also falls within this principle:

A paragraph which proposes legislation in a general appropriation bill being permitted to remain may be perfected by a germane amendment, but this does not permit an amendment which contains additional legislation. (Rules of House, sec. 824.)

Assuredly the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois contains a large amount of additional legislation.

The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

On February 20, 1917 (RECORD, pp. 3709 to 3711), the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, when Mr. Gardner, of Massachusetts, offered an amendment alleged to perfect a paragraph containing legislation in the bill. A point of order was made against the amendment. After debate the Chair ruled that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts carried a further degree of illegality relating to the body of the paragraph, and was not a germane development of the language proposed to be amended. The point of order was sustained.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARDNER: Page 12, line 2, after the word "section," strike out the quotation marks and insert:

"Provided, That hereafter the monthly pay of enlisted men of the Army shall be increased as follows: Master electricians and all others receiving $75, to $85; master engineer, junior grade, Corps of Engineers, from $65 to $75; sergeant, first class, Medical Department, from $50 to $60; first sergeants, from $45 to $65; sergeant, first class, Corps of Engineers, and all others receiving $45, to $55; battalion sergeants major of Infantry, and all others receiving $40, to $50; sergeants of Engineers, and all others receiving $36, to $46; sergeants of Cavalry, Infantry, and Artillery, from $30 to $40; quartermaster sergeants of Cavalry, and all others receiving $30, to $40; corporals of Engineers, Ordnance, Signal Corps, Cavalry, Artillery, and Infantry, from $24 and $21 to $38; chief mechanics, and all others receiving $24, to $34; saddlers, and all others receiving $21, to $31; privates, first class, and all others receiving $18, to $28; privates, second class, and all others receiving $15, to $25."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Gardner, a day or two ago called the attention of the Chair to certain precedents in this connection. These precedents have been duly examined and found to be difficult of reconciliation. The general proposition with which the Members are all familiar, is that a paragraph in a bill which contains matter not in order, is subject to a point of order even though the offending and illegal matter may constitute but a relatively small proportion of the entire paragraph. A point of order is good either against the entire paragraph, or the offending matter. But if the point of order is not made to the paragraph, or offending matter, then the entire paragraph becomes in order. It has been held in the latter case that such a paragraph may be perfected by a germane amendment. (Hinds, vol. 4, secs. 3823–3835, 3838.) Hence the question has often arisen whether these perfecting amendments should be germane to the paragraph as a whole, thereby adding a new and greater proposition of illegality than that contained in the original offending matter, or germane only to this matter which has become in order by reason of the failure to raise the question of illegality. The precedents are conflicting. It has been held that the right to perfect a paragraph which would have been out of order if the question had been raised, by a germane amendment, does not permit an amendment which adds an additional proposition of illegality. (Hinds, vol. 4, secs. 3836, 3837, 3862.)

In other words, the latter precedents require the perfecting amendment to be germane to the original offending language in the paragraph. If the amendments carrying additional legislation are germane to the offending language, they are in order, but not so if they relate rather to the body of the paragraph. This proposition is clearly stated in the following decision:

If a paragraph has been included in a bill which has in it a taint of illegality, that paragraph can be corrected or perfected by an amendment, but if the paragraph which is proposed as an amendment carries a further degree of illegality, affecting the whole paragraph as amended, then it is not in order.

The offending matter in the paragraph under consideration is contained in these words:

As expert first-class gunners, Field Artillery, $5 per month.

It can hardly be said that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts is germane to this language, and designed to perfect it. This being so, the Chair holds that a new and comprehensive proposition of illegality is sought to be added to the paragraph by the proposed amendment. For this reason, and in conformity with the precedents cited, the Chair sustains the point of order.

On May 21, 1918 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 6868), the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considering the bill relating to food production. The gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] offered an amendment inhibiting for the time prescribed therein the use of food or food materials in the manufacture or preparation of alcoholic beverages. A point of order was made to the amendment on the ground that it was not germane. After debate the point of order was sustained. The ruling and colloquy follow:

The CHAIRMAN. In order that the situation may be clearly apprehended by members of the committee, the Chair will read, first, the language of the paragraph, and then the language of the proposed amendment. The language of the paragraph is:

Fourth. For increasing food production and eliminating waste and promoting conservation of food by education and demonstrational methods, through county, district, and urban agents and others, $6,100,000.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] is in the following words:

That in order to further eliminate waste and to promote conservation of food, it shall be unlawful, during the existence of the war with Germany, to use any food or food materials in the manufacture or preparation of alcoholic beverages.

In order to ascertain whether or not this amendment is germane to the paragraph, it becomes necessary to determine the purport, and effect of the matter proposed to be amended. If the paragraph had concluded with the word "food" in line 25, so that it would read as follows:

For increasing food production and eliminating waste and promoting conservation of food, $6,100,000—

there would be no doubt in the mind of any member of the committee that the amendment would be absolutely in order. But that is not the paragraph. The paragraph in its entirety proposes to increase food production, eliminate waste, and promote conservation of food by certain indicated processes, namely, by, educational and demonstrational methods, through county, district and urban agents. In other words, lecturers are to be sent out to instruct the public with respect to their farming activities, and the household arts so that in the result production will be increased, waste will be eliminated, and food will be conserved. If it was proposed by the amendment that some of the money which is appropriated should be utilized in the employment of agents to instruct the public in the folly of converting food products into alcoholic beverages for public consumption, such an amendment would be in order, and in perfect harmony with the avowed purposes of the paragraph. It would come within the manifest scope and intent of this particular portion of the bill. But that is not what is intended to be effected by the amendment. The amendment does not provide for the education of the public, or for demonstrational methods in order to convince them of the folly of utilizing food products to produce alcoholic drinks, but to absolutely inhibit the use of such products for alcoholic conversion.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am inclined to think the Chairman overlooked the fact that the paragraph goes further than he says. It reads:

For increasing food production and eliminating waste and promoting conservation of food by educational and demonstrational methods, through county, district, and urban agents and others.

Just what "others" means there may be a little uncertain. There is one thing certain, and that is that you can not say that it refers to other agents, because the language used is "through county, district, and urban agents," which would include all classes of agents. It means other methods. Then, if the Chair will pardon me a moment, the very fact that it enumerates the methods by which these proposed conservations of food should be attained, namely, by educational methods, does not preclude its accomplishment by other and similar means and other agencies. For an instance, the rule is, if you authorize the construction of one public building, we will say, in New York City, that will be restricted to New York City, and, according to the Chairman's construction, will preclude an amendment constructing buildings elsewhere; but if you have a bill for the construction of public buildings in New York City and Cincinnati, we might add 40 other places, because the general proposition is to construct public buildings, and the place has nothing to do with it. The general proposition of this paragraph is to conserve food and prevent waste, and therefore, because it says by educational and demonstrational methods, does not preclude other methods that may be used to accomplish the same results.

The CHAIRMAN. If the paragraph carried the meaning suggested by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], then of course the relevancy, or the germaneness of the amendment would be apparent. But the Chair does not think that it can be successfully maintained that the chief purpose of this paragraph is to increase food production, eliminate waste and promote the conservation of food. If that was the chief purpose of the paragraph, then it would end with the word "food" in line 25, thereby rendering possible an infinite variety of methods to accomplish the purposes indicated. Eliminate the words providing the methods by which production is to be increased, waste eliminated, and food is to be conserved, and the amendment of the gentleman from California would be plainly germane and in order. But the committee evidently did not intend that the department should have free rein to accomplish the results intended, and secure the elimination of waste by any means that seemed good to them. Hence the use of the restrictive language confining the activities of the department to certain indicated lines of accomplishment. The plain meaning of the paragraph is to provide the means whereby the results intended may be secured along certain restricted lines of endeavor. The Agricultural Department is "cabin'd, cribbed, and confined," so to say, to the restricted paths of activity marked out for it to pursue.

As to the suggested meaning of the word "others," it occurs to the Chair that this word ought to be interpreted to mean "other educational and demonstrational methods," in view of the general meaning of the paragraph. For instance bulletins might be sent out. It is perfectly true that a general subject may be amended by a specific subject of the same character, but the amendment of the gentleman from California is not a specific subject of this general subject. This amendment does not propose to eliminate waste, to increase food products, or to promote conservation by any educational process, but is a flat legislative inhibition upon certain practices. Therefore it is not a specific subject of the same character as the general subject. The general subject is to increase food production, and so forth, by educational and demonstrational methods.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Chair permit me to interrupt him again?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. I feel very certain the Chair is mistaken about the purpose of the paragraph. The sole purpose of the paragraph is "for increasing food production and eliminating waste and promoting conservation of food." Now, that is the intent, purpose, and object of the legislation. The method by which it is to be done as set out here is "by educational and demonstrational methods, through county, district, and urban agents, and others." But the whole object and intent to be accomplished by the legislation is that of conserving food and preventing waste, and it merely directs here by what particular way it may be done; and that being true, it becomes apparent you can add any other similar method to accomplish the same result.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not agree with the gentleman from Arkansas in that view of the paragraph. The methods indicated are not illustrative of what may be done, but are restrictive, confining the expenditure of the money appropriated to them, and them only. The department could not expend this money otherwise than as indicated, namely on educational and demonstrational methods. The suggestion has been made that certain legislation in this bill has been made in order by the rule, and that this amendment would be in order to this legislation. In this connection the Chair will say that if there is any legislation in this bill, made in order by the rule, to which this amendment would be relevant and germane, then the amendment can be offered when that legislation is reached, and it will then be in order. This matter has been very earnestly argued by gentlemen who have taken a different view of the meaning of the paragraph from that held by the Chair. If their interpretation of the paragraph is correct, then the Chair will admit that the amendment is in order. Hence the propriety of the ruling on this point depends upon the meaning proper to be imputed to the paragraph. In that view it might be well to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair so as to afford the opportunity for full discussion of the paragraph on the appeal, and thereby secure an authoritative disposition of this question by the committee itself. The Chair has sought to set out in full the reasons for the conclusion reached, and in view of that conclusion is constrained to sustain the point of order.

On March 14, 1918 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 3514 to 3515), the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considering the legislative bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] offered an amendment proposing legislation. A point of order was made on this ground, and the further ground that it was not germane.

The Chair held that the amendment did not confine itself to perfecting the matter contained in the bill, but afforded new, and additional illegalities. The amendment was held out of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 1, after the word "that," insert the word "hereafter"; and after the word "received," on the fifth line, page 1, strike out all down to and including the word "annum," on line 7, and insert the following: "$120 per annum in addition to the basic salary for the fiscal year 1919."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that it is not subject to a point of order. If the gentleman from Tennessee wants to state the ground of his point of order, I will yield to him.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My point of order is based on the ground that the amendment provides for employees of the Government during the fiscal year 1919. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois undertakes to make it permanent law. In addition, I do not think the proposed amendment is germane.

The CHAIRMAN. This matter stands as follows: The committee might have reported the amendment now under consideration, as a part of the legislative bill. In that event this matter would have been subject to a point of order, and once made, the point of order would have been sustained, and the offending matter stricken from the bill. But suppose this point of order had not been made. Then the paragraph would have remained in the bill, subject to amendment under the rules. One of these rules is that when offending matter is allowed to remain in a bill, it is then in order to perfect that matter, by appropriate, germane amendments. But that rule does not mean, and should never be held to mean, that the presence of illegal matter in a paragraph of an appropriation bill, thereby makes in order any amendment to the paragraph, however much that amendment may increase the original illegality or however far it falls short of being a perfecting amendment. On the contrary, the rule is well established, and the Chair referred to the precedents a few days ago, that while it is in order to amend a paragraph and perfect the otherwise illegal matter by germane amendments, these amendments must not add new and additional illegalities.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the Chair indulge me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the Chair then hold that it would be improper to move to strike out the item that I am seeking to amend?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at all. Such a motion would be perfectly in order. The Chair was on the point of illustrating the situation, by reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois. What does this amendment propose to do? Not to perfect the matter contained in the committee amendment, but to add a new element of illegality. It would be in order for the gentleman to move to strike out the paragraph. It would also be in order for him to move to increase the amounts proposed to be paid to the clerks. The precise respect in which this amendment is out of order does not consist in the fact that it proposes to increase the compensation of certain indicated clerks, beyond the limits fixed by law. It would be entirely in order to deal with that situation, by an amendment to increase or diminish the amounts proposed to be paid, or by a motion to strike out the paragraph or by some other germane amendment, but that is not what the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois undertakes to do. It proposes to make this increase permanent law, thereby adding a new and large element of illegality to the paragraph. This addition of a new element of illegality in the way of legislation can not be fairly construed as a germane, perfecting amendment of the paragraph. The precedents appropriate to this ruling have been heretofore cited in another decision.

For the reasons given the Chair is clearly of the opinion that the amendment is out of order. The point of order is sustained.

On September 19, 1918 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 10510), the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the revenue bill, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] offered an amendment alleged to be in order, on the ground that it proposed to raise revenue. A point of order was made to the amendment on the ground that the amendment was not germane, since it proposed to raise revenue in a fashion totally different from any method provided in the bill. Hence the amendment was not germane to any item in the bill, or to the subject matter in the bill. After argument the Chair sustained the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The ruling in this case depends upon the construction of subsection 3, of Rule XXI, and its application to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. This subsection is to the following effect:

That no amendment shall be in order to a bill affecting revenue which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill; nor shall any amendment be in order to an item in the bill unless the amendment is directly related to such item.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] in arguing this matter suggests, if the Chair understands his argument correctly, that his amendment is in order because this is a bill to raise revenue, and his amendment proposes to raise revenue.

Whether the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in order or not must be determined by reference to the positive rules of the House relating to amendments to a revenue bill. Manifestly the intent or purpose of a bill is a very different thing from the subject matter in the bill. The intent of this bill is to raise revenue. There is nothing in the subsection of the rule which the Chair has cited which refers in any wise to the intent or purpose of a bill. The subject matter in a bill is the aggregate of the different items which under the rates proposed and the legislation provided, will raise the revenue required and thereby make effectual the intent of the bill. If the gentleman's amendment is considered to be in order on the ground suggested, namely that this is a revenue bill, then there is no amendment proposing to raise revenue that would not be in order. This bill provides a tax on livery boots. Leather enters into the making of livery boots. Is it conceivable that because an item in the bill taxes boots made of leather, an amendment would be in order establishing a tariff duty on the importation of hides, of which leather is made? Another item provides for a tax on candy. Sugar is a large element in candy. Would it be argued that if this was the only reference to sugar in the bill it would be in order to impose an excise tax on sugar? Another item in the bill taxes adding machines. Iron enters into the manufacture of adding machines. Because the bill taxes a manufactured product that contains iron as a component material, would an amendment be in order taxing pig iron, or iron ore in its natural state? Yet the argument would be the same for all of these amendments, as for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, since they all propose to raise revenue.

The Chair is not concerned with the merits of this proposition, and accepts in this connection the suggestion made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that the question under consideration is merely one of order. A rule may be wise, or it may be unwise. A rule may limit the powers of the House, or of the committee, but if it plainly states its purpose, if its meaning is clear, then the fact that it limits the power of the House, or of the committee to deal with some particular subject matter is no concern of the Chair, which is interested only in arriving at the true meaning of the rule. Many rules are avowedly for the very purpose of limiting the House in dealing with the subject matters under consideration, in order that the House may legislate sanely and conservatively. Such a rule, and one with which we have frequent experience, is the one prohibiting legislation on an appropriation bill. That rule limits immensely the powers of the Committee of the Whole, and of the House; yet it is accepted as a just and wise rule, although in many instances the House is confronted with situations in which, but for the express limitation of this rule, it would add wholesome legislation to an appropriation bill.

There have been many decisions on this point, so that it is not necessary for the Chair to elaborate this ruling to any great extent. The decision cited by the gentleman from Georgia is precisely in point. There is no difference whatever between the facts in the case cited and the facts of the case under present consideration. The decision of the Chairman in that case sustained the point of order, and that decision on appeal was sustained by a vote of the committee. Another ruling in point, was by Mr. Speaker CLARK on a motion to recommit a tariff bill with instructions to report the same with an amendment providing for a tariff commission. The motion was elaborately argued, and the Speaker made a most elaborate ruling, pointing out that the subject matter in the bill was an aggregate of items subjected to tariff taxation, while the amendment proposed to create a commission to collect information in relation to tariffs. The amendment proposed to deal with the tariff in an entirely different manner from that contained in the bill, and it was held to be nongermane and out of order. The ruling of the Speaker was sustained on appeal. In this connection the Chair will also cite the elaborate ruling of Chairman ALEXANDER found in the Manual under the heading of "Important Rulings." The rulings on the point raised by the gentleman from Georgia, as stated a moment ago, are very numerous. This is not a question of first impression. Hence it is hardly necessary for the Chair to elaborate any further the reasons why he holds in conformity with the precedents that this particular amendment is not germane to the subject matter in the bill, nor does it directly relate to any item in the bill.

The Chair, however, does not suppose that the amendment is offered upon the theory that it directly relates to an item in the bill, since no citation has been made of such item. It is not germane to the subject matter in the bill, since there is nothing in the bill resembling the subject matter of this particular amendment. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

On September 19, 1918 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 10510 to 10511), the House was in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considering the revenue bill, when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] offered an amendment relating to the products of industrial plants employing children of certain ages. A point of order was made to the amendment. After discussion the Chair ruled that the amendment was not germane to the subject matter in the bill, or to any item in the bill. The point of order was sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Page 129, after line 22, insert a new subdivision, as follows:

"(27) Articles or commodities, the product of any mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment within the United States in which children under the age of 14 years have been employed or permitted to work, or children between the ages of 14 and 16 have been employed or permitted to work more than eight hours in any day, or more than six days in any week, or after the hour of 6 o'clock post meridian during any portion of the taxable year, 5 per cent."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would like to be heard very briefly. I do not think that the ruling which has just been made with reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is controlling upon this amendment which I have offered. The Chair will observe that this is an amendment not to a particular item or a particular paragraph, but is an amendment to section 9, which imposes a tax to be paid by manufacturers upon certain products. Different items are therein specified. It is true that this adds one other item. It extends the list, but it simply adds one of a class without extending the class. It is unquestionably germane to this particular title, and I do not think it comes within the inhibition of Rule XXI, which was cited by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. The question is, What manufactured goods shall be the subject of tax? The amendment relates back to the very opening of this title specifying the taxation of certain goods and adds one more. At the time of the reciprocity bill, when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] was in the chair, there was added to the bill in the same way, in relation to items which were included in the free list, a number of different articles. The Chair overruled the point of order against their inclusion. I think that the ruling of the Chair heretofore made is not decisive upon the particular amendment which I have offered and that the point of order ought to be overruled.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recalls the ruling made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and cited by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN]. However the decisions which the Chair cited this morning in connection with the ruling then announced, were made subsequent to the ruling of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], and if that ruling and the rulings cited by the Chair are supposed to be in conflict, the latter will be regarded as overruling the lone contrary decision. The Chair has examined the amendment, and comparing it with the bill does not find in the body of the bill any paragraph in which the subject matter is proposed to be dealt with in a manner in any wise resembling the manner in which this amendment proposes to deal with and dispose of the subject matters to which it relates.

This being so, the Chair does not see how under the rulings that have been heretofore made, this amendment can be regarded as germane to the subject matter in the bill. If it is considered to be germane to any item in the bill the Chair has not been cited to that item.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the Chair will pardon me just a moment, the preceding paragraph refers to a large number of manufactured articles. Now, I do not see how the Chair can determine whether or not those articles have been manufactured by child labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not undertake so to determine. The bill puts a tax on those articles but the amendment specifically proposes to deal with the same in a very different fashion from that proposed by the bill. If the Chair is correct in his former ruling, he does not see how this amendment can be in order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

On March 15, 1918 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 3562 to 3563), the House was in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the legislative bill, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN] offered an amendment as a limitation. A point of order was made to the amendment. The Chair held that the amendment was not a limitation on the appropriation, but legislation in the form of a limitation. Further, that it did not appear that it would effect a retrenchment, and hence was not in order under the Holman rule. The point of order was sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment offered by Mr. LUNN: "No part of any amount herein appropriated shall be used to pay salaries or for personal services in any executive department, bureau, or office of the United States which does not, subject to the provisions and exceptions of section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act, approved March 15, 1898, require eight hours of labor each day: Provided, That the foregoing limitations shall not apply to employees in any bureau or establishment where such employees are not paid time and one-half for overtime."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that. It provides for the method of payment of the employees of the United States. It is really legislation, and not germane to the amendment. It is not a limitation on the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asked for a discussion of the point of order, because he was somewhat in doubt as to the ruling proper to be made. The substitute of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNN], is offered to the Borland amendment, and it is insisted that it is in order as a limitation. This question of limitation under the rules of the House, is frequently misapprehended, and amendments offered as limitations, are often not limitations at all, under our precedents. This substitute is presented as a limitation, and therefore presumed to be in order. But the Borland amendment is really not a limitation on an appropriation bill. It is in substance, legislation on an appropriation bill, and would be out of order, but for the Holman rule. It is cast in the form of a limitation, but in essence it requires the executive departments to which it relates to maintain an eight-hour system. But since the effect of the Borland amendment is to secure a larger return of work to the Government for the amount of money expended that would otherwise be paid for a less return of work, it effects a retrenchment of Government expenditures, and is therefore in order. The Borland amendment is something more than a negative prohibition on the use of moneys. In this connection, in order that the nature of a limitation may be more perfectly apprehended, it will be well to cite some of the precedents.

Legislation may not be proposed in the form of a limitation. (4 Hinds, sec. 3931.)

The House by limitation on a general appropriation bill may provide that no part of an appropriation shall be used for a certain purpose. (4 Hinds, 3917.)

This is upon the theory that the House may deny an appropriation for a purpose authorized by law. It is not in order to legislate as to the qualifications of the recipients of an appropriation, but the House can specify that no part of an appropriation shall go to recipients lacking certain qualifications. (4 Hinds, sec. 3942.)

A limitation is negative in its nature. (4 Hinds, sec. 3955.)

The limitation must be upon the appropriation and not an affirmative limitation of official functions. (4 Hinds, sec. 3957.)

A limitation must not include positive enactments establishing rules for executive officers. (4 Hinds, sec. 3967.)

The limitation permitted on a general appropriation bill must in effect be a negative prohibition on the use of money, not an affirmative direction to an executive officer. (4 Hinds, sec. 3974.)

Now the Borland amendment provides that the salaries afforded by the committee amendment shall not be paid to the clerks in any executive department, bureau, or office of the United States which does not require eight hours of labor a day. It does not relate to recipients lacking certain qualifications, but to hours of work required by departments, bureaus, and offices of the United States. Even if the department or bureau has authority under law to work its employees less than eight hours a day, this amendment in substance says to such a department, you must work your employees for as much as eight hours a day in order to enjoy the benefit of the appropriation, designed for the payment of employees. The objection that this amendment, is in effect legislation, is cured as noted above by the fact that the increased return in work secured by requiring the employees to work for eight hours a day, instead of seven and a half as formerly, but at the same compensation, will operate a reduction of expenditures, thereby bringing the amendment within the saving effect of the Holman rule. But what will be the effect of the substitute?

The substitute in substance provides that the Borland amendment shall not apply to any department, bureau or office, where the clerks are working for eight hours, or less than eight hours, with no provision for pay for overtime work. Hence in all such departments, bureaus and offices, the clerks will receive the compensation provided by the committee amendment. The substitute further provides that in those departments, bureaus and offices, where the clerks work eight hours, and are paid time and a half for overtime, the Borland amendment shall apply, that is that the employees in such bureaus, departments, and offices, shall also receive the compensation provided by the committee amendment. In this view of the effect of the substitute which is to replace the Borland amendment, how can it be argued that the substitute which is legislation, will reduce expenditures? If it will not operate ex proprio vigore, to reduce expenditures, then it is not in order. The substitute must be considered with reference to its operation, meaning, and effect, as a whole. In the opinion of the Chair, the substitute is legislation. It is not shown that it will effect a retrenchment. Hence it is not within the Holman rule. Further the Chair does not think that the substitute can be regarded as a pure limitation. For the reasons given, the point of order to the substitute is sustained.

On March 15, 1912, the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considering the Army appropriation bill, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania offered an amendment. A point of order was made to the amendment. The Chair held that the amendment was a limitation of authority and therefore legislation. Hence it was out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the close of line 13 the following:

"That from and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful for any department or bureau of the United States to sell any arms of any kind, manufactured or acquired by such department or bureau for naval or military purposes, except as hereinafter provided: And provided further, That whenever any arms of any kind intended for naval or military purposes shall be condemned by any department or bureau of the United States, or shall become unfit for official use by such department or bureau, they shall be so broken or otherwise mutilated as to render them harmless as instruments of warfare or violence, and only when so broken or mutilated shall they be sold or disposed of by any such department or bureau."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not a limitation on expenditures, but a limitation of authority, and an affirmative direction. The point of order is sustained.

On April 29, 1918 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 5790), the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering H. R. 11259, when the Chairman made the following ruling affecting the relative rights to the floor of a Member who has been recognized to speak to a motion to strike out a paragraph, and of another Member asking preferential recognition on the ground that he wished to submit an amendment to perfect the paragraph. The Chair ruled that the Member who had been recognized could not be taken from the floor, but that the perfecting amendments could be offered later and would be submitted to be voted upon by the committee before the motion to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to make a statement as to a matter which seems to be somewhat misapprehended. The impression seems to prevail that anyone offering an amendment to perfect the text, has a preferential right to the floor as against some one else who has been recognized on a motion to strike out the section. That is a mistake. No one seeking to offer a perfecting amendment has a right to recognition as against another who has been recognized and is speaking to a motion to strike out the section, or paragraph proposed to be perfected. There is a relation of priority in this connection, but it relates to the order in which the motions shall be submitted. No one who has obtained the floor on a motion to strike out a section, can be taken from the floor by another Member seeking to offer an amendment to perfect the text. The Member offering an amendment to strike out has a right to proceed with his argument to conclusion, and then before his motion is put, if some one else wishes to offer a perfecting amendment, he can be recognized to submit, and speak to the same. Two amendments will then be pending, but under the rules, the perfecting amendment must be put before the amendment to strike out. The Chair makes this statement because there seems to be a misapprehension in this connection as to the relative rights to the floor of members of the committee.

On June 10, 1916, the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the alien immigration bill. A point of order was made against general discussion under a motion to strike out the last word. The Chair held that debate under a pro forma motion was a convention, and upon objection, the Member having the floor must confine his remarks to the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that it is not permissible to discuss a pro forma amendment in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). Of course, the motion to strike out the last word, and the debate on it pro and con are matters of convention. If the rule of debate is insisted upon, the mover of an amendment in the Committee of the Whole must confine his remarks to the amendment.

On February 21, 1917 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 3817 to 3818), the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the Army appropriation bill, when the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] offered an amendment for the maintenance of military post roads, bridges, and trails in Alaska. A point of order was made to the amendment. The Chair ruled that upon the facts the amendment did not fall within the principle relating to making appropriations to a work in progress. The point of order was sustained.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 21, page 38, insert the following:
"Protection, repair, and maintenance of military post roads, bridges, trails, Alaska: For the completion, repair, and maintenance of military post roads, bridges, and trails, Territory of Alaska, $500,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair for the purpose of ruling will accept the statement of the facts of this case made by the gentleman from California. This amendment is of course an attempt to apply the principle that appropriations may be made to a work in progress, to this scheme of proposed roads.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. In the first place, the Chair will say that there has been a tendency to narrow the application of that principle. But entirely apart from that tendency, the committee which proposes to appropriate for a work in progress should have some original authority in that connection. This authority is entirely lacking in this committee in the present connection. If there is any authority anywhere to appropriate for these roads, as a work in progress, that authority is not found in this committee. Under the act which the Chair has read, this committee is not authorized to make appropriations for the Alaskan roads. A special fund for the construction of these roads is provided in the Alaskan act. That provision does give the right to this committee, either by virtue of the principle of a work in progress, or on any other ground, to appropriate for the roads in question?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair yield to me there?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. There is a certain law referred to under which roads may be built in Alaska out of the Alaskan fund, but the existence of that statute does not prevent the Government from entering upon the work of building some roads in Alaska, contemplated under that act, by direct appropriation. Congress began this two or three years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair a moment ago referred to the tendency to limit the application of the principle of making appropriations for work already in progress. In that connection I desire to read a citation which has just been handed to me:

But later decisions, in view of the indefinite extent of the practice made possible by the early decisions, have ruled out propositions to appropriate for new buildings in navy yards.

What could be a larger application of this principle than to hold that if this board has outlined a large scheme of road construction in Alaska, and done some work here and there in connection with the same, this committee, or any committee, is thereby authorized to appropriate the funds necessary to complete every road contemplated by that scheme, or project?

In section 29 of the act which the Chair has cited, may be found an elaborate provision for road construction in Alaska by a board to be composed of an engineer officer of the United States, two other officers, and so on. At the conclusion of that section it is specifically stated that the cost and expense of laying out, constructing, and repairing these roads and trails in the Territory shall be paid by the disbursing officer out of the "roads and trails" portion of the Alaskan fund. The Chair thinks that the point of order directed to this paragraph is well taken, and it is therefore sustained.

On March 13, 1918 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 3456), the legislative appropriation bill was under consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Mr. LONDON, of New York, offered an amendment to investigate the subject of insurance against unemployment. To this amendment Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee made a point of order. After argument the Chairman held that in effect the amendment construed existing law and was therefore legislation not authorized on an appropriation bill. The Chair sustained the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LONDON: Page 146, line 70, insert as a new paragraph the following:
"To investigate the subject of insurance against unemployment, the sum of $50,000."

Mr. BRYNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon reflection the Chair is disposed to think that the organic act might be fairly construed by the Bureau of Labor to empower it to investigate the subject proposed in the amendment, if a lump-sum appropriation was made. But this would be a conclusion that the bureau would draw from the general terms used in the act. This amendment appropriating the sum indicated and directing that it shall be used for the investigation mentioned is an interpretation of the organic act. An amendment construing or interpreting an act is legislation. Legislation on an appropriation bill is forbidden. The point of order is sustained.

On September 19, 1918 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 10516 to 10519), the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the revenue bill, when Mr. BORLAND, of Missouri, offered an amendment to a paragraph in the bill. A point of order was made to the amendment, but was overruled. It was then sought to make a point of order to the paragraph. The Chair ruled after debate, that when a paragraph is read, and no point of order is made, and an amendment is offered to the paragraph, and a point of order made to the amendment, and overruled, it is too late thereafter to direct a point of order to the paragraph.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 170, line 13, strike out all after the word "Senate," strike out all the rest of line 13 and lines 14, 15, 16, and 17, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The members of the board first appointed shall be appointed for terms of one, two, three, four, and five years, respectively, and thereafter the term of each member shall be five years."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. What is the point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. My point of order is that the provision of the bill following the word "Senate," which the gentleman seems to wish to strike out, makes the board temporary, and the gentleman is seeking to make a permanent board out of what is proposed to be a temporary one.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's point of order is not well taken. The board, according to the present scheme of the law there, is appointed at the pleasure of the President. The following paragraph says that any member may be subject to removal by the President. The gentleman's point of order is not well taken. My opinion is that the whole section creating an advisory tax board may be subject to a point of order. But if so a germane amendment to a section which otherwise would be subject to a point of order would thus not be subject to a point of order. I submit to the Chair that defining the terms of these officers who are now appointed by will is a germane amendment, and is perfectly germane to the purposes of the section, and not subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The effect of the amendment seems to be to enlarge the term of office of the appointees under this section, but it does not occur to the Chair there is any reason why it is not in order for this to be done by an amendment which is germane. This commission and their terms are established by the bill. The amendment proposes to change the terms.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I submit the point of order comes too late, because I was recognized to perfect the paragraph by offering an amendment, which I did offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not direct a point of order against the entire paragraph after an amendment has been offered.

Mr. WALSH. Debate had not begun. The fact that an amendment was offered does not debar making a point of order against the entire paragraph. The rules say "after debate has begun."

The CHAIRMAN. That means that after the paragraph has been read and opportunity given to make or reserve a point of order. This opportunity must be afforded, and if not availed of, then it is too late thereafter to raise the question of order. In this case the opportunity was given, because the point of order to the paragraph could have been made before the gentleman from Missouri offered his amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Debate could not begin when the point of order was made against the amendment that was offered.

The CHAIRMAN. To the paragraph?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph was read. It was then before the House and open first for a point of order, and then for amendment. Anyone making, or reserving a point of order would have been entitled to prior recognition to the gentleman from Missouri. No one made a point of order to the paragraph. Hence the gentleman from Missouri, asking recognition to offer an amendment, was in order. He was recognized, and submitted an amendment to the paragraph to which a point of order was directed.

Mr. MADDEN. I maintain the point of order will lie until debate has begun on the paragraph. No debate having been had on the paragraph, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] having offered an amendment to which a point of order was made, notwithstanding that point of order was overruled, the paragraph is still pending without debate, and the question is whether it is subject to a point of order or not on its merits. That is the only question that is pending now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that this has been the practice of the House at all.

Mr. MADDEN. The Chair is supreme here unless overruled.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no pride of opinion about this matter whatever. If the practice of the House has been to the contrary of his ruling the Chair will be glad to be advised of it.

Mr. MADDEN. I think there is no doubt about what the practice of the House has been.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to be cited to any rule, or precedent contrary to his ruling. With the consent of the committee the Chair will state precisely what has taken place. The paragraph was read, and was then open to a point of order, or reservation of a point of order. No one rose to make or reserve a point of order. Thereupon an amendment was offered to the paragraph. A point of order was made to this amendment, and overruled. A point of order was then sought to be made to the paragraph proposed to be amended, and the Chair ruled that this motion was too late. That is the understanding of the Chair of what has taken place in this connection.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the Chair allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the Chair maintain, because an amendment was offered to which a point of order was made, it leaves the paragraph in any other situation than it would have been if no amendment had been offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair maintains that after a paragraph has been read in due course, and opportunity thereby given, to make, or reserve a point of order, and neither is made, it is too late to make a point of order to the paragraph after an amendment has been submitted. There are many Members of the House now present, who are experienced parliamentarians and the Chair will be glad to hear from them in this connection, whether in their opinion the ruling just made, is erroneous, and further whether upon the state of facts cited, a point of order could be made to the paragraph proposed to be amended.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think if my friend from Illinois will think of it for a moment, there is nothing wrong with the Chair's reasoning on this proposition. A point of order was made to an amendment to the paragraph. Business had intervened. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] shakes his head. He wishes to limit it to a technical proposition as to debate. But the gentleman must realize that where business had not intervened, the point of order was made before any amendment had been made to it.

Mr. MADDEN. The rule does not make any such construction as that at all. It simply says that the point of order must be made before debate is begun. Now, no debate has been had. That is what the rule says—not before an amendment has been offered but before debate has begun.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Why, Mr. Chairman, if that should be the rule of the House or the practice of the House, then it would result in always doing just exactly what has occurred at this time.

The gentleman from Illinois is not opposed to the original proposition, I assume; at least he did not interpose the point of order to it. He waits. Now a proposition is passed to which he is opposed and to which I am opposed and to which a majority of this House, I apprehend, will be opposed. But the gentleman can not then, in order to defeat that, interpose a point of order against the proposition that had already been read and passed. The reasoning of it is perfectly clear. The orderly procedure of the House, in my humble judgment, would depend upon sustaining the Chair in the ruling that he has just made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will read one or two precedents, out of a number that might be cited.

On December 16, 1898, the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considering the bill (H. R. 11191) to extend the laws relating to customs and internal revenue over the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. William H. Moody, of Massachusetts, offered an amendment providing for the extension also of the laws of the United States relating to the appointment of officers in the Customs and Internal-Revenue Services.

Mr. Leonidas F. Livingston, of Georgia, asked if it was proposed to extend the civil-service laws to Hawaii.

Mr. Moody replied to this question, whereupon Mr. JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois, suggested a point of order.

Mr. Moody raised the question of order that the point of order came too late. The point of order against the point of order, was sustained, on the ground that it came too late.

On the next page of Hinds' Precedents is a ruling to the effect that when a paragraph is read, then is the time to offer a point of order. That is what the Chair has always understood to be the practice. The Chairman in the case cited ruled as follows:

Without deciding the question as to whether, under the special rule under which we are proceeding, objection would have been in order if it had been made in time, the Chair is of the opinion that the point of order not having been made, it is now too late to make it, just the same as in case of the rule forbidding legislation on an appropriation bill. If the point is not made when such an amendment is offered, or until after debate, it comes too late. The Chair therefore holds that the point of order is not well taken.

In this case no point of order was made to the paragraph, or sought to be made, before the amendment was offered. After the amendment was offered, and held to be in order, it was too late to make a point of order to the paragraph. This ruling in the judgment of the Chair conforms to the precedents, and practice of the House.

Another case in point will be cited:

On April 16, 1904, the general deficiency appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, when a paragraph of the bill was read providing for compensation to the clerk of the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions.

Mr. George W. Smith, of Illinois, proposed an amendment, which was ruled out on a point of order.

Thereupon Mr. Smith raised a question of order against the paragraph in the bill.

Mr. James A. Hemenway made the point of order that the question was raised too late.

The Chairman held that a point of order against a proposition must be made before an amendment is offered to it. (Hinds, vol. —, p. 6911.)

The committee will note that while the case cited is not so strong a case on the facts as the case upon which the Chair has occasion to rule, it very clearly is to the effect that after an amendment is offered to a paragraph it will then be too late to make a point of order to the paragraph to which that amendment relates.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

On March 15, 1918 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 3562), the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering the legislative bill, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] offered an amendment. A point of order was made to the amendment on the ground that it was "nonsense." The Chair held that this objection did not present a question of order. The point of order was overruled.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of section 6 the following:

"No increase herein shall apply to salaries or compensations for personal services in any of the executive departments or independent establishments of the United States or of the District of Columbia, or any bureau or office therein, which does not, subject to the provisions and exceptions of section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved March 15, 1898, require eight hours of labor each day: Provided, The present war is ended prior to June 30, 1919."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that.

I do not know whether the Chair has ruled on the point of order or not, but I submit, if the Chair will examine this amendment he will hold it is not in order. I will make the point of order it is not germane and that, at the same time, it has not any sense.

The CHAIRMAN. The objection that the amendment is nonsense, does not present a parliamentary question. The amendment seems to be in order, and it is for the committee to determine whether it considers the proposition to be sense, or nonsense.

On September 19, 1918 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 10524 to 10525), the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considering the revenue bill, when a point of order was made by Mr. WALSH, of Massachusetts, to a paragraph in the bill on the ground that it did not relate to the revenue or bonded debt of the United States, and therefore was not within the jurisdiction of the committee making the report, and should be expunged from the bill. After debate, the Chair ruled that the Committee on Ways and Means had no jurisdiction to entertain, or report the paragraph in question.

The point of order was sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] makes the point of order on the ground that this particular paragraph does not relate to the revenue, or bonded debt and is, therefore, in excess of the jurisdiction of the committee.

Mr. WALSH. That it is not within the jurisdiction of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. I say, in excess of the jurisdiction of the committee, and therefore beyond their authority. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken, and sustains it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, no point of order was reserved on this bill. Take the case of an appropriation bill. You can not have new legislation on an appropriation bill when a point of order is reserved at the time the report is presented. If that is not done you can not do it when you consider the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a very important matter, and the Chair will make the following explanatory statement: Should a bill be erroneously referred, the rules provide the procedure by which that bill, as a whole, may be returned to the proper committee. If advantage of the rule is not taken in time, and the committee improperly in possession of the bill proceeds to consider it, and report the same to the House, it will then be too late to raise a point of order against the bill as a whole.

In such a case the committee entitled to jurisdiction is considered to have slept upon its rights. But when a bill is properly sent to a committee having jurisdiction over the subject matter, and it improperly includes in the bill reported to the House, matter not within its jurisdiction, then upon the consideration of the bill, the extraneous matter improperly included, can be objected to by a point of order. This is the first opportunity presented to object to the offending matter. Hence no one has slept on his rights, and no one is estopped to make objection. There must be an opportunity afforded at some time to object to matter included in a bill in excess of the jurisdiction of a committee, and the first time that this opportunity is afforded, is when the bill is under consideration, and the objectionable matter is reached.

Mr. KITCHIN. I supposed that this referred to an amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, may I direct the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina to section 6926 of Volume V of Hinds' Precedents, where Speaker CANNON, of Illinois, on May 14, 1906, made the ruling that points of order are reserved at the time of reference to Committee of the Whole only on appropriation bills?

Mr. Joseph W. Babcock, of Wisconsin, moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Union Calendar.

Mr. Sydney E. Mudd, of Maryland, interposed to reserve points of order against the bills.

Speaker CANNON held that as they were not appropriation bills such reservation was not called for.

Mr. KITCHIN. I want a little information, too, because this will be a precedent, and we want to get the matter straight. Suppose the Ways and Means Committee a week or two weeks before we reported this bill had introduced this identical bill with this provision in it, and then had reported it, and no points of order at all were reserved. Is it the understanding of the Chair that any matter in the bill of which the Ways and Means Committee originally had no jurisdiction would then be subject to points of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair in response to that question will read the following extract from the rules:

POWERS AND DUTIES OF COMMITTEES.

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, viz: Subjects relating—

1. To the election of Members—to the respective Committees on Elections.

2. To the revenue and the bonded debt of the United States—to the Committee on Ways and Means—

And so on.

The latter provision fixes the jurisdiction of the Ways and Means Committee, and delimits the matter appropriate for its consideration. Suppose the Committee on Ways and Means should report a bill dealing with the bonded debt, and as one paragraph of same should include matter properly belonging to the Elections Committee, or to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, or to the Committee on Appropriations, or to any other committee, how would this illegal assumption of jurisdiction be reached, save by a point of order directed to the offending matter?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is true, if it sought to amend a bill so as to include matters of which it had no jurisdiction, because the amendment would not be germane to the bill. But I am speaking now of this case: Suppose we had introduced this bill two weeks ago, and the committee had reported it, and it came before the House with that identical proposition in it for the Drafting Service, not as an amendment, but as a part of the bill. Suppose we had reported the bill with that provision in it. Would it then be subject to a point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think a question of amendment is presented. This is a question of matter in a bill reported by the committee, as to which the committee had no jurisdiction. The Chair thinks the point of order to this paragraph is well taken.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. DAN V. STEPHENS,

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, the investigation had before the committee of Congress on the court-martial system in vogue in our Army has greatly stirred all those who are familiar with the evidence which has been offered as proof of the need of a complete reform of the present procedure. The war is over, and we can now be frank without fear of demoralizing our officers charged with the conduct of the war. I am one who has not heretofore offered one single public criticism of any branch of our Government, because I believed it unwise to do so when we were all bent upon winning the war. We have now the experience the war has brought and should profit by it to revise this system that smacks of the dark ages. No one should stand in the way of these reforms. No officer of the Army should feel it incumbent on himself to defend the system. Let it stand or fall on its merits, keeping in mind that an American citizen has certain fundamental rights that should be reserved to him even in the Military Establishment, which is supposed to be of necessity more or less despotic. When the people of this country come to the conclusion that their sons who enter the military service can not secure a square deal there is likely to be trouble for some one ahead of us.

It is conceded on all sides that courts-martial procedure during the present war has been atrociously harsh, brutal, and unjust. There is hardly a Member of Congress who has not directly received convincing evidence of that fact through innumerable justified complaints from his constituency, establishing beyond all doubt that courts-martial are not worthy the name of courts, that they are regarded in the Army in no sense as judicial bodies, and that they are subject to absolute control by the power of military command in our Army, a power which is as inhumane and heartless as the Prussianism which this army was raised to destroy.

An effort has been made to cast the burden and the blame upon this new Army itself and excuse the officers of the Regular Establishment from participation in or responsibility for the prevailing injustice throughout the Army. Even if this were as true as it is grossly untrue, a system of law which depends absolutely upon the character of the agencies which administer it, a system of judicial procedure which gives protection and justice only when administered and controlled by men who insist on doing the right and achieving justice regardless of the system, is to be utterly condemned. The system itself must be such as to require that right and justice be done, and to visit the severest penalties upon any who declines or evades the doing of justice.

But even when the system applied to the small Regular Establishment, as it existed before and up to the beginning of this war, and administered by officers of the Regular Army, whose virtues, it is now said, are such that the system could not go wrong, it was no better then than now; it was no better administered then than now. It gave no better results then than now. The injustice was as proportionately great then as now—indeed, it can probably be said within the limits of truth that the system was more harshly administered then than now. But then the Army was small. Public interest was not aroused in it. The aggregate of injustice was much less than now. But that system blasted the hopes and life of many a man, and left as a derelict many a man who had served in the Army with all the virtue and rectitude that a good citizen and a good soldier usually has or need have in order to perform his duty, both as citizen and as a soldier.

It is charged that up until the beginning of this war, when Gen. Ansell fell in command of the office, there was no supervision and control in the War Department over the procedure of any court-martial. However gross, glaring, and prejudicial the error, there was no power, no authority, as the law was reactionarily construed, to rectify it. When the sentence of a court-martial was once passed upon and approved by the crude judicial processes of some commanding officer it was final and subject to no review at the War Department or in any other department of this Government. It is alleged that Judge Advocate General Crowder not only tolerated but approved that system, which subjected the life and liberty of every man in the Army to the oppressive and tyrannical will of a man trained to arms, and by that fact alone trained away from judicial thought and judicial methods. Before this war, notwithstanding the fact that section 1199 of the Revised Statutes expressly required the Judge Advocate General of the Army to review and revise the proceeding of every court-martial, this duty was not performed. Such revision as was had was for the purpose of collecting statistics and filing the court-martial records simply as records of the department. Such review as has been had during this war, and in some cases a much better but unauthoritative review, has been had at the insistence of one officer alone, who has striven in season and out to compel the Judge Advocate General of the Army to exercise in the name of justice the power which the statute confers upon him and requires him to exercise. The result has been static and obstinate opposition, a thwarting by administrative expedient of every effort made. His continuous insistence has been met by administrative makeshifts which were designed to deceive Congress, to deceive the soldiers themselves, and to deceive the people of the United States by deluding them into believing that something was being achieved in the establishment of justice in the Army, when it was well known that nothing substantial could thereby be achieved, and when it was intended that nothing should be achieved to modify the existing system.

And it has been the officers of the Regular Army who have insisted upon the maintenance of this system of bureaucracy, of absolutism, of injustice, supported and maintained by military power, and not the officers of the new establishment who are now accused of being the agents of this injustice through their ignorance upon the one hand and tyrannical exercise of brief authority upon the other.

No more shameful page will ever be written upon the military history of the United States than that that ought to be written and will be written when the people are informed upon this system of military injustice, supported and maintained by petty tyrants in high official position.

The American Bar Association charged that the present military code was unworthy of the name of law, and that the result of its application was unworthy of the name of justice. These charges are now known not only to state the truth, but they fall short of the mark in stating the whole truth. The system is a system not of law but of tyranny. It works not justice but tyranny, oppression, and the destruction of the souls and spirits of human beings.

The system is not the handiwork of Judge Advocate General Crowder or of Secretary of War Baker. It is true that in 1916 the present Judge Advocate General secured a reenactment of the military code, but it is obvious to every lawyer who will make even a cursory study of and comparison between the old code and the reenacted code that the reenactment made not one single systemic change, gave not one added guaranty, provided not one single scintilla of protection. It is nothing at all but a rewriting of the old code. I ask the lawyers of the country to compare the two in an effort to discover one particle of systemic improvement. The code to-day is in every substantial respect the British code of 1774, the code that we inherited from Great Britain when we separated from her, which we still insist upon maintaining and which she long since has cast aside. The few changes made in the reenactment that border upon the systemic are changes in the direction of reaction rather than of liberalization.

The attack made by the chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs upon this system was well advised and justified. This enlightenment would never have come to the department nor to the people had it not been for the courageous attitude and testimony of Gen. Ansell before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. Throughout the war he had seen and complained of the terrible injustices that were being inflicted upon our soldiery. But the light is breaking; the responsibility will be located; and those who are responsible for the perpetuation of this injustice are already engaged in making public their embarrassing pleas of confession and avoidance.

Gen. Crowder now states that this injustice has been to a considerable extent due to a lack of the very revisory power which Gen. Ansell at the beginning of the war insisted the department already had and ought to exercise, and which he strenuously denied. He now says that he went so far as to propose legislation that would have established such a revisory power, and he undertakes to avoid the responsibility by placing it upon the Congress for its failure to pass the legislation which he proposed.

It is claimed, and successfully I think, that the legislation proposed was not worthy of enactment. If enacted, it would have made more secure the existing system. It would have intolerably increased the present terrible deficiencies. The committees did not favorably report that bill, and they were wise in not doing so, first, because that bill would have placed the power of judicial supervision of courts-martial, not in the hands of a lawyer or a judge, not in the hands of the Judge Advocate General, but in the hands of a purely military official wielding all military power in the Army—namely, the Chief of Staff of the Army. This was enough to condemn it. But, much worse than this, it would have authorized the Chief of Staff to reverse an acquittal; it would have authorized him to strike out a finding of not guilty and substitute a finding of guilty; it would have authorized the Chief of Staff to increase any sentence which a court-martial had awarded. The legislation was skillfully drafted with a view to concealing its real character. But every lawyer, upon examining the bill, will discover what those who drafted the bill and those who proposed it already knew—that that bill placed these vast powers in the hands of the Chief of Staff and authorized him to impose punishments at his own will, and for that, if for no other reason, it should never become law.

What a tragedy in the realm of justice is the present system which the War Department still hopes and labors to save!

It is a system of justice made, maintained, and applied by the will of a military man, and not by any principles known to jurisprudence. The American people ought to know what this system means, and in the end they will know, and knowing it will destroy it.

A man can be court-martialed at the mere whim and caprice of any officer of the Army, from the most newly made second lieutenant to the Chief of Staff. In the last fiscal year there were more than 350,000 cases of courts-martial, and between twenty and thirty thousand of them were trials by general court-martial, the court of highest jurisdiction, with power to inflict any punishment, including that of death. The system does not require that any investigation be made to determine whether a man shall be tried or not. It does not require any legal determination of whether the charge or indictment is sufficient, as a matter of law, and whether there is evidence to constitute a prima facie case. It does not guarantee to a man any protection during trial. It does not define his rights before, during, or after the trial. It does not provide for adequate defense or establish his right to the substantial assistance of counsel. It does not establish and is not governed by any regard for any of those safeguards which have been developed by our civilization as necessary to protect a man against oppression and injustice. The trial, if such it can be called, being over, the commanding officer, a military man without the slightest judicial appreciations, alone determines whether the proceedings are correct and whether the accused has had a fair trial.

When a man is once haled before one of these courts there is little hope of acquittal. The military system is set against fair procedure. The reports of the Judge Advocate General for the last year show that only 1 out of every 23 men tried by a summary court is acquitted; only 1 out of every 12 men tried by a special court is acquitted, and only 1 out of every 9 men tried by general court is acquitted. And this certainty of conviction can not be said to be due to the thoroughness of investigation prior to trial, because the law requires no such investigation and but little is had. The great military desideratum, certainty of punishment, is achieved, but justice is not.

But those who support the present iniquities brazenly confess that it is not the object of the code to do justice—that the object of the code is to maintain discipline within the establishment. If these statements were not statements of record, it would have been unbelievable that they could have been made by any responsible officer of Government or even by any man endowed with the ordinary capacity to reason and with an ordinary sense of justice. As though discipline and justice were inconsistent terms! As though the maintenance of discipline made it necessary to exclude justice! As though, indeed, discipline, in the proper sense of the term, could be founded on anything but justice! This fact alone shows how far those who govern and administer the present military establishment have gone down the high road to Prussianization, how far they have forgotten, if such men ever could have known, the ordinary principles of right and justice; how far their training has deprived them of all capacity to reason as fair-minded human beings. Such men have long since become machines. They can not be men. They see with the eyes of tyrants. Their hearts are hearts of stone. With such men in control of our Army, our people can never have any faith in or affection for it.

The present system of military justice is an insult to all decent principles of government. It is an outrage upon any government of a free people such as ours. Its terrible resulting injustices have been revealed and our consciences have been shocked. For every such injustice, some soldier's spirit has been crushed, some soul has been seared, some soldier's patriotism has been called upon to resist the assault made upon it by subjecting him to such a tyranny.

The system is completely beyond all legal control. Not only does it not require, it does not even contemplate, any such thing as legal control over the conduct of military procedure in accordance with established legal principles. It is a system controlled by and administered in accordance with the will of a military commander. This very deficiency—a lack of legal control in accordance with principles of law and a subjection of sacred judicial functions to the tyrannical power of military command—is the cause of the injustice which is now the subject of such general and bitter popular complaint. It could not have been otherwise, and it will never be otherwise as long as the Prussian methods which seem now to be rigidly established in cur Army control the functions and the administration of justice.

The time is bound to come, and come soon, if indeed it is not already here, when the people of this country will locate the responsibility for the existence and maintenance of this injustice. The Army is not yet half demobilized. The system is still operating in full force and vigor. The ultramilitaristic mind, which seems to be in complete domination of our military administration, which establishes and maintains the present harsh and un-American standards, judgments, and punishments, supports the system, but the American people will sooner or later locate the responsibility upon the individual officials whose duty it was zealously to guard the administration of military justice, to the end that tyranny and oppression, which have so fertile a field in a military establishment, should not survive. This these officials have not done. This they have deliberately refused to do. Tyranny, oppression, and injustice have flourished by reason of the strong support given to them by the very officers whose duty it was to strike them down. And this the records will prove.

The evidence already elicited shows, and the attitude of the reactionaries who are upholding the present system corroborates it to the point of conviction, that the following pertinent propositions of fact are beyond denial or dispute and they at the same time serve to fix conclusively the guilt, for guilt it is, upon the officials who are responsible for the maintenance of military injustice:

(1) The Acting Judge Advocate General, speaking by virtue of the office in which he was at that time in sole and supreme control, found that under the existing law the War Department had ample authority for the supervision of courts-martial procedure and for keeping them within legal control. The Judge Advocate General of the Army, the Inspector General of the Army, and the Chief of Staff of the Army united in opposition to this view and urged upon the Secretary of War the argument that such supervision and control would result to the injury of discipline, and the Secretary of War yielded to their argument and relieved the Acting Judge Advocate General from further control over military justice.

(2) The military officials above mentioned placed their views upon record that military procedure had for its purpose the maintenance of discipline, and drew the distinction that discipline could not be maintained without sacrificing justice.

(3) They contend and maintain that the military code was a code of penal law that ought not to be independently and judicially supervised in its administration, but that it should be left to be administered by the camp commander.

(4) It is alleged that these officials intended to do nothing, but sought to shift the responsibility by placing an impossible bill before the two military committees of Congress, knowing that such a bill could not be enacted into law. That bill would have made the situation worse. The War Department overruled Gen. Ansell's opinion that there was already revisory and supervisory power in the War Department under existing law, and then sought to have Congress pass a bill that would have placed such a power in the hands not of independent legally trained officials but of military officials under the control of the Chief of Staff. That bill also would have authorized these same military officers to substitute a conviction for an acquittal by the court, to increase the punishment which the court had awarded, and to subject a man to a new trial at will. Such proposed legislation could hardly have been intended to pass because of its inherent deficiencies, and if it had passed it would have foisted upon the Army the chief deficiency of the existing system. It could not have been intended to pass, because it was only shortly after the Judge Advocate General himself had submitted it to Congress that he said that General Order 7 itself was designed simply to allay popular clamor and to head off congressional investigation.

(5) The Judge Advocate General has removed from participation in matters of military justice the one man who has stood for a liberalization of the system, and by reason of his headship of the office has prevented the free communication of the views of that officer to the Secretary of War.

(6) The present Judge Advocate General had written into the Articles of War two years ago the present thirty-seventh article, which he now construes as an additional reason why the commanding officer should govern courts-martial at his will and subject to no legal control, not even that of the President of the United States.

(7) The order which Gen. Ansell procured to be issued last September establishing a considerable power of revision over courts-martial procedure among our forces in France was this day, the very day that Congress is to adjourn, revoked.

It has been officially announced that the Judge Advocate General will soon depart upon a mission for Cuba. He is retiring for a while. His place will be taken by Gen. Bethel. It was Gen. Bethel, I am informed, who has contended for the harsh punishments in France throughout the war. It was he who argued with and persuaded Gen. Pershing to insist upon the execution of four young soldiers in France, simply as a matter of policy. He argued that the execution of a few men at the beginning of the war would have the effect of saving the life of many in the latter days of the war. It was he who has contended at all times against the establishment of any supervisory power over courts-martial in France, and it was he who finally succeeded in overthrowing the order establishing such revision there.

The structure will fall. It will carry with it all who insist on clinging to it.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. BAER,

OF NORTH DAKOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, under the general permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I present the following:

STATEMENT BY CONGRESSMAN J. M. BAER, REPRESENTING NORTH DAKOTA AT THE REQUEST OF GOV. LYNN J. FRAZIER.

"Owing to pressing official duties it is impossible for the governor of North Dakota, Hon. Lynn J. Frazier, to attend this conference of governors and mayors here at the White House. The governor wired me, urgently requesting that I represent him. I realize the imperative need of his presence at our State capital, because our legislature has just passed some of the most progressive legislation in the history of our State. North Dakota or N. D. stands for the 'new democracy.'

"There are few who are involuntarily unemployed in North Dakota. I have received a message from J. N. Hagan, commissioner of agriculture and labor, stating that 30,000 expert farm hands would be needed during the month of April. At the present time the problem of unemployment is a negligible one. Information from the various employment bureaus confirm the statement of the commissioner and show that the point of saturation has almost been reached in North Dakota. It is a complete reversal of the conditions which have been heretofore reported at this conference. I believe great credit should be given to the splendid manner with which Gov. Frazier has handled the situation.

"North Dakota is a State which can be pointed to as an example of one which has efficiently and peacefully handled the labor problem.

"I want to insert here an editorial taken from the Nation of March 1, 1919. It reads as follows:

"We are happy to learn that there is one public official in the United States who has some conception of how to deal with the prevailing unrest. His unusual perspicacity may be due to the fact that he makes a living by farming, not politics. In any case, we are glad to hear a sensible word from anyone in responsible public position. Gov. Frazier, of North Dakota, in accepting appointment to the board of governors for a nation-wide campaign against anarchy, writes thus:

"'I have your telegram notifying me that I have been appointed on the board of governors for a nation-wide campaign to be launched against every manifestation of anarchy and to safeguard American liberties, American labor, American homes, and American schools, and wish to assure you that I am in hearty sympathy with the announced aims of your organization. Here in North Dakota we believe the best protection against revolution is to assist rather than retard evolution, and in this State it is the intention of the administration to remove discontent and prevent disorder by remedying the legitimate economic complaints of the people instead of trying to stamp out just grievances. As a consequence we have a contented citizenry in North Dakota, which believes in upholding our Government and achieving political progress by orderly and constitutional methods. * * * Personally, I feel that bolshevism is not the only peril to this country. In my opinion the spirit of Bourbonism is even more threatening to the security of our institutions, for, scanning back through history, it seems to me that Bourbonism always precedes and is the cause of bolshevism.' Gov. Frazier promises to be an interesting member of this particular board of governors."

"Idleness deserves the utmost contempt and earnest discouragement of every citizen. We must not shun it. We must reckon with it. This has been the policy of our State; and while the governor has effectively handled the situation with a firm hand, he has given every encouragement to those who honestly seek employment. He has dealt with firmness, but he has administered with justice. I therefore point with pride to the labor conditions in North Dakota, and believe that if other States had handled the delicate situation as wisely and ably as our governor has, little credence could be given to those who predict industrial strife and labor revolts. Permit me to quote from the governor's address to the legislature:

"The past two years have been trying times, both for the people and the State officials. On some occasions the burdens were hard to bear, but from beginning to end of our country's part in this great war there was a willingness to serve and an earnest determination which made North Dakota second to none in all available lines of war work. Our soldiers have made an enviable record.

"We are justly proud of them. And I am also proud of the record of those who stayed at home. Even through the adverse criticism of unscrupulous newspapers and politicians the people kept right on with an earnestness of determination and with one set purpose to back our Government and our boys and win the war.

"While in many States the people were utterly stampeded to do mob violence under the false guise of patriotism, and perpetrated outrageously revolting crimes that will haunt life's memory and leave a stain of disgrace that can not be lived down in a hundred years, our people marched quietly forward with consistent patriotism that will make proud our history for all time.

"For, after all, we are only servants of the people and act in their interests. Certain legislation has been demanded, and we have an unmistakable mandate to enact a definite program which has been adopted after mature deliberation. Naturally, this program has aroused the opposition of private interests whose profits were derived from the systematic exploitation of the people of North Dakota. These interests make the claim that our program is untried, dangerous, and likely to result in ruin.

"This can not be true, for there is nothing experimental about these proposed measures. They have been thoroughly tested in many parts of the world, and everywhere they have proven successful and have operated to the best interests of the people. There is not a single measure in our whole program which will adversely affect any honest and legitimate business interest within this State.

"On the contrary the adoption of this program will make us independent of the out-of-the-State interests, build up home industries, and develop and widen domestic markets, promote settlement, bring to more workingmen and make it easier for our people to own their homes—in short, will make North Dakota a State where the producer can retain his just share of what he produces.

"The whole tendency of the times is toward greater cooperation and the extension of democracy into industry, and in my estimation this industrial democracy is just as necessary as is political democracy. North Dakota in adopting these measures not only will promote general prosperity but will encourage education, remove restraints of privilege, and provide more equal opportunity and give our children and our children's children a chance to be better citizens and to be broader and happier men and women.

"I have little patience with those who would measure as with a thermometer the Bolsheviki temperature of our communities. North Dakota is the answer to the problem of bolshevism. When the people are freely allowed to exert their political power and the majority truly rules, we have pure democracy. When the Bourbons, the forces who are opposed to majority rule, come into power and suppress the people it breeds bolshevism. I am proud to say that there is not an I. W. W. who is a permanent resident within the borders of our State. If they drift into our State they are made to understand and they must work. Our slogan is 'Get to work or get out.'

"Great credit must be given the patriotic efforts of our business men—the former employers of the men in our great Army. They have placed the returned soldiers in their former positions and are rapidly absorbing those men who so gallantly defended our country.

"While I understand there are a large number of idle men in some of the large cities, especially in Buffalo and New York, I do not believe that the situation is critical and that as soon as farming operations are begun the slack will be taken up.

"We have witnessed the unparalleled results of the unity of purpose, unity of command, and unity of effort in what was not only a gigantic military and industrial achievement, but also the greatest moral victory in all history. This same unity of purpose demands an equal community of interest in the problems to be solved during the period of reconstruction. I am glad, therefore, that the President has called for the intelligent cooperation of the chief executives of our States. I hope that there will be a unity of purpose here, and that a definite plan will be worked out in this conference in order to handle the labor situation. I trust that it will work to the best interest of our beloved country. To preserve the ideals and institutions of this Republic is our one and supreme and unshakable purpose."

On the Irish Resolution, H. J. Res. 357.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. MORIN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, in olden times tribes and peoples were a law unto themselves. Hostile and marauding bands preyed one upon another. For protection each village was surrounded by a wall. On its towers watchmen constantly patrolled in order that they might give their message of warning. This message was ofttimes a cry of alarm to tell of the approach of a foe, ofttimes a word of cheer to let the inhabitants know of the nearness of a friend.

Centuries have elapsed; civilization has progressed. The hostile marauding bands of yesterday have become the powerful nations of to-day. No longer a law unto ourselves, we are bound together by ties of mutual interests. We are turning to the watchmen on our towers to-day and asking them what vision they now have. They reply that they see the overthrow of tyranny and oppression; they see the coming light of liberty, justice, and equity. They behold the first beams of that happy day of which our President spoke when he said:

We are glad * * * to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world, * * * for the rights of nations, great and small, and the privileges of men everywhere to choose their way of life and obedience.

To-day we are contending for those principles laid down by Lincoln in his memorable address when he predicated the fact that no nation could exist that was not truly self-governed. True democracy is indeed "government of the people, by the people, and for the people." Surely, it is not amiss that we who have this rich heritage should wish others to enjoy this great blessing and so should be urging that this form of government shall prevail in all the world, and are asking that each nation shall be given the opportunity to be truly individual, to determine its laws and its customs. Before enduring peace can come this privilege must be accorded to all nations, small or great, and that is why the American people are so anxious to have this right given to Ireland, that land famed alike in history and song.

The Irish question has perplexed and vexed our British allies for more than a thousand years, and it is still unsettled. During that period it has assumed different forms, and its attempted solutions have at times been marked with oppression, suffering, and bloodshed. When Rome first entered upon her career of conquest the British Isles, in common with France and Spain, were inhabited by what is known as the Celtic branch of the Caucasian race. These Celts or Gauls had constituted a powerful empire covering parts of Asia Minor and all of southern Europe, except the peninsula of Greece and Italy. Twice they threatened the destruction of Rome itself, but finally they had withdrawn to western Europe, where they were attacked by the Roman power. First, Spain was made subject to Rome; next, France, or Gaul, as it was then termed, was subdued by Julius Cæsar, who in 55 B. C. carried the Roman arms into the British Isles.

While the Celts constituted a single branch of the Caucasian race, they were themselves divided into two classes by physical characteristics: One, the Brachycephalous—broad headed; and the other Dolichocephalous—long headed. The former usually have dark hair and eyes and the latter light hair and blue eyes. Sometimes these two types lived together and sometimes formed separate communities.

At the time Cæsar crossed over from the Continent there were four distinct communities—all, however, Celts—in the British Isles. They were in substantially what are known to-day as England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland. The people were designated as Picts, Scots, and Bretons, and later as Welsh, Scotch, Irish, and English. The Romans conquered only England and Wales. The Norman conquest, too, was virtually confined to these two divisions. Still, even on the island of Great Britain, there was for centuries no close union, and wars were frequently waged between them until finally Wales and Scotland were united with England in what has since been known politically as Great Britain. This union was partly dynastic. Henry Tudor was a Welchman who became Henry VII of England and founded the Tudor dynasty. The union between England and Scotland was cemented when James VI of Scotland became heir to the English throne and was crowned as James I of Great Britain.

Unhappy Ireland, however, has had a sadder fate. While among the nations of northern Europe she first accepted Christianity and became a missionary center whence was diffused both to Great Britain and the countries on the Continent the light of both Christianity and culture, she herself, enthralled in wars, has suffered spoliation and oppression for almost a thousand years. First came the Danish rovers, in 968, overrunning the land; then, 200 years later, the Normans undertook the conquest of the island, thus beginning the struggle which is not yet ended. To the desolation of war and the spoliation of conquest were added the rapacity of absentee landlords and the restrictions on commerce which ground the people into abject poverty. Religious bigotry and ecclesiastical intolerance added to the bitterness of the cup that was pressed to the lips of Ireland.

Yet through it all she added to the strength and renown of Great Britain. Her poets and scholars helped render English literature illustrious. Her soldiers were among the bravest and her generals among the ablest that fought the battles of the British Empire. And through it all, until a little over a century ago, the Irish people had a nationality of which they were proud. In matters of local government they had nominally home rule. The Irish Parliament stood for government of the Irish people by themselves. The green flag of Erin was a symbol of a political entity. It meant that although in affairs affecting the whole empire Ireland was a subordinate part, still it had an individuality which meant much to its sons, while in local affairs it was independent. It is true that by successive acts under the German Georges of England this home parliament was shorn of many of its powers, but in 1782 it was reinstated in its full authority. "The King, lords, and commons of Ireland," constituting the Irish Parliament, was declared to be an "independent legislature."

It is true that with the religious intolerance and bigotry of that age a majority of the people of Ireland were excluded from the suffrage and from a right to participate in the Government. The qualifications were the same as in England—none but members of the established church could vote or hold office! But in England only a few were thus debarred, while in Ireland it shut out four-fifths of the people. Naturally the people were not wholly satisfied. The old abuses were not at once abolished nor old wrongs redressed; still there was a feeling of national pride that was working to bring about better feeling and friendly cooperation between the people of the two islands.

The Napoleonic wars came on, and Napoleon, like Germany to-day, attempted to profit by stirring up the unrest in Ireland. Then the younger Pitt, prime minister of England, conceived the idea of destroying the autonomy of the island and making it, like Scotland and Wales, a part of Great Britain, to be governed by the British Parliament, in which it would have representatives according to its population. The plan looked fair—to Englishmen—but it filled the hearts of Irishmen with despair and hatred, as it involved the loss of the individual nationality which they prized. To make the change, however, required the consent of the Irish Parliament, and Pitt, by the most gigantic bribery and corruption, bought up this Irish Parliament to sell out the freedom of its own country.

The "act of union" took effect in January, 1801, and the old contest was renewed with added bitterness. Since then many a noble Irish patriot has fallen a martyr to the cause of Irish nationality. With the broadening sympathy of advancing civilization, Great Britain has within the last half century done much to ameliorate social and economic conditions in Ireland. But she has not yet found the way to satisfy the Irish longing for home rule.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when the paramount question confronting the nations gathered in conclave around the peace table is the future of those nations who have not had the rights of liberty and freedom, it seems to me that action on this joint resolution is most opportune. Let us ask—nay, let us insist—that to Ireland shall be given that great boon she so long has sought, "freedom, independence, and self-determination."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THETUS W. SIMS,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, as this is the last hour of the last day of the Sixty-fifth Congress, and as I shall not have the honor and pleasure of being the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the Sixty-sixth Congress, I beg to say that in no previous Congress since this committee came into existence has there been so large a number of bills and resolutions considered and reported to the House by committee as has been during the life of the Sixty-fifth Congress, the greater number of which have passed both Houses and have been approved by the President and are now statutes of the United States.

The following is a list of all bills and resolutions that have been favorably reported to the House, with notations showing in which of the three sessions of the Sixty-fifth Congress each bill or resolution was considered and reported, and which of them have become laws, giving date of approval; and also a list of such bills as have been reported but which were not acted on by the House and remain on the calendar not disposed of.

Address of Hon. Louis C. Cramton Before the Michigan Grand Lodge of Odd Fellows Upon the Participation of America in the War.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL E. MAPES,
OF MICHIGAN,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, under leave given me to extend my remarks, I present the following address delivered by my colleague, Hon. LOUIS C. CRAMTON, at the meeting of the Grand Lodge of Odd Fellows of Michigan at Grand Rapids on November 14, 1918:

"Grand master, officers, and representatives, I understand the only reason for my being called on to speak is that you have to wait for the committee on mileage and per diem. However, I appreciate the opportunity of speaking to you for a few moments about 'over there.' To begin with, let me say right here that the fellows over there are entitled to more tribute than any of us can give them, and too much can not be said in their praise.

"As a Member of Congress in April, 1917, mine was the responsibility of casting one of the votes for the declaration of war that carried this Nation into the world-wide cataclysm of war. Later the responsibility was upon me of voting for appropriations amounting to billions of dollars for the effective and vigorous prosecution of the war and for the raising of immense revenue by new and increased taxation. And, again, I voted for the raising of great armies—greater than America had ever dreamed we would place in the field.

"Members of Congress who cast those votes realized well what it meant, how our action was to reach all the homes of the people we represented and place the heaviest burdens there. But those burdens have been borne by the American people with marvelous unity and courage and cheerfulness.

"But because I had upon me such responsibilities, it seemed to me, when the opportunity came to me in early July to go across with a party of Congressmen in order that we might see for ourselves the part that America was taking in the great struggle, the service that American boys were giving over there, the kind of care the Government was taking of them, and to study at first hand the problems for America arising out of the war—when that opportunity came to me it seemed to me my duty to go across.

"On the 5th of July we went on board the French liner Rochambeau, and on the 6th really made our start. As we put out to sea there was in the lead a great battle cruiser, and then came our liner and 12 or 14 great transports, all loaded to the limit with the boys in khaki—in all, 54,500. And as we sailed there were out on the left flank several small craft, the destroyers, and on the right flank were others. And from time to time above us sailed two hydroplanes and then, occasionally, a great dirigible balloon. Our Government was doing everything it could to safely guard the journey of those thousands of soldiers overseas.

"After two or three days the destroyers and aircraft put back and we sailed without convoy, except for the battle cruiser at the head. When we approached the other side our liner separated from the fleet and put into Bordeaux, a French destroyer coming out to escort us past the dangers of mine and submarine; but the transports put off to the north, to land at Brest, where most of our soldiers were landed; and as they came near the dangerous waters about the British Isles and the coast of France small craft came out to meet them also, and convoyed them safely past the menace of the submarine and the mine.

"We sent across in that month of July 305,000 of our soldier boys, and all together we have sent over 2,000,000, and of them all only a few hundred have gone down in the ocean's depths by reason of the submarine. Do you know why those boys have so safely crossed the great deep? I believed that during the fighting it was the duty of every American, regardless of old-time prejudices or antipathies, to pray alike for the success of each of our allies, whether it be Britain, or France, or Belgium, or Italy, or Serbia, or Greece, because the fortunes of all were bound up together and a disaster to any one would be a disaster which would require the sacrifice of many American lives to repair. And as it was then our duty to pray alike for the success of each, now in our great hour of victory it is equally our duty to be generously appreciative of and thankful for the splendid part played by each of them in the great conflict. And so let me tell you who did most to guard the safety of those 2,000,000 American boys as they were going across—it was the small craft, the destroyers and mine sweepers and submarines that did the work. The ocean is wide and ships went far out of their course to avoid the German submarine. But however far they might go out of their course, they must eventually come into those waters about the British Isles and the coast of France. Hence in those waters was the greatest peril from the submarine and there must the greatest protection be given our transports. And there less than 5 per cent of the protection came from our own Navy. While we had there a total of 168 small craft patrolling those waters, Britain had about 3,000. In the month of July her small craft, in patrolling those waters, traveled over 6,000,000 miles and above the same waters her hydroplanes traveled 125,000 miles.

"Besides the British Isles have furnished 6,250,000 soldiers, in addition to a million from her dominions and a million and a quarter from India. And those soldiers have fought. In one month in the beginning of the last German drive the casualties of the British, Scotch, Welsh, and Irish were 355,000.

"France and Belgium, overrun by the course of war, have fought valiantly and suffered terribly. Italy, mobilizing 87 per cent of her men of 18 to 44, has lost over 26 per cent of them in wounded beyond possibility of return to service or prisoners or killed. Serbia, worn with seven years of heroic fighting, her fields overrun by cruel enemies, has never been suspected of any desire for a separate peace. And Greece, withheld from the side of the allies by her German Queen, Sophie, sister of the Kaiser, and her complaisant husband, King Constantine, and their abundant supply of German gold; Greece, before that King and Queen were driven from their thrones by Venizelos, splendid champion of democracy, even before that Greece gave the allies at Salonika 40,000 soldiers, and 15,000 of them were in the fighting lines.

"But you especially want to know of the part of America in the war. I say to you that the reason democracy has triumphed and there is joy in the hearts of all civilization is that America entered the war. That the victory has come so soon is because we entered the war so effectively and because the khaki-clad troops have fought with absolute disregard of self and with prodigal devotion to their cause.

"Let me remind you that only a few weeks ago, in the early days of July, Wilhelm was the King of Prussia, the Kaiser of Germany, the absolute dictator of Belgium and northern France and Italy, of Austria-Hungary, Montenegro, Roumania, Bulgaria, and Serbia, of most of Albania, and all of Turkey. That he had one connected, powerful, efficient dominion, stretching from the Baltic at the north through the rich heart of Europe to the heart of Asia, and in addition, through his Bolsheviki agents, Lenine and Trotzky, he had his grasp upon the limitless resources of Russia, ready to subdue the world as soon as they could be organized.

"It is a matter capable of positive proof that these Bolshevik leaders were the paid agents of the Kaiser, working his will in Russia with the plentiful use of German gold. Such was his dominion until a few weeks ago, the greatest sway ever exercised by any man in all of history. To-day in our hour of victory he is stripped of all his power and of his dominions, devoid of all honor, a refugee from world justice in his yellow hiding place in Holland. The sudden change is because of America's part in the war.

"But recently the last German drive was smashing down across France headed for Paris. They seemed coming with irresistible force. If that drive had succeeded and Paris had been captured the fighting would still be on in France, and to-day, and every day of this year and perhaps of 1919 and 1920, thousands of American boys with other thousands from our allies would be sacrificed. But the drive did not reach Paris. The second division of American troops, including a large force of marines, came into the line. On their right the French, and splendid brave troops they were, too, were falling back. The French corps commander suggested to Gen. Bundy, of the American forces, the advisability of like retirement on the part of the Americans. 'The Americans are not here for that purpose,' said Bundy. The French commander kissed the American on both cheeks after the inconvenient custom of the Frenchmen and patted him on the back. Not only did the Americans not retire but they held, and they advanced and they captured Belleau Wood. They checked that onrush of Germans who were coming forward flushed with victory, and they held them and sent them back. Because they did this, and because the Third Division came in at Chateau-Thierry, many of them green troops that had never before been under fire, and prevented the crossing of the river by the Germans—because of these things that last German drive was checked. That drive being checked it was possible for Foch to start his great counter offensive; that, beginning then, did not stop until the signing of the armistice a few days ago. That our boys were able to hold at Belleau Wood and Chateau-Thierry was only because they were willing to and did sacrifice themselves in such numbers as to cause officers of foreign armies with whom I talked to speak with awe of our losses in that fighting. Our boys there took no thought of self but only of the cause, and because they sacrificed themselves by thousands, hundreds of thousands of other American boys this month and next and next year are to be spared.

"On the 29th of July I went out to the American front from Paris and I passed Belleau Wood. Once heavily wooded, it stands now thinned by fierce shell fire revealing the great bowlders upon the hillside, ideal refuge for the machine gunners. Do you realize what it is to face the machine gun? If a man standing there is hit by a bullet from a machine gun which fires from three to six hundred bullets a minute, before that dead man can fall to the ground three more bullets may pierce his body. But that fire was faced by our marines and they triumphed over it. I was told that after that fighting the ground before that wood was strewn with bodies in khaki, lying in rows upon the ground, their heads pointing toward the wood. Forever after, as long as there are maps in France, that wood is to be known as the 'Wood of the Brigade of American Marines.'

"Again, on the 14th and 15th of August, I visited this front, and was with the One hundred and twenty-fifth and One hundred and twenty-sixth Regiments of the Thirty-second Division in their camp above Clergy, a few miles back of the line at Fismes. Let me speak to you a moment of the wonderful work of those boys of the Thirty-second Division in the Battle of the Ourcq, a part of the second Battle of the Marne. And I would not have you think from what I say to you of these that I feel that these are the only American boys who fought. But, rather, I speak to you of them because I came more closely in contact with their achievements. I give it to you as typical of what American boys have done over there whenever they have had the opportunity.

"You may hear it said, as I have, that in this war the National Guard has not measured up to the requirements either in organization or in efficiency of its officers. If you do hear such a statement made, you may be brief and say that, while you do not know as to the National Guard of other States, as to the National Guard of Michigan and Wisconsin such a statement is a lie. For there has not been in any army in any time a force that has fought more valiantly or more successfully than has the National Guard of Michigan and Wisconsin, forming the Thirty-second Division, in this glorious second Battle of the Marne. They had been down on the Alsace front about Belfort, and late in July were brought across country, 17 days without decent rest, going in box cars and motor lorries, and on the 29th they came into the line on a ridge near Courmont. Looking over, they could see their task before them. Down a slope and they would come to a little stream, the River Ourcq, and then the village Ciergy. Then, on the other slope Les Jomblet

Wood, and then the ridge above. They went over the top that same day and down that ridge in the face of terrific shell fire barrage.

"'Do you realize what it means to face such a barrage? Upon that field I saw such a line—over there a shell hole, here another, and there another; with regularity 15 or 20 feet apart, the line stretched straight across the field. Each one of those shell holes marked the spot where a high-explosive shell had struck, and as it fell it burst and sent in every direction a multitude of fragments of steel and iron, many of them 2 or 3 inches long, and some of them perhaps 2 feet or more in length, hurled with incredible force and velocity. Whatever they struck, they maimed and killed; but in the face of such fire our boys went down the slope and they gained the river. Then they took the village, and boys who had been in that fighting told me how, when they entered that village of Ciergy, a Red Cross flag was displayed from the great stone tower of the church, and that when our boys were advancing to that church machine-gun fire came to them under the Red Cross flag. They swept the Germans out of the village, and as they were on the upper slope and approaching the great cross and crucifix, which I saw and which still remains upon that field, a wayside shrine, from the hole under the base of the cross came again the fire of the machine guns. The boys swept on up the slope, a part of them rushing forward a little distance and dropping down to the ground, others then rushing by, along a little distance, and dropping, in their effort to outwit the terrific fire of machine guns from the wood. Eventually the wood was theirs, and then the ridge beyond, and then other villages and streams and woods and ridges all the way to Fismes, which they took on the 4th of August.

"I am one of those who believe that nothing is to be added to the glory of the accomplishments of our troops by belittling the courage of the soldiers they fought. Many of the German troops fought well, and in this fighting from the 29th of July to the 6th of August our boys from Michigan were facing the Prussian Guards, the best troops the Kaiser had; and they were not then, as now, broken in spirit and disorganized in defeat, but still believed in their invincibility; and our boys drove them back day after day, a total of 20 kilometers, or 12 miles, in six days. They got ahead of their supplies, and a day and a half they were without food, except such as they picked up from the German dead or gathered from the wheat fields. They were exposed to the command of the air by the Germans, but they fought ahead with a sublime devotion and with a wonderful spirit. It was but a week after the fighting was over that I was with them. Their morale was perfect.

"They were ready to go again into the lines when called. I was much with my old friend, Father Dunnigan, chaplain of the One hundred and twenty-sixth; with Chaplain Swann, of the One hundred and twenty-fifth; with Maj. Guy Wilson and Maj. Earl Stewart and Col. Sestenedge and Lieut. Col. Waldo and other splendid men who had been through this fighting with our boys. None of them would tell me anything of what he himself had done, but they told me much of the spirit and heroism of the soldiers.

"They told me of that boy named Foley, from Detroit, who had two fingers shot from one hand and three from the other, but he would not leave the fighting. He went about gathering up ammunition for the fellows in the fighting. And that Mail Sergt. Cope, from Owosso, who when the mail came in those few days, mail from the States, carried it up and down the front lines distributing it to the boys who, when there came a lull in the fighting, crouched upon the ground and pulled out and read the letters from home. They told me of Lieut. Charles Hammond, of Port Huron, who was struck by a machine-gun bullet in the arm but would not leave his men; then he was shot again in the hand, but re-formed his platoon and led them still against the enemy in Belleau Wood; then as he advanced with his arm outstretched toward the wood, his revolver in his hand and his hand running with his blood, he was shot again and killed. The surgeon of the One hundred and twenty-fifth told me that in the first day of their fighting 250 boys of that division came through the hospital suffering from severe shell wounds, and of all there was only one who did not suppress all complaint of the pain he was suffering.

"In the morning Chaplain Dunnigan and Maj. Wilson and some of the boys of Company E of the One hundred and twenty-fifth Regiment took me across the fields in the smiling sunshine above Ciergy to two graves newly made, side by side, each of them with its little wooden cross and the metal identification tag thereon. They were the first graves I saw of Michigan boys wrapped in the soil of France. One of them was the grave of Walter Taylor, of Lapeer, a member of my own Odd Fellows' lodge. Beside him a boy, Fred Schulz, of Sandusky. One of the boys with me showed us a photograph of Taylor and the girl in Lapeer he was to have married on his return. As I stood there I realized that life meant as much to those fellows as to any of us. Further, I realized that neither one of them owed to our flag or our country or to the cause of democracy any greater duty or obligation than you or I. I went a little way farther and saw those graves—one unidentified; one a Mexican; one a boy, Bert Ryan, or 'Paddy Ryan,' they called him, from Lapeer County; one a boy named Pollodina; one a boy named Arlt; and then a boy, Shauger.

"Later I was with Gen. Ferrero, the Italian commander in Albania, and while at dinner with him he showed me a letter he had that day from the Italian commander in France, a letter not written for American eyes, and hence of particular interest to me in its expressions about our soldiers. The Italian in France wrote that he had never seen such soldiers. 'They look as if they had always been soldiers. I do not know what it is, unless it is a matter of education and race.' I thought of those graves above Ciergy, with their Mexican, Taylor, Ryan, Schulz, Arlt, Shauger, and Pollodina. I can understand the matter of education, because there is no country in Europe where the boys have the opportunity for education that they have in this country. But the matter of race I was not so sure about, as I thought of those names, indicating many diverse ancestries, and I can not understand it, unless it be that we have here in America, in this atmosphere of democracy, developed a new American race that knows nothing of ancestries and nothing of place of birth, that knows only American ideals and goes forth at the call of the colors to fight for that America and its ideals with American courage and devotion.

"And, again, another thing occurs to me in connection with those graves, and that is the distinction between autocracy and democracy. When the war opened the Kaiser had a great empire and six sons. He has lost his empire, but still has his six sons, for in an autocracy it is the part of the people to sacrifice and of the rulers to survive and profit; but on that field above Ciergy, within a mile of the graves I have mentioned, I visited another grave, the grave of a son of a former President of the United States—Quentin Roosevelt. For in a democracy while there is equality of opportunity there is likewise equality of responsibility and sacrifice. And so in a democracy there is no one too humble to make the greatest sacrifice; there is no one too great to do his part of the common cause in a great emergency. And we must ever remember that while much has been said here at home about 100 per cent Americans, it is those boys over there, sleeping in those graves thousands of miles from home, who have made the 100 per cent sacrifice. I care not what any of you have suffered or sacrificed, there are none of you that have made the 100 per cent sacrifice, unless it be those who have sent such boys over there not to return.

"We now stand upon the threshold of days of peace. It has been said that 'peace has victories no less renowned than those of war.' It likewise is true that peace has its responsibilities no less important than those of war. We owe to those who have so nobly sacrificed in the past few months to see that the fruits of the victories they won is not frittered away at the peace table, to see that democracy is really made safe and free throughout the world. There will be upon each of us also a direct responsibility for the proper discharge of our obligations and duties as citizens of the greatest free democracy. The spirit of self-sacrifice and devotion and loyalty which has been so gloriously exemplified in the fields of war over there we should emulate in the highest possible degree on the more prosaic fields of peace over here. That is the message which I appeal to you each to take back to your homes. May I further emphasize this ideal by reading the following lines by Michigan's own poet, Eddie Guest, who is constantly gaining in his ability to give expression to the feelings of our people:

"WE ARE THE CHILDREN OF THE DEAD.

"They called to us before they passed:
'Unto our holy cause hold fast!
We fall, as God has willed, and yet
We leave to you an unpaid debt.
Remember, after we have gone
It is our work you carry on.'

"We are the children of the dead.
Out of the battle's heat and flame
To us from them this message came:
'We were your sons but yesterday,
As brothers then we marched away,
But since unto God's will we bow,
You have become our children now.'

"We are the children of the dead.
They called, ere the great silence came;
'Guard well our honor and our fame,
This heritage we leave to you,
Take up the task we tried to do,
In you, although our lives we give,
The purpose that we served must live.'"

"When we were at Verdun we met Gen. Hirschauer, a French commander, who has won much of fame in this war. When some of our party spoke to him of the fame and glory he had won he said, 'It is not my glory. We are simply the guardians of the glory of others.' Do you realize that those boys in khaki have been over there the guardians of the glory of Michigan and of America, and that in all time the glory of America has never shone so brightly as it does this day?"

Memorial to Francis Asbury.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES H. SLOAN.

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

On Senate joint resolution authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a memorial to Francis Asbury.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to favor the grant of a site by Congress for the erection of a memorial to Francis Asbury, the site to be within the National Capital City and at such point as may meet the approval of the Fine Arts Commission, whose concern it is to develop a symmetric and beautiful city as befits the Capital of the greatest Republic on earth.

No appropriation is asked or contemplated to be made from the National Treasury. The funds are nearly all ready, being contributed by the devoted and grateful followers of the first Protestant bishop consecrated in America—a Methodist Episcopal.

Church and state are properly separated both as to control and support in this Republic. But few Americans there are who are not interested in the proper maintenance of both.

In Statuary Hall, in the National Capitol, there stands in cold marble, enduring granite, or fire-hardened bronze form likenesses of the great as they once walked the earth. There none may be placed until the original has for years passed away, the test being that he is worthy of being so remembered if affection, honor, and national gratitude surviving grief and tender recollection are found to still occupy a commanding place in the esteem and honor of those who render honor to whom honor is due.

In a way, this is true in the memorials outside the Capitol. If their memories without memorials live in the stirring historic times for decades or centuries, then they are and should be perpetuated.

Washington is indeed the monumental city of America. Baltimore 50 years ago was so called. Her scepter has passed to Washington. Throughout the city are found monuments to Washington and Lincoln; warriors Greene, Scott, McClellan, Hancock, Meade, Thomas, Sherman, Grant; heroes of the sea John Paul Jones, Barry, and Farragut; Hahnemann, the healer; Franklin, the philosopher; Pike, the great esoteric scholar; Longfellow, the poet; and Columbus, the discoverer. Why should there not be a place for a great American divine? Why should not men of all denominations, followers of the Christ, not have memory here?

Of those who in our early national history carried the banner of Christ in one hand and the torch of civilization in the other to the pioneers, braving bloodthirsty savages and rude and passionate men, no man exercised a more potent and lasting influence upon our people and institutions than did Francis Asbury.

Twenty years ago, before the automobile placed every farm in the suburbs of a town or city, there was little need of Asbury memorials. The Asbury chapels in the rural communities were numerous. They were his monuments. The current of church and chapel building is urbanward. We now find many of the Asbury chapels neglected and falling into disuse, while the gospel of Asbury is being preached to rapidly increasing adherents of Methodism.

He was born in the parish of Handsworth, England, August 20, 1745. Early called to active militant church service, he became, in 1771, the elder Wesley's "proconsul" for America. This was a time for great thought, great action, and great achievement in great America. He represented a sect not subservient though duly respectful to the "powers that be." There was the unrest of Europe, and soon to be the revolution in America.

Let me say at this point that he was a patriot, standing with the people whom he hoped to serve in their struggle for an independent nationality, while every one of his coworkers sent from England by Wesley went back to the mother country.

The seashore and the great river banks had the important settlements of America. Many of them would have furnished a suitable home for a bishop, but this he did not desire nor would he have it. He believed that the outposts of American civilizaton should be the outposts of Methodism. He would be a commander to lead a charge rather than to order an advance made. So from 1784, when he was ordained a bishop, till 1816, when he passed to his reward, no road was too long to travel, no river too turbulent to cross, no storm too fearful to venture, no savage that he would not face, no civilized man or mob he would not confront. Frail of physique though he was, his courage, zeal, and industry carried him through.

This modest advocacy of the purposes of this bill with limited time does not demand or permit a recital of his achievements in the progress of his church. I have read much of him. He is the one American character whom I would compare with St. Paul. He, like the great apostle, denied himself the comforts of family and home. He had not the learning of that Christian advocate, who could proudly claim Roman citizenship, but in religious fervor, in charity, religious example, and an eloquence which addressed itself to the understanding of those whom he would win, the modern prelate of the wilderness might well be compared to the courageous philosopher and advocate who fought its battles in many lands of danger and before many angry people when the church was young.

Little coin did he ever carry in his scrip, his vestments were neither expensive nor frequently renewed. He slept less on an average than did Napoleon. He agreed with Franklin, his contemporary, that it were "better to wear out than to rust out."

At the Saratoga general conference in May, 1916, on the commemoration of the centennial of Bishop Asbury's death, Judge Henry Wade Rogers, in a masterly address, said:

Asbury preached about 16,500 sermons; traveled about 270,000 miles, most of it on horseback, some of it on foot; presided in 224 annual conferences; and ordained more than 4,000 preachers. In addition, he was writing more than a thousand letters a year.

Richard the Lion Hearted and Godfrey de Bouillon endured hardship, pestilence, and assailed a barbaric foe to recover and defend a tomb from which the Savior of Man had long since risen. Francis Asbury forsook home and risked life and limb among the heathen and criminal civilized of the New World to save for Christ's kingdom the children of men, a crusade in which I believe the Divine Master had greater interest than for the sanctity of the tomb which he had abandoned 19 centuries ago.

Against the reasonable request involved in this measure I trust there will be no protest or vote, and that a site may be granted to erect the proposed memorial to this brave, devoted man of God, to whom paens of praise rise wherever great bodies of Methodists assemble, North and South.

Suggestion of Chambers Kellar, of Lead, S. Dak., on Use of Trench Shotgun.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY L. GANDY,

OF SOUTH DAKOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to print an editorial from the Lead Daily Call, of Lead, S. Dak., of February 1, 1919, on the subject of the suggestion for the use of trench shotguns by the Army overseas:

The Literary Digest for January 18, 1919, published an article entitled "Facts about the trench shotgun." The article quotes from the opinion of Peter P. Carney, editor of the National Sports Syndicate, a statement to the effect that a Georgia engineer named Eager first suggested to the War Department the utilization of the short-barreled shotgun and that the suggestion met with favor. Possibly that is true. But the Call insists that a South Dakota lawyer first made this suggestion to the War Department, and made it so early in the war that the suggestion did not meet with favor. Since the shotgun has proven effective several sections of the country have claimed the credit of first making the suggestion of its use. We think the matter is of sufficient local interest to insist upon claiming the credit for South Dakota. The only satisfactory proof upon the subject is proof from the records. Our esteemed contemporary, the Aberdeen American, a short time ago claimed this credit for Mr. G. E. Lemmon, of Lemmon, S. Dak., whereupon the Call wrote to Mr. Lemmon requesting the date when he first made his suggestion. In reply, Mr. Lemmon wrote the Call that he made his suggestion on February 10, 1918, in a letter to Gen. Pershing. When did the Georgia engineer first call the matter to the attention of the War Department? On July 25, 1917, Chambers Kellar, of Lead, wrote the following letter to United States Senator STERLING and to Representative HARRY L. GANDY:

"At the outset I wish to respectfully beg that you read this letter clear through. After you have done so and had a good laugh at my expense, then read it through again. Then, if you want to, throw it into the waste-paper basket. As a sagebrush military strategist, I wish to have called to the attention of our War Department the desirability of equipping the American soldiers in the trenches with shotguns. I have never fought in the trenches, but I have handled firearms of every description all my life, belong to a local rifle club, in which I obtained a medal for expert marksmanship, and am a fair pistol shot.

"According to all accounts, trenches are defended and attacked by the use of bayonets, liquid fire (which I am advised can be thrown from 20 to 30 feet), hand grenades, etc. One hundred men, armed with cylinder Winchester pump guns, with cartridges loaded with 12 buckshots, could successfully hold a trench against any thousand men who might be foolish enough to make an attack. They could come with bayonets as thick as quills on a porcupine and enough liquid fire to make them look like bats out of hell and hand grenades like a bunch of toy balloons, but against 100 men with shotguns loaded with buckshot it would be like picking off clay pigeons from the scratch.

"Moreover, the same weapon would be just as effective in a rushing charge of trenches. As a matter of fact, a bayonet would be attached to a shotgun just as readily as to a rifle.

"Of course I don't suggest the substitute of the shotgun for the rifle. I simply suggest it as an additional weapon to be used in defense of the trenches and for use in a charge where it is expected that close fighting is to be required.

"Now, please don't consign this to the waste basket simply because it did not emanate from the head of the Ordnance Department."

In reply Senator STERLING, on July 30, 1917, wrote Mr. Kellar:

"I have yours of the 25th instant relating to the use of the shotgun as a war weapon, and I appreciate keenly what you have to say in regard to it. It has settled many a Kentucky or North Carolina feud very effectually, and I do not see why recourse could not be had to its use on the battle field or in the trenches when the opposing forces are at close quarters. As a practical question I think it is worthy of consideration, and I expect to find out what the War Department has to say about it."

On August 22, 1917, the War Department Board of Ordnance and Fortifications formally acknowledge receipt of Mr. Kellar's suggestion in the following letter to Mr. Kellar, from which it clearly appears that this was the first time the use of shotguns had been brought to the attention of the War Department:

"In reply to your letter of July 25, to Hon. HARRY L. GANDY, Member of Congress, I beg leave to inform you that the shotgun has not sufficient range for trench use and is not sufficiently effective within that range.

"The period during which a charging enemy is within 60 yards of a trench is not a favorable one for charging weapons. The present rifle magazine of cartridges is for such a period. But shot may stop a man in the condition that we see him at a rifle club, but not as he is in a trench charge—excited and infuriated. A rifle projectile causes shock; several buckshot would probably not cause shock and would permit a German to continue his work for some length of time after being shot.

"The automatic machine guns all along a trench, each firing 400 rounds per minute, and covering all ground within 1,000 yards in front, are more effective than a large number of shotguns for the short distance of 60 yards.

"It is not understood that you have heard any suggestions of a shotgun from the men of any nation who have been in the trenches or on the firing line.

"The interest shown in submitting your ideas is appreciated, and your suggestions have been filed with the confidential records of the board."

If Georgia or any other State is ahead of South Dakota in this matter we shall be glad to publish the record, but we want the record. Until then South Dakota claims the credit—dating back to July 25, 1917.

Social Reconstruction.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES A. GALLIVAN.

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I desire to ask the attention of Congress to a general review of the problems of social reconstruction at the end of the great war and a survey of remedies. This article was prepared by the committee on special war activities of the National Catholic War Council, consisting of Bishop P. J. Muldoon, of Rockford; Bishop Joseph Schrembs, of Toledo; Right Rev. Patrick J. Hayes, of New York; and Right Rev. William T. Russell, of Charleston, S. C. The article is as follows:

SOCIAL RECONSTRUCTION.

"Reconstruction" has of late been so tiresomely reiterated, not to say violently abused, that it has become to many of us a word of aversion. Politicians, social students, labor leaders, business men, charity workers, clergymen, and various other social groups have contributed their quota of spoken words and printed pages to the discussion of the subject; yet the majority of us still find ourselves rather bewildered and helpless. We are unable to say what parts of our social system imperatively need reconstruction; how much of that which is imperatively necessary is likely to be seriously undertaken; or what specific methods and measures are best suited to realize that amount of reconstruction which is at once imperatively necessary and immediately feasible.

Nevertheless, it is worth while to review briefly some of the more important statements and proposals that have been made by various social groups and classes. Probably the most notable declaration from a Catholic source is that contained in a pastoral letter, written by Cardinal Bourne several months ago. "It is admitted on all hands," he says, "that a new order of things, new social conditions, new relations between the different sections in which society is divided, will arise as a consequence of the destruction of the formerly existing conditions. * * * The very foundations of political and social life, of our economic system, of morals, and religion are being sharply scrutinized, and this not only by a few writers and speakers, but by a very large number of people in every class of life, especially among the workers."

The cardinal's special reference to the action of labor was undoubtedly suggested by the now famous "Social Reconstruction Program" of the British Labor Party. This document was drawn up about one year ago, and is generally understood to be the work of the noted economist and Fabian Socialist, Mr. Sidney Webb. Unquestionably, it is the most comprehensive and coherent program that has yet appeared on the industrial phase of reconstruction. In brief, it sets up "four pillars" of the new social order:

1. The enforcement by law of a national minimum of leisure, health, education, and subsistence;
2. The democratic control of industry, which means the nationalization of all monopolistic industries and possibly of other industries, some time in the future, if that course be found advisable;
3. A revolution in national finance—that is, a system of taxation which will compel capital to pay for the war, leaving undisturbed the national minimum of welfare for the masses;
4. Use of the surplus wealth of the Nation for the common good—that is, to provide capital, governmental industries, and funds for social, educational, and artistic progress.

This program may properly be described as one of immediate radical reforms, involving a rapid approach toward complete socialism.

PROGRAM OF AMERICAN LABOR.

In the United States three prominent labor bodies have formulated rough sketches of reconstruction plans. The California State Federation of Labor demands a legal minimum wage, Government prevention of unemployment, vocational education of discharged soldiers and sailors, Government control and management of all waterways, railroads, telegraphs, telephones, and public utilities generally, opening up of land to cooperative and small holdings, and payment of the war debt by a direct tax on incomes and inheritances. "Common ownership of the means of production" is also set down in the program, but is not sufficiently emphasized to warrant the conclusion that the authors seriously contemplate the early establishment of complete socialism.

The State Federation of Labor of Ohio calls for a legal minimum wage, insurance against sickness, accidents, and unemployment, old-age pensions, heavy taxation of land values, and reclamation and leasing of swamp lands; and Government ownership and management of railroads, telegraphs, telephones, merchant marine, coal and metal mines, oil and gas wells, pipe lines, and refineries.

The Chicago Federation of Labor has organized an Independent Labor Party and adopted a platform of "14 points." The principal demands are an eight-hour day and a minimum family living wage; reduction of the cost of living through cooperative enterprises and methods; Government prevention of unemployment and insurance on life, limb, health, and property; Government ownership and operation of railways and all other public utilities, steamships, stockyards, grain elevators, and "basic natural resources"; and payment of the war debt by taxes on incomes and land values and by appropriation of all inheritances in excess of $100,000. In some of its general expressions, such as "the nationalization and development of basic natural resources," this platform is the most radical of the three labor pronouncements.

BRITISH QUAKER EMPLOYERS.

Probably the most definite and comprehensive statement from the opposite industrial class was put forth several months ago by a group of 20 Quaker employers in Great Britain. In outline their program is as follows: A family living wage for all male employees, and a secondary wage in excess of this for workers having special skill, training, physical strength, responsibility for human life; the right of labor to organize, to bargain collectively with the employer, and to participate in the industrial part of business management; serious and practical measures to reduce the volume and hardship of unemployment; provisions of such working conditions as will safeguard health, physical integrity, and morals; the reduction, so far as practicable, of profits and interest until both the basic and the secondary wage has been paid, and transfer to the community of the greater part of surplus profits.

The spirit and conception of responsibility that permeate every item of the program are reflected in this statement: "We would ask all employers to consider very carefully whether their style of living and personal expenditure are restricted to what is needed in order to insure the efficient performance of their functions in society. More than this is waste, and is, moreover, a great cause of class divisions."

AMERICAN EMPLOYERS.

The only important declaration by representatives of the employing class in the United States was given out December 6 by the convention of the National Chamber of Commerce. Compared with the program of the British Quakers, it is extremely disappointing. By far the greater part of it consists of proposals and demands in the interest of business. It opposes Government ownership of railroads, telegraphs, and telephones; calls for moderation in taxation, and demands a modification of the Sherman antitrust law. While it commended the program of John D. Rockefeller, jr., on the relations that should exist between capital and labor, it took away much of the value of this action by declining to indorse the specific methods which that gentleman proposed for carrying his general principles into effect. The most important and progressive general statements made by Mr. Rockefeller are that industry should promote the advancement of social welfare quite as much as material welfare and that the laborer is entitled to fair wages, reasonable hours of work, proper working conditions, a decent home, and reasonable opportunities of recreation, education, and worship.

The most important specific method that he has recommended for bringing about harmony between employers and employees is adequate representation of both parties. Apparently the National Chamber of Commerce is not yet ready to concede the right of labor to be represented in determining its relations with capital.

AN INTERDENOMINATIONAL STATEMENT.

In Great Britain an organization known as the Interdenominational Conference of Social Service Unions, comprising 10 religious bodies, including Catholics, spent more than a year formulating a statement of social reconstruction. (See the summary and analysis contained in the Catholic Social Year Book for 1918.) This statement deals with principles, evils, and remedies. Presuming that Christianity provides indispensable guiding principles and powerful motives of social reform, it lays down the basic proposition that every human being is of inestimable worth and that legislation should recognize persons as more sacred than property; therefore the State should enforce a minimum living wage, enable the worker to obtain some control of industrial conditions, supplement private initiative in providing decent housing, prevent the occurrence of unemployment, safeguard the right of the laborer and his family to a reasonable amount of rest and recreation, remove those industrial and social conditions which hinder marriage and encourage an unnatural restriction of families, and afford ample opportunities for education of all children industrially, culturally, religiously, and morally. On the other hand, rights imply duties, and the individual is obliged to respect the rights of others, to cultivate self-control, to recognize that labor is the law of life, and that wealth is a trust. Finally, the statement points out that all social reform must take as its end and guide the maintenance of pure and wholesome family life.

Such in barest outline are the main propositions and principles of this remarkable program. The text contains adequate exposition of the development and application of all these points and concrete specifications of the methods and measures by which the aims and principles may be brought into effect. In the latter respect the statement is not liable to the fatal objection that is frequenly and fairly urged against the reform pronouncements of religious bodies; that they are abstract, platitudinous, and usually harmless. The statement of the interdenominational conference points out specific remedies for the evils that it describes, specific measures, legislative and other, by which the principles may be realized in actual life. Especially practical and valuable for Catholics are the explanations and modifications supplied by the Year Book of the Catholic Social Guild.

NO PROFOUND CHANGES IN THE UNITED STATES.

It is not to be expected that as many or as great social changes will take place in the United States as in Europe. Neither our habits of thinking nor our ordinary ways of life have undergone a profound disturbance. The hackneyed phrase, "Things will never again be the same after the war," has a much more concrete and deeply felt meaning among the European peoples. Their minds are fully adjusted to the conviction and expectation that these words will come true. In the second place, the devastation, the loss of capital and of men, the changes in individual relations, and the increase in the activities of government have been much greater in Europe than in the United States. Moreover, our superior natural advantages and resources, the better industrial and social condition of our working classes still constitute an obstacle to anything like revolutionary changes. It is significant that no social group in America, not even among the wage earners, has produced such a fundamental and radical program of reconstruction as the labor party of Great Britain.

A PRACTICAL AND MODERATE PROGRAM.

No attempt will be made in these pages to formulate a comprehensive scheme of reconstruction. Such an undertaking would be a waste of time as regards immediate needs and purposes, for no important group or section of the American people is ready to consider a program of this magnitude. Attention will therefore be confined to those reforms that seem to be desirable and also obtainable within a reasonable time, and to a few general principles which should become a guide to more distant developments. A statement thus circumscribed will not merely present the objects that we wish to see attained, but will also serve as an imperative call to action. It will keep before our minds the necessity for translating our faith into works. In the statements of immediate proposals we shall start, wherever possible, from those governmental agencies and legislative measures which have been to some extent in operation during the war. These come before us with the prestige of experience and should therefore receive first consideration in any program that aims to be at once practical and persuasive.

The first problem in the process of reconstruction is the industrial replacement of the discharged soldiers and sailors. The majority of these will undoubtedly return to their previous occupations. However, a very large number of them will either find their previous places closed to them or will be eager to consider the possibility of more attractive employments. The most important single measure for meeting this situation that has yet been suggested is the placement of such men on farms. Several months ago Secretary Lane recommended to Congress that returning soldiers and sailors should be given the opportunity to work at good wages upon some part of the millions upon millions of acres of arid, swamp, and cut-over timber lands, in order to prepare them for cultivation. President Wilson in his annual address to Congress indorsed the proposal. As fast as this preliminary task has been performed the men should be assisted by Government loans to establish themselves as farmers, either as owners or as tenants having long-time leases. It is essential that both the work of preparation and the subsequent settlement of the land should be effected by groups or colonies, not by men living independently of one another and in depressing isolation. A plan of this sort is already in operation in England. The importance of the project as an item of any social-reform program is obvious. It would afford employment to thousands upon thousands, would greatly increase the number of farm owners and independent farmers, and would tend to lower the cost of living by increasing the amount of agricultural products. If it is to assume any considerable proportions, it must be carried out by the Governments of the United States and of the several States. Should it be undertaken by these authorities and operated on a systematic and generous scale, it would easily become one of the most beneficial reform measures that have ever been attempted.

UNITED STATES EMPLOYMENT SERVICE.

The reinstatement of the soldiers and sailors in urban industries will no doubt be facilitated by the United States Employment Service. This agency has attained a fair degree of development and efficiency during the war. Unfortunately there is some danger that it will go out of existence or be greatly weakened at the end of the period of demobilization. It is the obvious duty of Congress to continue and strengthen this important institution. The problem of unemployment is with us always. Its solution requires the cooperation of many agencies and the use of many methods, but the primary and indispensable instrument is a national system of labor exchanges acting in harmony with State, municipal, and private employment bureaus.

WOMEN WAR WORKERS.

One of the most important problems of readjustment is that created by the presence in industry of immense numbers of women who have taken the places of men during the war. Mere justice, to say nothing of chivalry, dictates that these women should not be compelled to suffer any greater loss or inconvenience than is absolutely necessary, for their services to the Nation have been second only to the services of the men whose places they were called upon to fill. One general principle is clear: No female worker should remain in any occupation that is harmful to health or morals. Women should disappear as quickly as possible from such tasks as conducting and guarding street cars, cleaning locomotives, and a great number of other activities for which conditions of life and their physique render them unfit. Another general principle is that the proportion of women in industry ought to be kept within the smallest practical limits. If we have an efficient national employment service, if a goodly number of the returned soldiers and sailors are placed on the land, and if wages and the demand for goods are kept up to the level which is easily attainable, all female workers who are displaced from tasks that they have been performing only since the beginning of the war will be able to find suitable employments in other parts of the industrial field, or in those domestic occupations which sorely need their presence. Those women who are engaged at the same tasks as men should receive equal pay for equal amounts and qualities of work.

NATIONAL WAR LABOR BOARD.

One of the most beneficial governmental organizations of the war is the National War Labor Board. Upon the basis of a few fundamental principles, unanimously adopted by the representatives of labor, capital, and the public, it has prevented innumerable strikes and raised wages to decent levels in many different industries throughout the country. Its main guiding principles have been a family living wage for all male adult laborers, recognition of the right of labor to organize and to deal with employers through its chosen representatives, and no coercion of nonunion laborers by members of the union. The War Labor Board ought to be continued in existence by Congress and endowed with all the power for effective action that it can possess under the Federal Constitution. The principles, methods, machinery, and results of this institution constitute a definite and far-reaching gain for social justice. No part of this advantage should be lost or given up in time of peace.

PRESENT WAGE RATES SHOULD BE SUSTAINED.

The general level of wages attained during the war should not be lowered. In a few industries, especially some directly and peculiarly connected with the carrying on of war, wages have reached a plane upon which they can not possibly continue for this grade of occupations. But the number of workers in this situation is an extremely small proportion of the entire wage-earning population. The overwhelming majority should not be compelled or suffered to undergo any reduction in their rates of remuneration, for two reasons: First, because the average rate of pay has not increased faster than the cost of living; second, because a considerable majority of the wage earners of the United States, both men and women, were not receiving living wages when prices began to rise in 1915. In that year, according to Lauck and Sydenstricker, whose work is the most comprehensive on the subject, four-fifths of the heads of families obtained less than $800, while two-thirds of the female wage earners were paid less than $400. Even if the prices of goods should fall to the level on which they were in 1915—something that can not be hoped for within five years—the average present rates of wages would not exceed the equivalent of a decent livelihood in the case of the vast majority. The exceptional instances to the contrary are practically all among the skilled workers. Therefore wages, on the whole, should not be reduced even when the cost of living recedes from its present high level.

Even if the great majority of workers were now in receipt of more than living wages, there are no good reasons why rates of pay should be lowered. After all, a living wage is not necessarily the full measure of justice. All the Catholic authorities on the subject explicitly declare that this is only the minimum of justice. In a country as rich as ours there are very few cases in which it is possible to prove that the worker would be getting more than that to which he has a right if he were paid something in excess of this ethical minimum. Why, then, should we assume that this is the normal share of almost the whole laboring population? Since our industrial resources and instrumentalities are sufficient to provide more than a living wage for a very large proportion of the workers, why should we acquiesce in a theory which denies them this measure of the comforts of life? Such a policy is not only of very questionable morality but is unsound economically. The large demand for goods which is created and maintained by high rates of wages and high purchasing power by the masses is the surest guaranty of a continuous and general operation of industrial establishments. It is the most effective instrument of prosperity for labor and capital alike. The only persons who would benefit considerably through a general reduction of wages are the less efficient among the capitalists and the more comfortable sections of the consumers. The wage earners would lose more in remuneration than they would gain from whatever fall in prices occurred as a direct result of the fall in wages. On grounds both of justice and sound economics we should give our hearty support to all legitimate efforts made by labor to resist general wage reductions.

HOUSING FOR WORKING CLASSES.

Housing projects for war workers which have been completed, or almost completed, by the Government of the United States have cost some forty million dollars and are found in 11 cities. While the Federal Government can not continue this work in time of peace, the example and precedent that it has set and the experience and knowledge that it has developed should not be forthwith neglected and lost. The great cities in which congestion and other forms of bad housing are disgracefully apparent ought to take up and continue the work, at least to such an extent as will remove the worst features of a social condition that is a menace at once to industrial efficiency, civic health, good morals, and religion.

REDUCTION OF THE COST OF LIVING.

During the war the cost of living has risen at least 75 per cent above the level of 1913. Some check has been placed upon the upward trend by Government fixing of prices in the case of bread and coal and a few other commodities. Even if we believe it desirable, we can not ask that the Government continue this action after the articles of peace have been signed, for neither public opinion nor Congress is ready for such a revolutionary policy. If the extortionate practices of monopoly were prevented by adequate laws and adequate law enforcement, prices would automatically be kept at as low a level as that to which they might be brought by direct Government determination. Just what laws, in addition to those already on the statute books, are necessary to abolish monopolistic extortion is a question of detail that need not be considered here. In passing, it may be noted that Government competition with monopolies that can not be effectively restrained by the ordinary antitrust laws deserves more serious consideration than it has yet received.

More important and more effective than any Government regulation of prices would be the establishment of cooperative stores. The enormous toll taken from industry by the various classes of middlemen is now fully realized. The astonishing difference between the price received by the producer and that paid by the consumer has become a scandal to our industrial system. The obvious and direct means of reducing this discrepancy and abolishing unnecessary middlemen is the operation of retail and wholesale mercantile concerns under the ownership and management of the consumers. This is no Utopian scheme. It has been successfully carried out in England and Scotland through the Rochdale system. Very few serious efforts of this kind have been made in this country because our people have not felt the need of these cooperative enterprises as keenly as the European working classes, and because we have been too impatient and too individualistic to make the necessary sacrifices and to be content with moderate benefits and gradual progress. Nevetheless, our superior energy, initiative, and commercial capacity will enable us, once we set about the task earnestly, even to surpass what has been done in England and Scotland.

In addition to reducing the cost of living, the cooperative stores would train our working people and consumers generally in habits of saving, in careful expenditure, in business methods, and in the capacity for cooperation. When the working classes have learned to make the sacrifices and to exercise the patience required by the ownership and operation of cooperative stores, they will be equipped to undertake a great variety of tasks and projects which benefit the community immediately and all its constituent members ultimately. They will then realize the folly of excessive selfishness and senseless individualism. Until they have acquired this knowledge, training, and capacity, desirable extensions of governmental action in industry will not be attended by a normal amount of success. No machinery of Government can operate automatically, and no official and bureaucratic administration of such machinery can ever be a substitute for intelligent interest and cooperation by the individuals of the community.

THE LEGAL MINIMUM WAGE.

Turning now from those agencies and laws that have been put in operation during the war to the general subject of labor legislation and problems, we are glad to note that there is no longer any serious objection urged by impartial persons against the legal minimum wage. The several States should enact laws providing for the establishment of wage rates that will be at least sufficient for the decent maintenance of a family, in the case of all male adults, and adequate to the decent individual support of female workers. In the beginning the minimum wages for male workers should suffice only for the present needs of the family, but they should be gradually raised until they are adequate to future needs as well; that is, they should be ultimately high enough to make possible that amount of saving which is necessary to protect the worker and his family against sickness, accidents, invalidity, and old age.

SOCIAL INSURANCE.

Until this level of legal minimum wages is reached the worker stands in need of the device of insurance. The State should make comprehensive provision for insurance against illness, invalidity, unemployment, and old age. So far as possible the insurance fund should be raised by a levy on industry, as is now done in the case of accident compensation. The industry in which a man is employed should provide him with all that is necessary to meet all the needs of his entire life. Therefore any contribution to the insurance fund from the general revenues of the State should be only slight and temporary. For the same reason no contribution should be exacted from any worker who is not getting a higher wage than is required to meet the present needs of himself and family. Those who are below that level can make such a contribution only at the expense of their present welfare. Finally, the administration of the insurance laws should be such as to interfere as little as possible with the individual freedom of the worker and his family. Any insurance scheme, or any administrative method, that tends to separate the workers into a distinct and dependent class, that offends against their domestic privacy and independence, or that threatens individual self-reliance and self-respect should not be tolerated. The ideal to be kept in mind is a condition in which all the workers would themselves have the income and the responsibility of providing for all the needs and contingencies of life, both present and future. Hence all forms of State insurance should be regarded as merely a lesser evil, and should be so organized and administered as to hasten the coming of the normal condition.

The life insurance offered to soldiers and sailors during the war should be continued, so far as the enlisted men are concerned. It is very doubtful whether the time has yet arrived when public opinion would sanction the extension of general life insurance by the Government to all classes of the community.

The establishment and maintenance of municipal health inspection in all schools, public and private, is now pretty generally recognized as of great importance and benefit. Municipal clinics where the poorer classes could obtain the advantage of medical treatment by specialists at a reasonable cost would likewise seem to have become a necessity. A vast amount of unnecessary sickness and suffering exists among the poor and the lower middle classes, because they can not afford the advantages of any other treatment except that provided by the general practitioner. The service of these clinics should be given gratis only to those who can not afford to pay.

LABOR PARTICIPATION IN INDUSTRIAL MANAGEMENT.

The right of labor to organize and to deal with employers through representatives has been asserted above in connection with the discussion of the War Labor Board. It is to be hoped that this right will never again be called in question by any considerable number of employers. In addition to this, labor ought gradually to receive greater representation in what the English group of Quaker employers have called the "industrial" part of business management—"the control of processes and machinery; nature of product; engagement and dismissal of employees; hours of work, rates of pay, bonuses, etc.; welfare work; shop discipline; relations with trade-unions." The establishment of shop committees, working wherever possible with the trade-union, is the method suggested by this group of employers for giving the employees the proper share of industrial management. There can be no doubt that a frank adoption of these means and ends by employers would not only promote the welfare of the workers but vastly improve the relations between them and their employers, and increase the efficiency and productiveness of each establishment.

There is no need here to emphasize the importance of safety and sanitation in work places, as this is pretty generally recognized by legislation. What is required is an extension and strengthening of many of the existing statutes, and a better administration and enforcement of such laws everywhere.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING.

The need of industrial or, as it has come to be more generally called, vocational training is now universally acknowledged. In the interest of the Nation, as well as in that of the workers themselves, this training should be made substantially universal. While we can not now discuss the subject in any detail, we do wish to set down two general observations. First, the vocational training should be offered in such forms and conditions as not to deprive the children of the working classes of at least the elements of a cultural education. A healthy democracy can not tolerate a purely industrial or trade education for any class of its citizens. We do not want to have the children of the wage earners put into a special class in which they are marked as outside the sphere of opportunities for culture. The second observation is that the system of vocational training should not operate so as to weaken in any degree our parochial schools or any other class of private schools. Indeed, the opportunities of the system should be extended to all qualified private schools on exactly the same basis as to public schools. We want neither class divisions in education nor a State monopoly of education.

CHILD LABOR.

The question of education naturally suggests the subject of child labor. Public opinion in the majority of the States of our country has set its face inflexibly against the continuous employment of children in industry before the age of 16 years. Within a reasonably short time all of our States, except some stagnant ones, will have laws providing for this reasonable standard. The education of public opinion must continue, but inasmuch as the process is slow the abolition of child labor in certain sections seems unlikely to be brought about by the legislatures of those States, and since the Keating-Owen Act has been declared unconstitutional there seems to be no device by which this reproach to our country can be removed except that of taxing child labor out of existence. This method is embodied in an amendment to the Federal revenue bill, which would impose a tax of 10 per cent on all goods made by children.

Probably the foregoing proposals comprise everything that is likely to have practical value in a program of immediate social reconstruction for America. Substantially all of these methods, laws, and recommendations have been recognized in principle by the United States during the war, or have been indorsed by important social and industrial groups and organizations. Therefore they are objects that we can set before the people with good hope of obtaining a sympathetic and practical response. Were they all realized a great step would have been taken in the direction of social justice. When they are all put into operation the way will be easy and obvious to still greater and more beneficial results.

ULTIMATE AND FUNDAMENTAL REFORMS.

Despite the practical and immediate character of the present statement, we can not entirely neglect the question of ultimate aims and a systematic program; for other groups are busy issuing such systematic pronouncements, and we will all need something of the kind as a philosophical foundation and as a satisfaction to our natural desire for comprehensive statements.

It seems clear that the present industrial system is destined to last for a long time in its main outlines. That is to say, private ownership of capital is not likely to be supplanted by a collectivist organization of industry at a date sufficiently near to justify any present action based on the hypothesis of its arrival. This forecast we recognize as not only extremely probable but as highly desirable; for, other objections apart, socialism would mean bureaucracy, political tyranny, the helplessness of the individual as a factor in the ordering of his own life, and general social inefficiency and decadence.

MAIN DEFECTS OF PRESENT SYSTEM.

Nevertheless, the present system stands in grievous need of considerable modifications and improvement. Its main defects are three: Enormous inefficiency and waste in the production and distribution of commodities; insufficient incomes for the great majority of wage earners, and unnecessarily large incomes for a small minority of privileged capitalists. The evils in production and in the distribution of goods would be in great measure abolished by the reforms that have been outlined in the foregoing pages. Production will be greatly increased by universal living wages, by adequate industrial education, and by harmonious relations between labor and capital on the basis of adequate participation by the former in all the industrial aspects of business management. The wastes of commodity distribution could be practically all eliminated by cooperative mercantile establishments and cooperative selling and marketing associations.

COOPERATION AND COPARTNERSHIP.

Nevertheless, the full possibilities of increased production will not be realized so long as the majority of the workers remain mere wage earners. The majority must somehow become owners, or at least in part, of the instruments of production. They can be enabled to reach this stage gradually through cooperative productive societies and copartnership arrangements. In the former the workers own and manage the industries themselves; in the latter they own a substantial part of the corporate stock and exercise a reasonable share in the management. However slow the attainment of these ends, they will have to be reached before we can have a thoroughly efficient system of production, or an industrial and social order that will be secure from the danger of revolution. It is to be noted that this particular modification of the existing order, though far-reaching and involving to a great extent the abolition of the wage system, would not mean the abolition of private ownership. The instruments of production would still be owned by individuals, not by the State.

INCREASED INCOMES FOR LABOR.

The second great evil, that of insufficient income for the majority, can be removed only by providing the workers with more income. This means not only universal living wages, but the opportunity of obtaining something more than that amount for all who are willing to work hard and faithfully. All the other measures for labor betterment recommended in the preceding pages would likewise contribute directly or indirectly to a more just distribution of wealth in the interest of the laborer.

ABOLITION AND CONTROL OF MONOPOLIES.

For the third evil mentioned above, excessive gains by a small minority of privileged capitalists, the main remedies are prevention of monopolistic control of commodities, adequate Government regulation of such public-service monopolies as will remain under private operation, and heavy taxation of incomes, excess profits, and inheritances. The precise methods by which genuine competition may be restored and maintained among businesses that are naturally competitive can not be discussed here, but the principle is clear that human beings can not be trusted with the immense opportunities for oppression and extortion that go with the possession of monopoly power. That the owners of public-service monopolies should be restricted by law to a fair or average return on their actual investment has long been a recognized principle of the courts, the legislatures, and public opinion. It is a principle which should be applied to competitive enterprises likewise, with the qualification that something more than the average rate of return should be allowed to men who exhibit exceptional efficiency. However, good public policy, as well as equity, demands that these exceptional business men share the fruits of their efficiency with the consumer in the form of lower prices. The man who utilizes his ability to produce cheaper than his competitors for the purpose of exacting from the public as high a price for his product as is necessary for the least efficient business man is a menace rather than a benefit to industry and society.

Our immense war debt constitutes a particular reason why incomes and excess profits should continue to be heavily taxed. In this way two important ends will be obtained—the poor will be relieved of injurious tax burdens and the small class of specially privileged capitalists will be compelled to return a part of their unearned gains to society.

A NEW SPIRIT OF VITAL NEED.

"Society," said Pope Leo XIII, "can be healed in no other way than by a return to Christian life and Christian institutions." The truth of these words is more widely perceived to-day than when they were written, more than 27 years ago. Changes in our economic and political systems will have only partial and feeble efficiency if they be not reenforced by the Christian view of work and wealth. Neither the moderate reforms advocated in this paper nor any other program of betterment or reconstruction will prove reasonably effective without a reform in the spirit of both labor and capital. The laborer must come to realize that he owes his employer and society an honest day's work in return for a fair wage and that conditions can not be substantially improved until he roots out the desire to get a maximum of return for a minimum of service. The capitalist must likewise get a new viewpoint. He needs to learn the long-forgotten truth that wealth is stewardship; that profit making is not the basic justification of business enterprise; and that there are such things as fair profits, fair interest, and fair prices. Above and before all, he must cultivate and strengthen within his mind the truth which many of his class have begun to grasp for the first time during the present war, namely, that the laborer is a human being, not merely an instrument of production, and that the laborer's right to a decent livelihood is the first moral charge upon industry. The employer has a right to get a reasonable living out of his business, but he has no right to interest on his investment until his employees have obtained at least living wages. This is the human and Christian, in contrast to the purely commercial and pagan, ethics of industry.

Actions Speak Louder Than Words—By Their Fruits Ye Shall Know Them.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS L. BLANTON,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, availing myself of the privilege unanimously granted, I desire to elaborate the remarks I made concerning the United States Employment Service during the debate on the sundry civil bill.

The following is the letter sent me by the Department of Labor:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 6, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of January 23, 1919, addressed to Hon. W. B. Wilson, Secretary of Labor, is received. In reply thereto I will say that the Bureau of Labor Statistics of this department compiles, from various newspapers and other sources, as complete a list as possible of all strikes that occur. This list is not complete and it may also contain some duplications, because it is not always possible to tell from newspaper reports whether the report is concerning a new strike or whether it refers to a strike previously reported. Therefore the figures given can not be more than an approximation. After eliminating duplicates as far as possible this list shows that there were approximately 6,000 strikes between April 6, 1917, and November, 1918, the average duration of which was approximately 17 or 18 days.

Regretting that I am unable to furnish you more accurate information, and trusting that this approximate figure may be of some value to you, I am,

Very truly, yours,

H. L. KERWIN,
Assistant to the Secretary.

The Dallas News editorially last Sunday thought that I must be exaggerating when I stated that it has reached a point when Congress must decide whether America and its Government are to be run by and in the interest of its 110,000,000 people or by Samuel Gompers in the selfish interests of 3,000,000 members of labor unions. This great daily of the South asserted that the people of this country will never allow such a point to be reached, but made the following admissions:

But undoubtedly there is a growing disposition on the part of men who profess to speak for labor to threaten the country as a means of enforcing their will. They do not go to the extent of drawing a gun on the country to terrorize it into compliance, but they remind it, in ways more or less covert, that labor has a gun in its pocket which it may be provoked into using if its demands are denied. The particular incident which seems to have moved Mr. BLANTON into making this statement was the receipt of a cablegram from Mr. Gompers "insinuating," to use the language of Mr. BLANTON, "that failure" to continue the existence of the United States Employment Service "would cause a revolution of the discontented labor members here." We do not, of course, know whether that is a fair summary of Mr. Gompers's cablegram or not, but men employed in that service, who therefore have a financial reason for desiring to have it continued, have been circularizing the country by telegraph, at public expense, and the argument used in those telegraphic circulars has been of the tenor which Mr. BLANTON attributes to Mr. Gompers. They have, in other words, given the intimation unmistakably that a failure to continue the existence of the United States Employment Service might provoke labor into engaging in violent measures by way of showing its resentment.

This is not the only instance showing a disposition on the part of labor leaders to substitute threats for argument as a means of accomplishing the things they desire. For example, the chief of one of the railroad brotherhoods warned a committee of Congress the other day that unless the railroad problem were solved by the formula prescribed by the brotherhoods strikes might result, and that these strikes might be directed to revolutionary ends. Another rather signal instance of like kind is to be found in the action of a number of labor unions in New York in voting to strike unless, in some manner undescribed, the country does not revoke its decision to forbid the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. In each of these instances a thinly veiled terrorism is used to constrain the Government and the country into doing something which, presumably, they would not do if they were left free to exercise their own judgment and pleasure.

Nevertheless, because of the strike now engaged in by the New York Harbor employees, the United States ship George Washington, carrying the President back to France, was denied its regular harbor convoy from the docks out to sea.

And because certain Congressmen have refused to obey the mandates of Samuel Gompers, and have taken their political fortunes into their own hands by voting according to the dictates of their own consciences, the following ultimatum is published in the Washington Star:

CAMPAIGN AGAINST MEN KNOWN FOES OF LABOR—FRANK MORRISON MAKES ANNOUNCEMENT AT DINNER GIVEN IN HONOR OF MR. KEATING.

An active campaign is to be conducted by organized labor throughout the Nation to defeat Members of Congress who have shown themselves to be foes of labor and who are responsible for the failure to deal with unemployment problems during the past session. Strong and determined efforts will be made to elect men carrying union cards or otherwise known to be friends of labor.

This was divulged last night by Frank Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, who was one of the principal speakers at the testimonial banquet given to EDWARD KEATING, retiring member of Congress from Colorado, by the joint conference retirement committee representing various organizations of Government employees.

SAYS LABOR KNOWS ITS FRIENDS.

In a highly spirited speech Secretary Morrison declared organized labor knows its friends and enemies, and that persistent warfare is to be waged against the latter. Already plans for a general campaign have been discussed by officers of the federation. He said that organizations want to see more trade-unionists in both branches of Congress. He severely scored those legislators who have failed to support legislation beneficial to the working classes of America.

The big banquet hall of the Ebbitt was attractively decorated, and the occasion of this testimonial dinner was highly impressive and interesting. Tribute was paid to Mr. KEATING, the various speakers being most complimentary in sounding his praises. It was very perceptible that the efforts of this aggressive champion of organized labor and the Federal employees were highly appreciated, and that his activities in their behalf will long be remembered.

During the evening Mr. KEATING was presented with an engraved testimonial, bearing the inscription, "Friend, counselor, comrade, and ally."

And while various labor unions in the United States are threatening a general strike unless the convicted murderer Mooney is released, the Bolshevik Lenine in Russia is threatening death to a captured American there unless Mooney is pardoned.

The Dallas News is probably not aware of the fact that hardly any measure of importance can be favorably reported out of a committee in Congress until Mr. Gompers and organized labor have been heard upon it.

In Samuel Gompers's 192-word cablegram, a copy of which Mr. Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, sent to the 435 Congressmen, he said:

Our investigation and findings in European countries show that unrest and unhealthy conditions now prevailing among laboring classes are due mainly to after-war conditions; that there is danger to the public weal in some of the efforts that are being put forward by the discontented masses, and that to prevent growth of similar conditions in America Congress must take such action—

And so forth.

Also, the Dallas News is probably not aware of the fact that, no matter how inefficient, how unworthy, how dissipated, or how merited, this Government is absolutely powerless to discharge one of its regular civil-service employees here in Washington, because, forsooth, he is a member of the National Federation of Federal Employees, affiliated with and backed up by Samuel Gompers and the American Federation of Labor. Does the Dallas News know that there are scores of Government employees so aged and feeble that they have to be helped to their desks here every morning, doing no service of any value to the Government, yet still drawing large salaries in full as heads and chiefs of various sections and departments?

Mr. John T. Parker, of Laredo, Tex., writes me as follows:

This office here in Laredo is run by one manager at a salary of $140 per month, two assistants at $100 each per month, and one striker at $50 per month, besides house rent and incidental expenses. The manager here has a farm near Laredo, so he is making his ax cut both ways, and the three men working in the office here are all part Mexicans.

One of the leading business men of Dallas, Tex., writes:

I agree with your position exactly and believe that the Employment Service has served its purpose.

Mr. J. D. Head, of Amarillo, Tex., writes:

I think you are exactly right. I have three sons in the service now. There is plenty of work for every man who really wants a job. The Employment Service here has four employees on salary. The real estate agents here agree to find work for all at good wages. Thank you for saving the people money.

Dr. George W. Holmes, of Merritt, Fla., writes me:

That you have had the courage to express yourself against the domination of Congressmen and United States Senators by Samuel Gompers is evidence of your usefulness, and highly appreciated by the public.

I was one of the Civil War soldiers. We were willing to go to work at prevailing wages, and we found jobs when we got home. We must protect our constitutional form of Government.

I am in receipt of a letter from a laborer in Harrisburg, Pa., who, because he refused to join a strike during the war, was expelled from a union. He says:

I worked day and night after the United States entered the war, put my savings into bonds, war certificates, and subscribed to relief funds. I was employed on ordnance work and refused to strike, working during three walkouts. Now I am called a "scab" by all union men, and am subjected to every kind of abuse and threats of bodily harm. To my mind our Nation is in a serious and deplorable situation.

I have a letter from a laborer in San Antonio, Tex., stating that he is a poor, hard-working man, but indorses my action.

I am just in receipt of a letter from the county attorney at Oakville, Tex., stating:

Those present, a stockman, banker, merchant, and laborers, hearing your telegram to Judge Carl in the Express read, said "Hurrah for BLANTON; we fully indorse his position."

One of the leading business men of Waco, Tex., writes me:

I know something of these organizations and their methods. You have started something, and I want you to know that at least one man is with you, heart and soul, and that it is my opinion that several million others feel as I do.

One of the substantial business men of Augusta, Ga., writes:

You have rendered the country a distinct service by the stand you have taken. Labor unions have become a national menace and will overthrow the Government and our institutions as surely as the sun shines unless they are properly controlled. They recognize violence, destruction of property, murder, and anarchy.

I quote the following from page 716 of the Federal Employee:

"DAMNABLE," SAYS GOMPERS.

"It is damnable," said Mr. Gompers in his office in the American Federation of Labor Building, when asked concerning the Borland bill.

Because the Borland amendment required the 240,000 Government employees, before receiving the $120 raise in salary, to work eight instead of only seven hours per day in war time, Mr. Samuel Gompers called it "damnable."

Another substantial citizen of Texas writes me:

Everything you say about the service being in the hands of the labor unions and used to further their ends is correct, and you could have gone further and stated that the bureau as it was maintained during the war was nothing short of a joke. The San Antonio headquarters has been conducting a propaganda and sending commercial messages under the Government franking privilege all over the country urging individuals and organizations to get busy and demand of Congress that an appropriation be made to sustain the work on a big scale.

So far as my knowledge goes, the bureau in Texas has been entirely under the influence of labor unions, the director being an ex-railroad conductor, and he has placed in the service as field representatives just anyone, almost, that he could pick up, many of whom were switchmen and brakemen or members of other branches of the unionized labor service. This was done without regard to efficiency.

I have quoted only from men out of my district, hence feel that their expressions are genuine and not influenced by friendship. Let me quote the following Texas items from page 253 of the March (1919) issue of the American Federationist:

TEXAS.

Beaumont, I. Ross: Longshoremen are on strike for wage adjustment. Employment is steady. Laborers, riggers, and fasteners have organized.

Brownwood, C. A. Perkins: Effective January 1, carpenters' increased scale from 62½ cents per hour to 75 cents. There is considerable unemployment.

Childress, B. H. Dennison: Maintenance of way employees, railway and retail clerks have organized. Employment is steady.

Galveston, J. S. Lewis: Several unions have secured improvements in wages, hours, and working conditions. Women workers are organizing as never before. Employment is steady.

Houston, R. L. Johnson: Mechanics and boiler makers are still on strike. White laundry workers are organized in this city. Employment is steady in some lines of work.

Orange, A. J. Wharton: Laborers doing creosoting work gained an increase of 10 cents per hour. Employment is fair. Shipyard laborers and fasteners amalgamated under International Longshoremen's Association, with 700 members.

San Antonio, Frank J. Hopkins: Colored Car Cleaners' Local Union has been formed, as well as unions of meat cutters and slaughterhouse employees. Employment is fair.

Teague, T. F. Hamilton: Carpenters, painters, plasterers, and bricklayers are 100 per cent organized. Employment is steady at present.

Wichita Falls, Jack Prather: Sheet-metal workers, automobile mechanics, motormen, and conductors have organized, and local of waiters has been reorganized. Employment is steady.

I may not be able to withstand "the persistent warfare" which Secretary Morrison threatens will be waged against me by organized labor because I have dared to disobey the autocrat, but I can promise him one thing: He has matched a scrap with a west Texan who is not afraid of the devil, and who, for a while at least, is going to make it "hotter than hell" for them, and the union-pledged candidate will realize it whenever he puts me out of Congress.

When organized labor publicly threatens to put out of Congress any Representative who opposes its program, does the Dallas News still believe I exaggerated when I said it has reached a point where it is either "all the people of the United States or Samuel Gompers and his labor union"?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADAM B. LITTLEPAGE,

OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. Mr. Speaker, in view of the charges and criticisms heretofore made on the floor of this House and the Senate, affecting and reflecting upon the coal operators and coal-mine workers of the country, I should feel remiss in the discharge of a public duty and trust if I did not raise my voice in this great presence and before the close of this session of Congress, now but a few days off, in the defense of, as a matter of simple justice, the coal operators and mine workers of West Virginia, my native State.

So much has been said here and at the other end of the Capitol by public men about the coal-mine owners and workers not being deserving men, profiteers, and maintaining prices to the detriment of consumers that if I did not challenge the reliability and truthfulness of these accusations and representations before retiring from this Congress I would feel that my mission and service here would not be finished acceptably to my own conscience and sense of duty.

Most of these misrepresentations have been uttered by Members of the House and Senate who come from noncoal-producing sections of our great country and from men who would not know a coal mine if they saw one. You don't find coal mines in the county roads, on railroad trains, or in the counting rooms. They are found beneath the hills and valleys, as a rule, in mountainous regions. One of the Senators from Ohio said in a speech that coal operators could make money at $1.35 per ton. That can not be done in any State in this Union, and the Senator should have known better if he knows anything about the coal business or the responsibilities of either the operator or miner.

In West Virginia we have the finest steam-heating and by-product coals in the United States. Here is a fair statement of cost per ton of producing coal:

COST OF MINING.

Royalty	$0.10
Mining, including underground labor	1.25
Outside labor	.20
Power and upkeep	.18
Management, office expenses, and office supplies	.20
Taxes and insurance	.08
Supplies, rails, timber, etc	.20
Miners' compensation	.03
Depletion and depreciation	.12
Commission	.15
	2.51
Other upkeep expenses	.15
	2.66

These figures represent the minimum cost of producing coal at a mine with an output of from four to six hundred tons per day. There are various items of legitimate expense not mentioned. The wear and tear and deterioration of a mining property is alarmingly rapid. From the West Virginia coal fields to Washington railroad charges on transportation of the coal is about $1.70 per ton; to Boston, about $5.90 to 6.10 per ton; from Washington to Baltimore, a distance of about 40 miles, $1 per ton extra. Thus you see it costs our operators $4 to $5 per ton to supply the coal to the retailer in Washington, and, it is safe to say, from $5.50 to $6.25 to Boston. In Boston, I understand, the retailer gets from about $8 to $12 per ton; in Washington, $8 to $11 per ton. Going west from our coal fields, on account of about 300 miles longer railroad haul than the coal producers in Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois are subjected to, our West Virginia coal producers are subjected to an extra charge or differential of about 30 cents per ton before they can reach the competitive lake and western trade. The only reason they can compete in these lake and western markets is because the West Virginia coal is recognized and conceded by all practical coal men and experts as being a superior, if not the best, heat and steam coal, as well as by-product coal, in the country. It is a shame to charge the miners and operators and hold them responsible for the imposition of the retail coal dealers upon the public, and I resent the accusations against them that they are profiteering. Do not blame and denounce them for the burden imposed by the retailers; it is neither right nor just to do so.

The operators of the country and of my State have never been so harassed and annoyed as since the Fuel Administration assumed control of their business. They have lost months of valuable time and spent hundreds of thousands of dollars on railroad fare, hotel expenses, running back and forth to Washington, trying to understand and comply with the regulations, which were often confusing if not conflicting and, in many instances, contradictory.

Some 60 to 80 operators, with their companies, of the southern section of West Virginia, where I live, were indicted in the Federal court in New York City last year simply because they met there and fixed the price of $3 per ton for their coal at the mines; and, mind you, this price had but recently theretofore been fixed by certain Government officials but was subsequently abrogated.

They showed by this course that they were public benefactors, as they were then offered and had theretofore been offered $7 to $10 per ton for the coal at their mines; but they fixed the price of $3 per ton, and the indictments followed. The attorneys' fees, railroad fares, hotel expenses, court costs, and other expenses amounted to more than $650,000. A jury of their peers in the city of New York, where they were strangers, and after a long drawn-out trial, promptly acquitted them when the case was submitted.

Now, who are these coal operators and coal miners of and for whom I speak? They are splendid, patriotic, upright business men. They have their own differences among themselves, but they get together, iron their troubles out, and resume business relationship.

Why do I say these are splendid, patriotic, upright business men? It is because they are as good people as ever dwelt in any country. They are developers. Their patriotism was demonstrated again when this country was at war with a foreign foe. They offered their mining properties, and they are valuable properties, representing the savings of a lifetime, to their Government without charge. The Navy had to have our smokeless and steam coal. Did my people sulk or complain? Not on your life! The miners, God bless them, worked day and night to supply the Navy's demand for the coal, and there never was such work. They deferred their differences until after the war. No sacrifice was too great. They willingly gave their boys, some of whom will never return after crossing the ocean to grapple with a deadly foe. Their dead bodies were found at the Marne, Chateau-Thierry, and in the Argonne Forest. None of them shot in the back. All died with their faces toward the enemy; they gave all they had—that greatest boon of life—the privilege of living. While at home their fathers, mothers, sisters, and brothers worked like slaves mining coal to propel our ships and naval vessels on the high seas carrying our country's boys to battle for the existence of justice and humanity throughout the world. Some of our largest coal operators, some of whom owned their own mines, turned them over to employees and themselves volunteered and went across the sea to do or die for their country and homes. What more did they do? Those remaining here, too old to enlist, were refused enlistment, quit their mines, turned them over to employees with instructions to run them day and night in order to produce coal for the Navy, and these operators spent nearly all their time selling liberty bonds, war-savings stamps, thrift stamps, and aided in the Red Cross and all other war drives, with the result that in my district alone the coal operators, companies, coal miners, and mine workers bought and have about paid for over $6,000,000. Quite 80 per cent of them now hold their Government's obligation for money advanced by them when it was in trouble. Think of a little mining town known as Matewan, having a population of three to four hundred, being allotted $12,000! It raised $65,000. Ansted, a mining town of about twelve hundred, raised $250,250; Glen White, a mining town of about 600, raised $180,000. At this mine an incident occurred which will dwell with me for years to come. The mine is a shaft mine, 380 feet deep. The seam of coal is some 8 or 9 feet in thickness and an exceptionally fine smokeless or by-product coal. Coming out of the mine in an elevator I went to the engine room, where I met a splendid young mine worker, an engineer, around one of the timberheads of the machinery, upon which had been placed two brass bands, and I noticed he had rubbed them until they were very bright. I asked him why he kept them shining so. He said Eddie White, the son of the mine owner, who worked with him several years, helped him put them on before he went to war, and that he loved Eddie, and if he never came back he meant to keep them shining as long as he lived or worked there. He turned and went away with his head bowed, as if in grief. I went my way. Such affection is characteristic of the good people whose servant I am and for whose good standing and good name I speak.

What more have these patriots done as an evidence of their splendid patriotism? In the counties of Boone, Fayette, Kanawha, Greenbrier, Raleigh, and Pocahontas they raised over $8,000,000 for liberty bonds, war-savings stamps, Red Cross, and all war organizations. Are they not deserving, and do they not deserve good treatment and to have nice things said and thought of them? I say yes, and so does every fair-minded man in this House.

Now, gentlemen, this will likely be my last address delivered in this House, and maybe for all time. I go back to my people to deliver the commission they intrusted me with eight years ago, and it will be as clean as when I received it, untarnished and still sacred. I have done my best for them and my country. We have had awful responsibilities to discharge, but we have stood up and undertaken, in the sight of God and the people of our country, to do our full duty as we saw it. This is a fruitful field for an industrious man to labor in. I have tried hard to make a good public servant of all my people without regard to their politics. What I have accomplished here for my people I am proud of and grateful for, and so are they.

You are a magnificent lot of delightful men, and you have served your country much better than you have been given credit for. The only thing I regret leaving is the high-toned and splendid fellowship existing among the membership of this House, which I shall cherish with pride and affection throughout after life. Good luck and good-by.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN F. MILLER,

OF WASHINGTON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose to draw the attention of Congress to what appears to me to be the greatest domestic problem now before the American people. These problems are none other than those of labor and wages.

In my judgment the future welfare and happiness of our people, as well as the security of our institutions, are in a great measure dependent upon the just and proper solutions of these two great problems.

I have differentiated labor and wages, treating the first as relating to the moral and patriotic elements of the principles involved, and the second the manner of the practical application of these principles.

The observations I shall make appear to me to be most timely in view of the widespread industrial unrest prevailing to-day.

There is always a period of industrial unrest immediately following every period of great activity, and as war is the greatest of all possible activities the unrest following the war is always sure to be of a most serious and apprehensive character. We are now going through this period of industrial unrest. It is expected. It follows the course of human experience.

This industrial unrest is world-wide, and just now it so happens that there is a world-wide governmental unrest. The combination is bad. The public is agitated and, to a certain extent, excited. People lose their stability of thought. New ideas seem to float in the air. All sorts of doctrines, however fanciful or vicious, gain recruits. This condition seems to be a part of the psychology of war, connected in some way with the process of relaxation. It is the opportunity of the agitator. These multiply and swarm in the atmosphere of discontent. It makes a perfect breeding ground for all socialistic cults, and a socialist of any kind breeds every month of the year. It all contributes to making the unrest and discontent more menacing.

The industrial unrest in America is now almost universal—East, West, North, and South. It has grown rapidly since the signing of the armistice in November last. The presence of this condition makes us all realize that we at least have not found the true system by which the welfare and the efficiency of our people may be raised to the maximum. Added to this situation—or, rather, associated with it in some points of our country and taking advantage of this disturbed mind—a new and alarming and vicious doctrine from foreign shores has come to our ears, a new word for industrial, social, and governmental chaos.

When men become disturbed, dissatisfied, and discontented, unless they are brought back to their normal selves they soon become possessed of a grievance against the existing order of things—against society as it is constituted to-day. This should not be permitted. The welfare of our institutions demand that it must not be permitted. We must keep our citizenship right-thinking. And the only way to keep them right is to treat them right. We must think right ourselves. We must think of them, for them, and with them.

The question is, What are we going to do?

The first thing is to Americanize America, and in Americanizing America we will Americanize labor. Deport every one of this foreign element who is taking advantage of the industrial unrest to spread the damnable doctrines he has brought here with him. Send him back home. Clear out this foreign social and industrial propaganda. It has no business here. Clean up our country. We can take care of the American-born agitator. Close down immigration, and close it down tight, and do it quick.

Then what are we going to do?

The second thing to do, then, is for every American employer to treat every American employee as a human being in whose welfare he has some interest. The American employer must change his tactics in dealing with his employees, and I believe he will when he thoroughly understands the situation. I believe the fairness, the humanity, and the manhood of the employers as a class can be depended upon. If I did not believe that, I would almost despair of the future. I believe I know also that the fairness, the humanity, and the manhood of the employees as a class can be depended upon. If I did not think so, I would be equally in despair. Let it be understood right here and now that neither class has a monopoly on manhood. This war has demonstrated this fact to a certainty. A man is no less a man in every sense of the word simply because he wears overalls and works his hands. It is just as honorable to work standing at a desk or sitting in a chair. It is just as honorable to work in overalls as it is to work in anything else. When the American employer understands that the man working for him, be he in overalls or not, is just as much a man, so far as manhood goes, as he is, and is entitled to be treated as a man, he will understand something he apparently does not understand now. When the American employer in talking with the American working for him appreciates that he is talking to his equal he will have advanced a step beyond where he is to-day. Let us get this idea of superiority or of inferiority, as the case may be, out of our heads and keep it out.

Well, what then?

Listen, you employers of America, who have builded up fortunes of millions and millions of dollars in comparatively a few years of industrial or commercial life. Every dollar of that fortune is the accumulation of your margin on day's labor multiplied and compounded. The presence of that fortune in your hands is absolute evidence of the fact that you, up to this time, have failed to give reasonable value received to those working for you for their labor and their services. Your margin has been too great. You have simply overreached the party you were contracting with—that is, the man who agreed to sell to you and who did sell to you his labor and his skill. Some of these contracts have been and are now unconscionable. I appeal to the manhood of the men who have made and are still making these contracts. Stop it; deal with the man who is working for you as one American ought to deal with another. Leave yourself a reasonable and safe margin of profit, but stop this brutal and immoral greed. Do not be a glutton, overfed out of the margin on day's labor, taken from out of the mouths and off the backs of your countrymen. Give the man or the woman who is working for you a fair and even break.

Well, you ask, how is this to be done?

My answer is along the lines of an industrial profit-sharing plan. Give the men and women who are building up your fortune a share of the profits their hands and heads have made. Listen again, you employers. Can not you see every one of your men and women would have an incentive, an inducement to do better work and more of it? Your factory and your store would be open and doing business every day of the year. You would do away with strikes, and the agitator would talk until he was black in the face. Be on the square, too, in distributing this share. Do not allow yourself a salary of $50,000 a year, to come out of the profits, and then spend half your time in a limousine or aboard a yacht. Be square; if you are not, your men will know that fact just as well as you know it. Present a balance sheet something like this:

Here is the interest on the investment.

Here is the amount of business done.

Here is the overhead, including depreciation.

Here is the net profit.

Here is the share to be divided amongst your men, for it was their hands that made it all, over and above the daily wages you paid them.

Every man and woman will be satisfied. Everyone will be drawing trade to you, and your industrial unrest will cease. You will have contentment, satisfaction, and quiet everywhere.

I want to give a warning to those who are now building their great colossal fortunes out of the profits on day labor. The times when such things are possible are drawing to a close, and in good conscience they ought to come to a close. Think of men in a few years of active business life building up such enormous fortunes out of the excess profits—out of the margin on trade in labor. As I said before, the margin has been too great. It is against the best interests of your country that such fortunes should have been accumulated in such a manner. The interests of all the people have not been considered, and the man whose toil it was, who builded this fortune, has been considered the least of all. I have suggested that the employers themselves should voluntarily create this new system. I can only say if the employer does not do it the Government—that is, the State or General Government—will be forced to do it for him. Good conscience calls for a change. Time was when the employees had no weapon with which to fight, but that time has passed. Labor now has the two great instruments—the industrial and the political. Either one is sufficient; but when both are unitedly called into use there is no power that can withstand them. The control of business and industry is no adventure for the Government. But a few years ago, when it became necessary for the States and the General Government to control the banking business, they did so; the one controlled the rate of interest on loans and the other the general character of business. These two agencies can control the industrial and commercial systems just as easily. There is no doubt of the authority, the legal authority, for such control. The Government, either State or the General Government, or both, have the right to regulate and control the profits of industrial and commercial institutions by regulating the cost of production and the selling price.

Another thing. Listen once more, you employer! You whose source of profit is the margin of the day's labor. If your profit is so much per man per day, the nearer you keep to your capacity in men and working days the more money you will make. What you want are men on the job and the job ready; that is, the factory or the store running to capacity and running six days in the week. Inasmuch as your profit comes from the men and the women employed, let them have a voice in determining who shall be their associates and shopmates. If the profit comes from the employment, the service performed, it makes no difference to the owner or operator whose hands do the work, whether this man or that, provided, of course, that they be of equal skill, or, in the case of a store, of equal presence and adaptability. But it may make a great deal of difference to the man or woman who stands next to him day after day and month after month.

Oh, I have heard it said that this is idealism. I say not. I say that it is common honesty and common sense. It is just plain, everyday justice between man and man. It is just old-fashioned patriotism of the Washington kind, of the Lincoln kind, and the Roosevelt kind.

Then, I say have a committee to sit with the management in matters of employment and discharge, another on complaints and grievances, another on working conditions and welfare. This will get rid of the lockout and the blacklist. Oh, I hear some one say that this is turning your business over for another to run. Nothing of the kind. Most States have laws against blacklists; all should have.

The employer ought to remember that the community, the public, the State, and the General Government are interested not only in the fact that the factory and the store are open and running, but are interested in how they are running. No man now or ever has operated a factory or store just as he wanted to. If he did, we would have made little progress in the world. Our industrial system is founded upon a different basis. The State and the General Government have always told, and always will tell the owner how he can and how he can not run his factory or his store. It has told him through the child-labor law; through the hours of labor; through sanitary regulation; through minimum wage legislation; and through hundreds of other ways. No, no man will lose control of his own business by having a committee, such as I have indicated of his own employees, acting with him. It will hold his business together. It will tend to bring about a harmony all along the line, and harmony is the strength of all institutions.

And then there are two other things I want you to think about. They are the old-age pension and the disability pension.

The infirm and the unfortunate should not be left to shift for themselves, to make their way as best they can when their earning capacity is gone. Oh, some one asks what is the use of giving a bounty on a wasted life. Shame on the man or woman who would thus speak of the enfeebled and the ill-fated. Humanity throughout all ages has been calling to the helpless, and she is still calling. She calls to you and to me to help her.

I have outlined a few of the things which, to my mind, would work incalculably for the betterment of our countrymen. In my judgment, there has never been such a demand for human agencies to establish a plan to correct the unjust ratio of distribution of the earnings of our people, engaged in productive pursuits. And these things ought to come voluntarily as parts of the new system. I hope God Almighty will open the eyes of the people of America so they will behold their duty.

Times and institutions are changing, for we are living in the changing times of man. To-morrow will be different from to-day; next year will be different from this, and thus we go on and on. We are constantly changing, constantly developing. The human understanding is progressing, is advancing, I hope, higher and better for the welfare of our people and our Nation.

It takes no sage to see that we are not living in a changeless age, amid a people changeless in ideas and in temperament and in sentiment. One has but to read and know the past and then look around and behold the present. He has but to read and think and see.

There never was a time when as many eyes are looking in upon the acts of men of affairs as now, the national pulse never has beaten higher and stronger, the public conscience never was so sensitive, the Nation never has drawn so close to the individual nor the individual drawn so close to his Government. Never have the people been so concerned not only for the present but for the great, wide future of our institutions, and likewise never has the Government been so solicitous, so anxious for the future of her citizens.

Ten million men answered the call to war with a cheer; 5,000,000, her cleanest of limb and truest of blood, fell into line. The Government knows every man, every age, every home, everything about everyone of her sons. The most glorious thing in our history is the way the people of this country accepted and responded to the selected or conscripted Army plan. And by the way, the sting has gone out of that word "conscript"; it is enough to know that the man was a soldier of the great Republic of the West. Every industrial institution, every shop and store throughout the land, wherever men are employed, has its honor roll and its service flag. Some of these contain thousands and thousands of names and stars. Every name, every star represents a toiler who left his bench, his machine, his forge, his counter to answer his country's call. The Nation will never forget these young men. Of course, the Government is solicitous of the future of these young men, of their welfare through life. She is solicitous of those who remained in the fields, at the forge, in the shop, on the railways, on the sea, those who fed and clothed and toiled that America's Army might be what it was. She would be an ungrateful Nation if she were not solicitous. The future can be read, it seems to me, in the light of the signs of the times, and those signs are a deeper solicitude, a closer friendship, a more tender affection for the man who toils with his hands and fights the Nation's battles with his hands and with his heart.

Pay of Members of the House of Representatives Who Served in the Army.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD WAYNE PARKER, OF NEW JERSEY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, on the 4th of March, only an hour before adjournment, when the question came up of the rights of Members who served in the Army during this war, and especially their right to salary, reference was made to the case of Gen. Wheeler, of Alabama, in the Spanish War. I then stated that I had been on the Committee on the Judiciary at that time and disagreed from other members of the committee, being of the opinion that while Members were away from the House on a temporary service or in a temporary office they were not Members of the House, but that such temporary service did not necessarily forfeit the seat, but might only suspend it, unless objection was made. I therefore asked and obtained leave to print the reports on that subject, which are now not to be had, and to add a few remarks on the history of the case. The reports are voluminous, but they are exhausted and the matter is of great importance and should be understood.

In the Fifty-fifth Congress Joseph Wheeler, of Alabama; Edward E. Robbins, of Pennsylvania; David G. Colson, from Kentucky; and James R. Campbell, from Illinois, accepted commissions in the Volunteer Army. On December 21, 1898, the House of Representatives passed the following resolution, which had been introduced by Hon. Joseph W. Bailey, to inquire whether any Member of the House had accepted any office under the United States and whether the acceptance of such office vacated the seat of the Member. A report (No. 2205) of 70 pages was filed by Mr. Henderson, with a resolution that they vacated their seats when they accepted military office and were not then Members of Congress. Mr. John J. Jenkins, of Wisconsin, dissented. Mr. DeArmond filed a second part of the report with even stronger views than the majority, especially as to the Canadian commissioners. Mr. PARKER of New Jersey, in minority views (part 3 of the report), urged that while acceptance of a permanent office should be held by the House to vacate the membership permanently, an acceptance for emergency, whether military or civil, of a temporary office may, and in case of public necessity should, be held by the House at most to create only a temporary vacation of the seat; that is, a suspension of membership during the emergency. He pointed out (Report, part 3, pages 5–11) that, whereas the British statute vacated the seat if the member accepted an office, but allowed the man who held the office to be elected to Parliament, the American Constitution declared only that no person holding office under the United States might be a Member of either House during the continuance of that office, so that if the office were temporary the vacancy might be temporary. I pointed out also, on page 10, that in all the cases of Volunteer officers rather than Regular Army officers—Col. Yell in 1846, Col. Baker in the Mexican War, Vandever, Schenck, Blair, and Herrick in the Civil War—the officers remained in Congress and no action was ever taken against them.

Gen. Wheeler was appointed major general of Volunteers May 4, 1898, drew his pay as such, but drew no pay in Congress, and was finally appointed to the Regular Army. His statement is on pages 29 to 37 of part 1; also page 42. Edward Everett Robbins was appointed captain of Volunteers in June, 1898, and mustered into service July 1; was mustered as major and quartermaster August 19 and was discharged in October. He came back and occupied his seat in Congress, drawing no pay in the Army, but drawing his salary as a Member of Congress. He made a full statement on pages 16 to 29. James R. Campbell was colonel of the Ninth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and David G. Colson, whose letter is on page 38, was colonel of the Fourth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry. Both were appointed in June, 1898, neither having been discharged in January, 1899.

Campbell seemed to have drawn his Army pay and congressional pay. Colson drew only his congressional pay. (See part 1, pages 2 and 3.)

Under the resolution questions were also raised as to membership in the peace and Canadian commissions, membership in the industrial or labor commissions, and membership in the Hawaiian commission. Gen. Wheeler's statement (page 33) on January 25, 1899, quotes Attorney General Griggs's decision that a response to a temporary call should not mean a complete and final severance of his relations with civil life. Gen. Wheeler takes the point (page 32) that every citizen of the United States is primarily a member of the militia and that an officer of the militia, if called out, becomes an officer of the United States, and that it is impossible to hold that his seat in Congress is forfeited ipso facto.

I simply refer to these arguments. I found it impossible to agree with the views of the strict constructionists that any man who aids his country in case of necessity and in time of emergency shall therefore and thereby absolutely forfeit his seat in this House. I am of the opinion that while he is under command of the President as an officer his membership of the House is suspended and that he has no legal right to his salary as a Member of Congress, but must accept whatever pay belongs to the office in which he serves.

The view of Maj. Robbins, our late lamented friend, and of Col. Colson seemed to be that they could do service for the United States in the vacation under any title if only they did not accept any salary from the United States except their official salaries as Members of Congress. I myself think that this is not quite in accord with the Constitution, for possibly the essence of an office lies in the duty imposed upon the man and not in whether he is paid or not; and I believe it more consonant with the opinion of Attorney General Griggs to hold that if a Member of Congress accepts a temporary office he can not be a Member of the House during the continuance of the office. Perhaps the strongest case would be that of a State militia officer who is at the same time a Member of Congress but who is called out by the President to enforce the laws of the United States against a mob. He certainly should not forfeit his place as Member of Congress for performing his duty as a citizen and an officer of the militia, but I do not see how he could perform his duties as Member of Congress, or properly receive his salary, during his absence on this duty.

The Fifty-fifth Congress, like all Congresses before that time, refused to decide this question. In previous Congresses the matter had been very fully debated and was simply not decided. In the Fifty-fifth Congress (RECORD, vol. 32, p. 2751, Mar. 2, 1899), when the resolution was moved by Mr. Henderson, the question of consideration was raised by Mr. Lacey, a veteran of the Civil War, and the House refused to consider the resolution by a vote of 77 to 164.

At that time several Members of the Senate were serving abroad upon a peace commission, and some Democratic leaders were supposed to be quite willing to bring that question before the House upon the argument of this resolution. However that may be, the floor leader, the Hon. Joseph W. Bailey, resigned that place as such shortly after the refusal of consideration.

I append these reports and views so that the House may have access to this material.

APPENDIX.

[House Report No. 2205, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session.]

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS TO MILITARY AND OTHER OFFICES.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report:

On December 21, 1898, the House of Representatives passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it is hereby, instructed to ascertain and report to this House—

"First. Whether any Member of the House has accepted any office under the United States; and

"Second. Whether the acceptance of such office under the United States has vacated the seat of the Member accepting the same."

The committee at once entered upon the consideration of the resolution by instituting inquiries as to what Members of Congress were holding positions other than that of Member of the House.

The following letter was addressed to the War Department:

DECEMBER 23, 1898.

Gen. H. C. CORBIN,
Adjutant General United States Army, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL: I inclose herewith resolution No. 354, which passed the House December 21, 1898, and was referred to this committee.

I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to request a statement of the names of Members of the House of Representatives who have entered the service of the United States during the Spanish-American War. I have information going to show that Hon. Joseph Wheeler, of Alabama; Hon. James R. Campbell, of Illinois; Hon. David G. Colson, of Kentucky; and Hon. Edward E. Robbins, of Pennsylvania, since their election to the Fifty-fifth Congress, have entered the service of the United States in connection with said war. I inclose herewith an official list of Members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and their places of residence, of the Fifty-fifth Congress, and would ask you to advise this committee what the facts are as to the mustering into the United States service of these or any other Members of the present Congress; the date of their muster is requested, whether they are now in the service, and if not, when they were discharged; whether they or either of them have been paid by the United States, and if so, to what dates, and which, if any, are still in the military or naval service of the United States.

Very respectfully, yours,

D. B. HENDERSON,
Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

To which the following answer was received:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 3, 1899.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In reply to your letter of December 23, 1898, to The Adjutant General of the Army, inclosing a copy of resolution No. 354, passed December 21, 1898, and inquiring for the Committee on the Judi-
2 ciary a statement of the names of the Members of the House of Representatives who have entered the service of the United States during the Spanish-American War, and the facts relative to the mustering into the United States service of such Members, dates of their muster, whether now in service, and, if not, when discharged, when paid by the United States, etc., I have the honor to inclose a statement giving such information as the records of the department afford respecting muster in, service, pay, etc., of Maj. Gen. Joseph Wheeler, United States Volunteers; Maj. E. E. Robbins, quartermaster of Volunteers; Col. James R. Campbell, Ninth Illinois Volunteer Infantry; and Col. David G. Colson, Fourth Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, who are believed to have been at the dates of their entrance into the Volunteer service, respectively, Members of the House of Representatives, although no official statement has been made to this department to the effect that they were such Members. The department has no information which would indicate that any Members of the House of Representatives other than those named have served in the United States Volunteers during the War with Spain.

Very respectfully,

R. A. ALGER,
Secretary of War.

Statement.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
January 3, 1899.

Subsequently, it being brought to the knowledge of the committee that Hon. J. HAMILTON LEWIS, of Washington, had served in the Spanish-American War after being qualified as a Member of Congress, the following letter was addressed to the Secretary of War:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 10, 1899.

Hon. R. A. ALGER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: It is reported to me as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary that Hon. JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, of Seattle, State of Washington, was in the Army of the United States, present war. Will you kindly advise me what the records show in respect to this case? My request is in compliance with the inclosed House resolution.

Very respectfully,

D. B. HENDERSON.

To which letter the following answer was received:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 17, 1899.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry of the 10th instant, as to what the records show respecting the services in the Army during the 3 present war of the Hon. JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, of Washington, I have the honor to inform you that Mr. LEWIS made a tender of his services as a volunteer aid on the staff of Maj. Gen. Brooke when that general went to Porto Rico in July last; that his voluntary services were accepted as tendered, and that he served for a time in Porto Rico as a volunteer aid on the staff of Gen. F. D. Grant. Mr. LEWIS was not a commissioned officer in the military service, received no pay as such, and had no legal status as an officer.

Very respectfully,

R. A. ALGER,
Secretary of War.

The following letter was addressed to the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 7, 1899.

Hon. B. F. RUSSELL,
Sergeant at Arms, House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In order to qualify the Committee on the Judiciary with a complete knowledge of the facts essential for the inquiry embraced in House resolution 354, I respectfully ask a statement of payments made, with dates thereof, to the following Members of the present House of Representatives, namely, Joseph Wheeler, of Alabama; E. E. Robbins, of Pennsylvania; James R. Campbell, of Illinois; and David G. Colson, of Kentucky.

Yours, truly,

D. B. HENDERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary.

To which the following answer was received:

OFFICE SERGEANT OF ARMS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 9, 1899.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON,
Chairman Judiciary Committee, House of Representatives.

SIR: Replying to your communication of January 7 instant, as to payments of certain Members of the present House of Representatives, in connection with House resolution No. 354, I have the honor to report as follows:

Hon. Joseph Wheeler, of Alabama, was last paid June 3, 1898, for May salary, also mileage for the first and second sessions, on certificates signed by him and approved by the Speaker of the House. He has not signed certificates since that date, nor has he claimed salary.

Hon. E. E. Robbins, of Pennsylvania, has been paid each month up to and including salary for the month of October, due November 3, 1898, upon certificates signed by himself and approved by the Clerk of the House in vacation, also paid mileage for the first and second sessions of this Congress, but not for the third session.

Hon. J. R. Campbell, of Illinois, has been paid each month up to and including salary for the month of October, 1898, due November 3, 1898, upon certificates signed by him and duly approved by the Clerk of the House during the vacation. He has also been paid mileage for the first and second sessions, but not for the third session.

Hon. D. G. Colson, of Kentucky, has been paid each month up to and including salary for the month of November, due December 3, 1898, upon certificates signed by him and duly approved by the Clerk of the House, during vacation. He has also been paid mileage for the first and second sessions of this Congress, but not for the current session.

Very respectfully, yours,

B. F. RUSSELL,
Sergeant at Arms House of Representatives.

By order of the committee a letter was sent to Hon. Joseph Wheeler, Hon. Edward E. Robbins, Hon. David G. Colson, and Hon. James R. Campbell, of which a sample is given in the following letter to Gen. Wheeler:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 6, 1899.

Maj. Gen. JOSEPH WHEELER,
Care of the War Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I hand you herewith a copy of House resolution No. 354, with which you are possibly familiar.

I write for the purpose of asking whether you desire to be heard with respect to this resolution, which was referred to this committee by a vote of the House. The committee will be very glad to hear from you, if you desire, either orally or in writing, and to receive any authorities which you may wish to offer.

Very truly, yours,

D. B. HENDERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary.

4 The committee deemed it to be its duty to bring the resolution No. 354 to the attention of any Members of the House who had under any legislation held any position while at the same time acting as qualified Members of Congress. They therefore sent the following letter to Hon. R. R. Hitt, a member of the Hawaiian Commission:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 17, 1899.

Hon. R. R. HITT, M. C., City.

MY DEAR SIR: I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to transmit to you House resolution No. 354, and to say that the committee have fixed Tuesday, January 24, 1899, 10 o'clock a. m., to hear those who may desire to be heard on the subject. This notice is sent to you because of your appointment under public resolution No. 51 as a member of what is known as the Hawaiian Commission.

Very truly, yours,

D. B. HENDERSON,
Chairman.

It was found that the following Members of the House had been appointed members of what is known as the Postal Commission, namely: Eugene F. Loud, W. H. Moody, T. H. Catchings, and W. H. Fleming. To each of these was sent a letter, of which the following to Hon. Eugene F. Loud is a copy:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 17, 1899.

Hon. EUGENE F. LOUD, M. C., City.

MY DEAR SIR: By direction of this committee I inclose herewith House resolution No. 354, and beg to notify you that the committee has made Tuesday, January 24, 1899, 10 o'clock a. m., a special order for hearing those who desire to be heard on said resolution. As you are a member of the commission created by section 5 of the act approved June 13, 1898, known as Public, No. 131, I bring this matter to your attention, so that you may be heard, if you so desire.

Very truly, yours,

D. B. HENDERSON,
Chairman.

It was also found that the following Members of the House had been appointed members of the Industrial or Labor Commission, namely: John J. Gardner, William Lorimer, L. F. Livingston, John C. Bell, and Theobold Otjen. To each of these a notice was sent, the following, to Hon. John J. Gardner, being a copy:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 17, 1899.

Hon. JOHN J. GARDNER, M. C., City.

MY DEAR SIR: I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to transmit to you House resolution No. 354, and to say that the committee have fixed Tuesday, January 24, 1899, 10 o'clock a. m., to hear those who may desire to be heard on the subject. Your being a member of the United States Industrial Commission has made it my duty to bring this matter to your attention.

Very truly, yours,

D. B. HENDERSON,
Chairman.

By direction of the committee notices of the hearing were also sent to Messrs. Wheeler, Colson, Campbell, and Robbins, the following, to Hon. Joseph Wheeler, being a copy of said notice:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 17, 1899.

Hon. JOSEPH WHEELER, M. C., City.

MY DEAR GENERAL: By direction of this committee I inclose herewith House resolution No. 354, and beg to notify you that the committee has made Tuesday, January 24, 1899, 10 o'clock a. m., a special order for hearing those who desire to be heard on said resolution.

Very truly, yours,

D. B. HENDERSON,
Chairman.

5 On the 24th of January, 1899, in pursuance of the notices referred to, a hearing took place, as follows:

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1899.

The committee having under consideration House resolution No. 354, met at 10 a. m. for the purpose of hearings on the resolution, which is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it is hereby, instructed to ascertain and report to this House—

"First. Whether any Member of the House has accepted any office under the United States; and

"Second. Whether the acceptance of such office under the United States has vacated the seat of the Member accepting the same."

INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION.

STATEMENT OF HON. THEOBOLD OTJEN, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM THE STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the first section of the act creating the Industrial Commission provides that the commission shall be called the Industrial Commission and shall be composed of five Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the Presiding Officer thereof; five Members from the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker; and nine other persons who shall fairly represent the different industries of the country, the employee and employer, and the producer and the consumer, to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The second section prescribes the duties of the commission; that they shall be to investigate questions pertaining to immigration, to labor, to agriculture, to manufacturing, and to business, and report to Congress, and to suggest such legislation as it may deem best upon these subjects.

The third section is similar; that it shall furnish such suggestions along these lines as may be deemed best for uniform legislation by the various States of the Union, in order to harmonize conflicting interests and to be equitable to the laborer, the employer, the producer, and the consumer.

The commission was appointed for two years, according to the act. So far as the legal status of the question is concerned, I have spent but very little time in the investigation of the subject. I think, as a member of the Industrial Commission, I hold no office such as is intended to be covered by the provisions of the resolution you are considering, or any civil office under the authority of the United States. In the first place, we are officials created by Congress. We are appointed by the Speaker of the House, and our duties are to collect information for Congress solely. We do not have to qualify, and are not confirmed by the Senate. The commission is to be continued for two years. We do not receive a cent for our services, and even the Comptroller of the Treasury has ruled that we are not entitled to our necessary traveling expenses during the time when Congress is not in session. We are allowed necessary traveling expenses only when we are on a trip making investigations as a subcommission, by order of the commission.

6 The CHAIRMAN. What do the other members of the commission receive?

Mr. OTJEN. The noncongressional members receive $3,600 per year.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you all allowed traveling expenses when out on special missions making investigations for the commission?

Mr. OTJEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TERRY. Is not the same provision made in regard to all the members of the commission?

Mr. OTJEN. No. The Senators and Representatives receive no salary.

Mr. TERRY. I mean in regard to traveling expenses?

Mr. OTJEN. They are all on the same basis. The comptroller rules that we are entitled to traveling expenses between our homes and Washington but once.

Mr. SMITH. Does he hold that they are all entitled to traveling expenses by reason of the performance of their duties under that act or under some other general clause?

Mr. OTJEN. It is under this act. This commission meets on the first Tuesday of every month, and the comptroller holds that Washington is the place of business for this commission, and that we are supposed to be here. He says we are entitled to our expenses here once, but no more.

The CHAIRMAN. In the event of a member not being reelected, the law provides he shall have the same salary as the other members of the commission?

Mr. OTJEN. Yes, sir. If a Senator or Member is not reelected, he shall remain on the commission and receive the same salary as any other member of the commission.

Mr. ALEXANDER. You were reelected?

Mr. OTJEN. I was.

Mr. TERRY. Was this commission created during your term of service in Congress?

Mr. OTJEN. It was.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps you would prefer to conclude your remarks without further questioning.

Mr. OTJEN. This commission is really in the nature of a special committee of Congress to gather information for Congress. We are serving thereon and performing that duty by direction of the House of Representatives, and it is not an office under the United States, and the duties are not inconsistent with those of a Member of Congress. The duties are really consistent with those of a Member of Congress, because it is a legislative duty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does your commission provide any other function except that of gathering information?

Mr. OTJEN. No, sir; they are to make investigations upon certain subjects as directed in this act, and, when made, it then becomes their duty to report to Congress, and to Congress only.

Mr. RAY. And to suggest legislation?

Mr. OTJEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TERRY. You investigate and make recommendations to Congress?

Mr. OTJEN. Yes, sir. I suppose the idea of putting Members of the House and Senate upon the commission was that they should be informed upon these subjects which are to be recommended by the commission, so that when the subject comes up we will know the 7 reasons for the recommendations which have been made by the commission.

Mr. PARKER. Read the third section.

Mr. OTJEN. The second and third sections are similar. The third section says that the commission shall furnish such information and suggest such legislation as may be best for the various States, in order to harmonize the interests affecting labor, employer, employed, producer, and consumer.

Mr. PARKER. You are to suggest such legislation by Congress as may be deemed best for the States, and not to make suggestions to the States?

Mr. OTJEN. We have no authority to suggest anything to the States. Whatever recommendation this commission makes must be to Congress.

Mr. PARKER. Read the seventh section, so that it may be in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. That paragraph will speak for itself.

Mr. OTJEN. That section provides as follows.

Mr. PARKER. If that section were to be declared unconstitutional, would that, in your judgment, affect the main part of the law? Could not that part of it be held unconstitutional without affecting the rest of the law?

Mr. OTJEN. Yes; that is true.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other members here from the Industrial Commission?

Mr. OTJEN. I understand that the chairman of the Committee on Labor, Mr. Gardner, has compiled a brief in which he cites the law upon the subject.

POSTAL COMMISSION.

STATEMENT OF HON. WILLIAM H. MOODY, REPRESENTATIVE FROM THE STATE OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the Postal Commission was created by act of Congress approved June 13, 1898, which is the general Post Office appropriation bill. The commission is created by the fifth section of the act, the material parts of which I will submit to the committee. It creates a commission consisting of the chairmen of the House and Senate Committees on Post Offices and Post Roads, and three Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker.

The duties of the commission are to ascertain whether or not excessive prices were charged by railroad companies for postal transportation and to investigate other postal questions. The commission is authorized to employ experts, clerks, stenographer, or incur other clerical expenses. They are authorized to ask details to be made by the Postmaster General for assistance to the commission. They are authorized to administer oaths, examine witnesses, and sit during the recess of Congress. The commission is directed to report on or before February 1, 1899, embracing the testimony taken and the conclusions reached by the commission, and the recommendation of the commission may be made by bill or otherwise. An appropriation is made for the necessary expenses of the commission.

Mr. SMITH. To whom is the report made?

8 Mr. MOODY. The report is made to Congress. The committee will observe that there is one distinction between the Industrial Commission and this commission, and that is that this is a purely congressional commission, as to its membership, and that two of the members are determined by the act itself and the others are selected by appointment by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The question is so clear that I will not argue it at any length.

But now that I am here, I desire to emphasize only one proposition. That proposition is that the members of the commission are not holding office under the United States. The section of the Constitution under which these proceedings and inquiries are held prescribes that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." I take it that it is clear that a person "holding office under the United States" is an "officer" of the United States. In the Constitution itself one of the essential elements of an officer of the United States is described.

By section 2 of Article II, the appointment of the officers of the United States is regulated. It is in the enumeration of the powers of the President, and is contained in this language:

"He shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments."

The proposition submitted to the committee is that the only way in which an officer of the United States can be created is by appointment by the President, either with or without confirmation by the Senate, or by the courts of law or by the heads of departments. It would, perhaps, seem not necessary to go beyond the language of the Constitution itself to demonstrate the truth of that proposition, but fortunately we have the precise question in a decision of the Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Germain, which is found in Ninety-ninth United States Statutes, page 508.

The case came up on a certificate of division of opinion from the circuit court of Maine. The accused was a pension examining surgeon, the nature of whose functions are familiar to the committee. He was indicted under a statute which provides that "every officer of the United States who is guilty of extortion under cover of his office shall be punished, etc." He was defended by the present Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The precise question presented to the court was whether a person performing the functions of an examining surgeon was an "officer" of the United States, and the defendant's counsel made the argument which I have submitted to this committee. It is always profitless to read from opinions, and I do not propose to do it before this committee, because I am sure they have examined this case; but I will say to the committee that this court ruled in terms that there could be no officer of the United States, unless he were appointed by the President, with or without the consent of the Senate, by the courts of law, or by the heads of departments. Obviously this official was not appointed by the President nor by the courts of law, and so the court passed to the consideration of the question whether the Commissioner of Pensions is the head of a department. The court concluded that he is not the head of a department, and therefore decided that the defendant, not being an officer of the United States, was not liable to the penalties prescribed for officers of the United States.

9 Mr. RAY. The Constitution divides the United States into three great departments—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. Who is the head of the legislative department?

Mr. MOODY. It had not occurred to me that the legislative department has any head. It had not occurred to me that that part of the Constitution referred to the political departments of our Government.

Mr. RAY. What I wanted to bring out was what you have to say, if anything, in regard to the fact that the Constitution refers to three departments—legislative, executive, and judicial—and as the Congress of the United States is a legislative department by itself, would you claim that the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate are, or are not, heads of that department, and that appointments made by them are made by the head of a department?

Mr. MCCALL (to Mr. Moody). Read the provision of the Constitution. It is evident that where these officers shall be appointed by the courts of law and heads of departments, they are not using——

Mr. MOODY (interposing). In addition to the suggestion made by Mr. McCall, I will again refer to the provision of the Constitution which says, "Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments." It seems to me that it is not intended to mean that Congress may by law invest appointments in the President, courts of law, or in itself, because that would be the construction. If the department mentioned was Congress itself, it would hardly seem necessary to use the language which was used.

Mr. RAY. The Supreme Court of the United States expressly decided that the Constitution refers to Cabinet officers when it speaks of heads of departments.

Mr. MOODY. I was just going to say, that in the case of the United States v. Germain, in language which I will not undertake to read, it decided that the word "department" in that section of the Constitution means departments not then in existence.

Mr. TERRY. The effect of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States would substantially be that any person appointed to one of these offices, whatever it may be called, if not appointed by the head of a department, would not be entitled to the office, and that he would be appointed unconstitutionally.

Mr. MOODY. That is assuming the very proposition in dispute. The particular duties which are performed by any person can not be called an office.

Mr. TERRY. Let me suggest that the question as to whether particular functions exercised by a party is an office or not does not depend so much on who appointed him as on the duties he is appointed to perform.

Mr. MOODY. I would agree to the proposition that it depended in some measure on the nature of the duties which he was called on to perform, but I should still insist that, whatever the nature of the duties were, if Congress authorized the appointment in some other way than in the clause of the Constitution referred to, that he must be described by some other designation than that of an "officer" of the United States.

A good many people may serve the United States in different ways, but it does not follow that they are "officers" of the United States, and my specific contention is that they are not to be so described unless appointed in the manner pointed out in the Constitution.

10 Mr. RAY. In three different cases the Supreme Court of the United States has reiterated that opinion, and they also expressed the opinion that many persons usually denominated "officers" holding places under the United States are not officers under the United States, but merely Government agents or employees appointed by the President or the heads of departments.

Mr. MOODY. That is my understanding of the law, but I did not want to weary the committee with other citations.

The CHAIRMAN. Your contention is that this postal commission is a good deal like the Committee on Appropriations, or a committee sent to bury a deceased Member of Congress, or a committee created by special appointment.

Mr. MOODY. Yes, sir. Suppose Congress in the case of our esteemed friend, Mr. Loud, had enacted that as chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads he should be a member of this commission, it would be rather startling to think that Congress can specifically designate a Member by description to perform a certain duty, and report to Congress in aid of its functions of legislation, and after the work is done say that he shall forfeit his seat.

Mr. TERRY. You called attention to section 2 of article 2, and I will call your attention to section 6 of article 1 (reading): "No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments thereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

Mr. TERRY (continuing). I suppose your answer to that, according to the argument you have made, would be that your appointment is not an office in the meaning of that word "office"?

Mr. MOODY. That is my argument. I understand the general meaning of the first part of that section to be that nobody can be constitutionally appointed to a civil office which was created while he was a Member of Congress or the emoluments of which have been increased while he was a Member. It applies to a civil office.

Mr. TERRY. You contend that appointment to office will be illegal, or by the acceptance of it he would forfeit his seat in Congress?

Mr. MOODY. You mean appointment to a civil office?

Mr. TERRY. There are two ways of viewing it; one is that the appointment itself would be illegal, and, secondly, acceptance of it would forfeit the office previously held.

Mr. MOODY. My opinion upon that question would be conjectural, and I do not think it would be valuable to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Did any members of the commission who are Members of the House receive any compensation as members of the commission?

Mr. MOODY. No, sir; the law provides for the payment of the necessary expenses, and those expenses have been paid.

Mr. SMITH. I wanted to ask you if you consider that there is any distinction between an officer of the Government and an officer "under the authority of the United States?" The Constitution, my recollection is, uses the language "no person holding office under the authority of the United States."

Mr. MOODY. I did draw distinction between an officer or a person holding office under authority of the United States and the general popular description of holding office under the Government. We 11 speak of a good many persons holding office who are not officers of the United States.

Mr. SMITH. Do you mean that to be officers of the United States they must be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate or be appointed by courts of law or by the heads of some one of the departments?

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. The point I would like to have you answer is whether it is necessary to constitute a person an officer under authority of the United States that he shall have been appointed in that way?

Mr. MOODY. That is my opinion. I would not, however, adopt the converse proposition that everybody appointed in this manner was necessarily an officer of the United States.

Mr. TERRY. Since you were appointed on this commission you have been reelected by your constituents?

Mr. MOODY. I have.

HAWAIIAN COMMISSION.

STATEMENT OF HON. ROBERT R. HITT, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM THE STATE OF ILLINOIS.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have no statement which I desire to volunteer, but if there is any information I can give the committee I will be glad to do it. The legislation annexing Hawaii is familiar to the committee. It provided for annexation and the incorporation of the islands into the Republic of the United States, but did not extend the laws of the United States over the islands. It provided that the municipal legislation prevailing there should continue in force temporarily, the persons and manner of administration of office to be as directed by the President, and that a commission, to be selected by the President, should inquire and report to Congress, recommending legislation necessary to be enacted.

I was requested by the President to be one of that commission. The joint resolution provides that the commissioners shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I was designated by the President, met the commissioners, my colleagues, subsequently, and we collected all the information that we could get for the purpose of aiding Congress when it should come to complete the legislation necessary to supplement annexation. In the performance of this duty my colleagues, as well as myself, believed we had authority to do only what I consider legislative duty, and we discharged that only. We declined in all cases to listen to parties who wished to have us perform other duties. The Japanese minister resident endeavored to communicate with us and get our aid in other matters, but we informed him that we were not there for the purpose of dealing with foreign governments, but were merely appointed to inquire by direction of Congress for its information. It was the same with persons who wished to submit claims, and so of all other things, except the mere collection of information and the consideration of the recommendations we would make to Congress. We excluded everything else. As to compensation, the necessary expenses were provided for from the appropriation in the joint resolution, and nothing more.

Mr. RAY. Have you any power conferred by any law except to inquire as to facts and recommend legislation to Congress?

12 Mr. HITT. No other. In my designation—I am sorry I could not lay my hands on a copy of the paper appointing me which was sent to me by the President.

The CHAIRMAN. We have the act itself.

Mr. HITT. The act is there, on the first page of the report.

Mr. TERRY. In what form was your appointment evidenced?

Mr. HITT. It was in writing from the President, through the State Department.

Mr. TERRY. Did you make any report to the President?

Mr. HITT. It was not in form or words made to the President, but delivered to him for transmission. The law required that we should prepare recommendations to Congress. If the chairman will read the words——

Mr. TERRY. You did not report to Congress?

Mr. RAY (reading). "The President shall appoint five commissioners, two of whom shall be residents of Hawaii, to recommend to Congress concerning the Hawaiian Islands such legislation as they shall deem necessary or proper."

Mr. HITT. Here is the report which I hold in my hand. It is made in response or obedience to that law. It was communicated to the President. It is not addressed to the President.

Mr. TERRY. How is it addressed?

Mr. HITT. It is not addressed to anyone. It is simply entitled "Report" and proceeds "The commissioners appointed," etc., reciting the joint resolution "making the following report." That report, complying with the resolution and making recommendations to Congress, and made by members of a commission named by the President of the United States, was sent through the President to the House.

Mr. TERRY. Do you desire to have that report considered, without being placed in the minutes, as a part of your testimony?

The CHAIRMAN. The law specifically says that the commission must report or recommend to Congress.

Mr. PARKER. When was this report made?

Mr. HITT. It was during the sitting of this Congress. I do not recall the day.

Mr. LANHAM. Were the duties discharged during the vacation or while Congress was in session?

Mr. HITT. During the vacation, and we also held meetings here in closing up the work after Congress had reassembled.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Were oaths administered to the members of the commission?

Mr. HITT. Yes. Oaths were administered to those who were not Members of Congress. Mr. Justice Frear and President Dole took the oath, but I do not recall the fact as to whether oath was administered to the Senators and Member.

Mr. TERRY. By whom was the oath administered?

Mr. HITT. It was administered by Judge Stanley, of Honolulu; not by one of the commission.

Mr. RAY. There is nothing in the law requiring an oath to be administered?

Mr. HITT. No officer of the commission administered an oath.

Mr. CONNOLLY. There is nothing in the act requiring an oath to be administered to anybody by anybody?

Mr. HITT. No. There was an oath administered to the employees requiring them to perform their duties and keep the proceedings secret.

13 Mr. TERRY. Is it usual in cases of the kind that oaths are administered to clerks, secretaries, or Members of Congress?

Mr. HITT. I do not think it is, but we thought it prduent in that case.

The CHAIRMAN. Your appointment was confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. HITT. No; it was not. At least I am informed that it has not yet been confirmed by the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The second clause says that "The commission hereinbefore provided for shall be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. HITT. We were appointed in vacation, and we proceeded to our work. I have not occupied myself with the question of confirmation, but I understand that we have not been confirmed.

Mr. PARKER. You regard this as legislative work done at the request of the President?

Mr. HITT. Yes; but I understand it to be a mandate of Congress; that it was part of my legislative work. Here was an act which in its terms required legislative work—to prepare legislation for Congress.

Mr. LANHAM. There was nothing incompatible with your duties as a Member of the House in your performance of this duty?

Mr. HITT. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. You were under no orders except that of the law?

Mr. HITT. None.

The CHAIRMAN. The President did not control your acts?

Mr. HITT. He did not. The commission sat at a time when it did not conflict with my duties as a Member of the House, and I should have paid little heed to any work which conflicted with my duties as a Member.

Mr. TERRY. Did the President give you instructions?

Mr. HITT. There were no instructions given except by the joint resolution. The President said to us: "You gentlemen were concerned in this legislation. It indicates your duties, and it will guide you in the performance of those duties."

Mr. JENKINS. Do I understand you to say that you consider you were discharging the duties of a Member of the House?

Mr. HITT. I do not remember my expression, but I know that I understood that I only had authority to do duty that I considered legislative—not perhaps in my seat, but it all related to my duty in the House.

Mr. JENKINS. And you received your appointment from the President?

Mr. HITT. Yes, sir. The appointment was made by the President in obedience to this law.

Mr. JENKINS. But you did not need to discharge any duty as a Member of the House unless you received your appointment from the Speaker?

Mr. HITT. I think the suggestion you make is correct.

Mr. JENKINS. In your judgment, would it be necessary in the discharge of your duties as a Member of the House to obtain the consent of the Senate?

Mr. HITT. No; I think not.

Mr. BRODERICK. You have not been specially interested to know whether the Senate confirmed you or not. You have made your investigation and reported to Congress?

Mr. HITT. That is all that interested me. It is a duty that I was asked to perform—to gather information for the House. The commission have sent the results of their labors to the House and Senate.

14 Mr. LANHAM. Were there one or two Senators on the commission?

Mr. HITT. There were two Senators.

Mr. TERRY. Is it not usually the case that when the House wants information it appoints Members who go and hunt up the information?

Mr. HITT. It does. I have been on such commissions.

Mr. SMITH. That would not change the nature of the commission, if Congress authorized it to be done in some other way.

Mr. HITT. The function is the same as it was in the case of the monetary commission, on which I was apppointed by Speaker Crisp—that is, to collect information, examine the subject, and make recommendation to Congress.

Mr. RAY. Supposing this House should pass a resolution directing the Speaker to designate 10 Members of the House to investigate a certain subject and recommend legislation relating thereto, and then pass another resolution directing the President to designate 10 Members to investigate a certain subject and recommend legislation relating thereto, would the 10 congressional members of either commission be doing anything except their duty as Members of the House?

Mr. HITT. I think their functions would be precisely the same. Of course, the idea undoubtedly was that the President might select Members or those not Members of the House, and also two who were not resident in this country, but whose advice and information it was deemed by Congress important to have.

Mr. TERRY. If this commission was regarded simply as a committee of the House it could not have had on it any person who was not a Member of the House, could it?

Mr. HITT. I do not think that that is a necessary conclusion, but I will not differ with your judgment.

Mr. TERRY. There were members of this commission who were not Members of the House and not residents of this country.

Mr. HITT. That is true. Those members acted throughout with this commission. It was, I suppose, to secure the services of men who were not Members of the House or Senate that that power was placed in the hands of the President by the joint resolution.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Were all the other members of the commission who were not Members of the House and Senate paid?

Mr. HITT. I believe not. I have understood from one of the members of the commission who is here that he has not been paid, and never asked nor expected any pay.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Were any other members of the commission citizens of the United States? Several were not citizens of the United States at the beginning.

Mr. HITT. They were citizens of the Republic of Hawaii, and the Republic of Hawaii was annexed to the United States, and the question of citizenship was one of the things we were dealing with. We have recommended to the House to determine exactly who shall be citizens of the United States. They were citizens of the Republic of Hawaii up to the time of the transfer of sovereignty to the United States. On the 12th day of August the flag of that country was taken down and the American flag was raised. The President of Hawaii took the oath of allegiance to the United States, as did the officers of the Government generally all over the island, and from that time they regarded themselves as citizens of the United States.

Mr. ELLIOTT. What was the date of your appointment?

Mr. HITT. I can not recall the date, but it was early in July.

Mr. TERRY. After the passage of the act of annexation?

15 Mr. HITT. Yes, sir. It was during the month of July, soon after the passage of the joint resolution which was approved July 7, 1898. After we who had gone from Washington reached Honolulu the two Hawaiian commissioners were sworn in as members of the commission.

Mr. JENKINS. Do I understand your position to be that those who were on the commission not Members of Congress were citizens of the United States?

Mr. HITT. That is a question we proposed to settle by the bill we have presented, determining who are made citizens of the United States by annexation, and it included Hawaiians like President Dole and Justice Frear.

Mr. ALEXANDER. You have so recommended?

Mr. HITT. We have.

Mr. JENKINS. Then there were foreigners sitting with you as members of the commission?

Mr. HITT. I would not admit that. They were foreigners when we passed the law, but when the flag of Hawaii came down they took the oath of allegiance and became Americans, regarded themselves as such all the way through, and were under the orders of the President of the United States.

Mr. TERRY. You were appointed before the flag came down?

Mr. HITT. I was.

Mr. TERRY. And you went to Honolulu?

Mr. HITT. We did not reach there before the flag came down.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The treaty provided that there should be two members from Hawaii?

Mr. HITT. Not the treaty, but the joint resolution. It provided that "the President shall appoint five commissioners, at least two of whom shall be residents of the Hawaiian Islands."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was the authority by which we annexed the islands. The joint resolution provided that this commission should consist of two members from Hawaii.

Mr. HITT. Yes, sir.

Mr. TERRY. I believe the act says they shall be "residents" of Honolulu or Hawaii, not "citizens."

Mr. JENKINS. You say that no members received any compensation, not even the two residents of Hawaii?

Mr. HITT. I am very sure they have received no compensation. We received our necessary traveling expenses, or at least a part of them. As every gentleman is aware, members do not get all their expenses in such cases. We got railroad and steamboat transportation and hotel bills paid.

Mr. ALEXANDER. You were not appointed because you were a Member of Congress?

Mr. HITT. There is nothing in the joint resolution saying that the commissioners were to be or not to be Members of the House or Senate. There is nothing to indicate it. I can not tell what were the motives for my appointment.

Mr. TERRY. Of course, you could not have been appointed on this commission as a mere committeeman of the House.

Mr. HITT. There is nothing in the act to indicate what might have been the purpose in selecting them, but the inference, of course, is that Senators or Members of the House were appointed upon a commission inquiring and getting information for the Senate or House because it would be suitable and convenient thereafterwards—a quick and effective method of getting such information, with all explanations, before the House and Senate.

16 ARMY OFFICERS.

STATEMENT OF HON. EDWARD E. ROBBINS, A REPRESENTATIVE FROM THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committe, I am here in obedience to a notice received from the chairman of your committee, which notice was sent out under resolution 354, inquiring whether any Members of this House had accepted another office under the United States; and, secondly, whether the acceptance of such office vacated the seat of a Member of the House.

I wish to preface my remarks by a statement which I believe controls my case, and an examination into the precedents so far as I have been able to discover them. The House is the judge of the qualifications of its own Members, and I shall be very glad to submit my case to this committee, in all of whom I have the greatest confidence.

I was elected a Member of the Fifty-fifth Congress from the second district of Pennsylvania and entered upon the discharge of my duties on the 15th of March, 1897, at the convening of the extraordinary session of Congress called by President McKinley.

Mr. RAY. Were you sworn in at that time?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes, sir; it was on the 15th of March. I was regularly sworn in and entered upon the discharge of the duties of a Member of Congress. When war was declared between the United States and Spain, early in 1898, on the 21st of June I think it was, through the War Department I accepted a commission as captain and assistant quartermaster in the volunteer service of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The War Department puts you down as major and quartermaster of Volunteers, but your letter says you were a captain.

Mr. ROBBINS. I was appointed a captain and afterwards promoted to major and served in the Quartermaster Department. From Camp Thomas I went to Porto Rico. I was originally appointed as a captain.

The CHAIRMAN. Appointed by the President? You are reported as being sworn in as a major, and in August, 1898, as a quartermaster of Volunteers.

Mr. ROBBINS. That was the time of my promotion. I entered the service on the 1st of July, and after being in the service six months I was placed in the Quartermaster Department.

Mr. RAY. When did you receive a commission as captain?

Mr. ROBBINS. I think it was on the 21st of June.

Mr. RAY. That was from the President?

Mr. CONNOLLY. You entered as a quartermaster on the 1st of July?

Mr. ROBBINS. That was the time.

Mr. LANHAM. Congress was then in session?

Mr. ROBBINS. Congress was in session until the 8th of July.

Mr. LANHAM. That was during the time of your enlistment?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes; I was sworn into the service regularly.

Mr. LANHAM. You were mustered in?

Mr. ROBBINS. I was regularly sworn in, as I understand it. During the time I was in the military service I drew no pay from the Government, but I drew my salary as a Member and retained my secretary and discharged my duties as a Member. That, I believe, is a statement of the facts controlling my case.

Mr. SMITH. When did you muster out?

Mr. ROBBINS. On the 14th of October, 1898, I was mustered
17 out of the service, along with the large amount of Pennsylvania troops, and received an honorable discharge. Since that time I have been in no way connected with the military service and have been performing my duties as a Member, was present and answered to my name, and have been present in the House ever since my discharge, performing my functions as a Member.

Mr. TERRY. Did you at any time accept pay as an officer of the United States Army?

Mr. ROBBINS. I never did. I never filed any vouchers and never accepted any pay.

Mr. CONNOLLY. You were entitled to pay.

Mr. ROBBINS. I never considered that I was entitled to two salaries. I did not so regard it. That was a matter I decided on my own sense of what was right and wrong. Legally speaking, I presume there was nothing to prevent my drawing pay as a major of Volunteers.

Mr. CONNOLLY. You were a full major of United States Volunteers?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TERRY. When did you quit service in Congress?

Mr. ROBBINS. On the 1st of July.

Mr. TERRY. Congress remained in session until the 8th of July, or a week after you enlisted, and after that time you did not perform any duties as a Member of Congress, to which you were elected by your constituents?

Mr. ROBBINS. Nothing, except that I retained my secretary.

Mr. SMITH. Were you here after the 24th of June?

Mr. ROBBINS. I was here until the 1st of July. I have jotted down a statement which I wish to leave with the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. You can submit that now, if you wish.

A statement was submitted, as follows:

In the matter of a resolution introduced to inquire into whether or not the acceptance of a commission in the Volunteer Army vacates a seat in Congress.

Resolution.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it is hereby, instructed to ascertain and report to this House:

First. Whether any Member of the House has accepted any office under the United States; and Second. Whether the acceptance of such office under the United States has vacated the seat of the Member accepting the same.

Statement of facts.

Edward E. Robbins was elected a Member of the Fifty-fifth Congress from the twenty-first district of Pennsylvania; was duly certified and entered upon the duties of the office on March 15, 1897. War was declared by the United States against Spain early in 1898. On June 21, 1898, he accepted a commission in the Volunteer Army as assistant quartermaster with rank of captain, entering upon the discharge of his duties July 1. The protocol was signed on the 13th of August, suspending hostilities and stipulating the general terms of peace. On October 14, 1898, believing that his services were no longer required, many of the Volunteer troops being mustered out, he tendered his resignation, was mustered out of the service, and granted an honorable discharge. On the 5th of December, 1898, at the regular meeting of Congress, he returned, answered "present" to his name, and resumed his seat. During the time when he was in the military service he drew no pay 18 but continued to draw his salary as a Member of Congress, retained his secretary, and continued to discharge all the duties of such Member, and since the sitting of Congress he has been voting and exercising his rights as such.

The above resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to inquire whether or not he had vacated his seat by his action, and whether such action should be so taken although he never intended to give up his seat in Congress and entered the Volunteer Army during hostilities for the mere temporary purpose of discharging a patriotic duty in defense of his country.

Suggestions of argument.

The section of the Constitution invoked in this statement of facts is the last clause of Article VI, section 1, which provides: "And no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

The wording of the Constitution is peculiar. It is an excerpt of the English constitution, which used the word "forfeit"; nor does it use the word "vacate," which was offered at the time this clause was under discussion by Mr. Morris. He proposed these words: "Except office in the Army or Navy, but in that case their offices shall be vacated." Which was done. (See Madison's Papers, vol. 3, p. 1325.)

Both of these suggestions were voted down, and the discussion shows that the framers of the Constitution intended to prevent a holding of two offices at the same time or the drawing of two compensations or salaries at the same time, because the phraseology finally adopted is, "During his continuance in office."

The plain construction of the section referred to is that no person holding an office under the United States shall be a Member of Congress during his continuance in office. That means, and only can mean, that so long as he holds another office under the United States he can not be a Member of Congress. But it does not say he forfeits his seat in Congress or vacates it; hence, when he resigns such office he can take his seat in Congress. No other construction can give full effect to the clause under consideration.

Let us examine the precedents in Congress that have arisen under this clause:

Van Ness case.

The first case to which we draw attention is the Van Ness case. (Annals, 7th Cong., 1803, p. 398.) In that case John P. Van Ness, a Representative of the State of New York, accepted a commission as major in the militia of the District of Columbia under the authority of the United States. In this case he sought to exercise both offices at the same time. He retained his military commission and continued his seat in Congress, and it was held to be a violation of the clause of the Constitution under consideration. This case is widely different from that of Mr. Robbins, who did not seek to act in Congress while holding a commission in the Volunteer Army.

Yell case.

The next case is the Yell case. (Cong. Globe, vol. 17, p. 340.) An examination into that case shows that Col. Yell drew his salary until the time of his departure; that he ceased to discharge any of the 19 functions of a Member of Congress; and that he did every act indicating an intention to abandon his seat, except actually sending in his resignation. The House refused to consider the resolution to forfeit the seat of Col. Yell. And, although it does not appear in the record of the case, the fact is, he was killed in battle prior to the time when Mr. Newton, who was elected his successor, had appeared and qualified and taken his seat, so that this case differs largely from the case under consideration. The governor and the people of Arkansas raised the question themselves in this case. Whether they knew of Col. Yell's death or not does not appear in the Congressional Globe, but they certainly knew that he had vacated his seat, because an election was held and his successor chosen.

In the case under consideration there has been no complaint by Mr. Robbins's constituents, or from any other source. It is submitted that this case does not rule the present one.

Baker case.

The next case is the Baker case (2d sess., 29th Cong., Rept. No. 36, Feb. 26, 1847). This case does not seem to have ever been finally disposed of, although a resolution was reported to the effect that Edward D. Baker had not been entitled to a seat since his acceptance of and exercising of a military appointment. So that this case can not be taken as deciding the question under consideration.

Vandever case.

The next case seems to be the Vandever case (2d sess., 37th Cong., Rept. 68, vol. 3, 1861). It appeared that Mr. Vandever was elected a Member of Congress from the State of Iowa, and that on the 30th of August, 1861, he was appointed colonel of the Ninth Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and mustered into the service September 24, 1861. He went into the service of the United States, receiving the pay belonging to his rank, and continued in the military service.

While the report shows that the committee reported against Col. Vandever, yet the Congressional Globe of that date shows that the resolution was not actually adopted and the seat never actually declared vacant. So that the House itself established no precedent in this case that need be considered or followed at this time. (Congressional Globe, Jan., 1862, vol. 47, p. —.)

The intention in this case was clearly to vacate the seat in Congress, because every act indicated such intent, and are exactly the reverse of the facts in the present case.

Blair case.

This case (1st sess., 38th Cong., Rept. 110, vol. 1, 1863–64) contains a most exhaustive review of all the cases. Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, and Franklin P. Blair, jr., of Missouri, were elected to Congress, and at the time of their election were major generals in the Volunteer Army. Schenck resigned December 5, 1863, and took his seat December 7, 1863, as a Member of Congress, and was held not to have declined to accept his seat in Congress.

Blair resigned his commission in the Army January 4, 1864. In Blair's case there was a distinct arrangement with the War Department, as disclosed by a letter of President Lincoln, that his 20 resignation as major general was to be held and not accepted.

This case was finally disposed of June 29, 1864 (Cong. Globe, p. 3389), upholding that Gen. Blair by continuing to hold the office of major general of volunteers declined and disqualified himself to hold the office of Representative in the Thirty-eighth Congress.

In Blair's case he did not appear and qualify at the time provided for by law, but continued to hold the office of major general and draw the salary therefor. He did every act required to exercise its functions and did no act tending to show that he intended to become a Member of Congress. And when he did appear and tendered his resignation as major general it was with the distinct understanding that it was to be held by the Secretary of War and not accepted, and should occasion require he was to be again called into the military service. (See letter of President Lincoln, Congressional Globe, vol. 53, p. —.) So that, in fact, his resignation never was finally accepted and acted on during the whole time he was in Congress. It is submitted that this case differs very materially from the one under consideration. My resignation was accepted and I was granted an honorable discharge.

Schenck case.

Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, was appointed a brigadier general May 7, 1861, and a major general August 7, 1862, and served as such. In November, 1862, he was elected a Member of the Thirty-eighth Congress, his term commencing March 4, 1863. He served in the Army until December 5, 1863, when he entered Congress, still holding a commission; but as a matter of fiction, to preserve the date of his commission, he filed his resignation with the Secretary of War, with the distinct understanding with the President that he might at any time during the session, at his own pleasure, withdraw his resignation and return to the field. He therefore sat as a Member of Congress, still holding a commission as a major general.

The exact arrangement is shown by Mr. Lincoln's letter; and Gen. Schenck admitted that there was such an understanding, that he could return to the service with the same rank and same date that he had held while in the field, which could only be done by withdrawing his resignation, which was in the hands of the Secretary of War and never finally accepted and acted on by the President. The same arrangement, Mr. Lincoln says in his letter, was entered into with Gen. Blair. His commission was held in abeyance, and on the 23d of April, after serving actively in Congress for five months, Gen. Blair withdrew his resignation and returned to the Army. Mr. Lincoln's message to Congress on this subject is as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

In obedience to a resolution of your honorable body, a copy of which is hereby returned, I have the honor to make the following brief statement, which is believed to contain the information sought:

Prior to and at the meeting of the present Congress, Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, and Frank P. Blair, jr., of Missouri, Members elect thereto, by and with the consent of the Senate, held commissions from the Executive as major generals in the Volunteer Army. Gen. Schenck tendered his resignation of his said commission and took his seat in the House of Representatives at the assembling thereof upon the distinct verbal understanding with the Secretary of War and the Executive that he might, at any time during the session, at his own pleasure, withdraw said resignation and return to the field. Gen. Blair was, by temporary agreement with Gen. Sherman, in command of a corps through the battles in front of Chattanooga and in the march to the relief of Knoxville, which occurred in the latter days of December last, and, of course, was not present at the assembling of Congress. When he subsequently 21 arrived here he sought and was allowed by the Secretary of War and the Executive the same conditions and promise as allowed and made to Gen. Schenck.

Gen. Schenck has not applied to withdraw his resignation, but when Gen. Grant was made lieutenant general, producing some change of commanders, Gen. Blair sought to be assigned to command of a corps. This was made known to Gens. Grant and Sherman and assented to by them, and the particular corps for him designated. This was all arranged and understood, as now remembered, as much as a month ago; but the withdrawal of Gen. Blair's resignation and making the order assigning him to the command of a corps were not consummated at the War Department until last week, perhaps on the 23d of April instant. As a summary of the whole, it may be stated that Gen. Blair holds no military commission or appointment other than herein stated, and that it is believed he is now acting as major general upon the assumed validity of the commission stated, and not otherwise. There are some letters, notes, telegrams, orders, entries, and perhaps other documents in connection with this subject which it is believed would throw no additional light upon it, but which will be cheerfully furnished if desired.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

APRIL 28, 1864.

This case I claim as a precedent for my case, only it was a much stronger case against Gen. Schenck than the case under consideration is against me. He held his commission from the time of his election until the Saturday before Congress met and then filed a letter, which was not a resignation, because never acted on, and continued to sit. And inasmuch as he did not actually return to the field, Congress held that he was entitled to his seat. (See resolution which was actually passed in Gen. Schenck's case, which is as follows:

"Resolved, That Robert C. Schenck, having resigned the office of major general, which he held on November 13, 1863, to take effect December 5, 1863, was not, by reason of holding such office, disqualified from holding his seat as Representative in the Thirty-eighth Congress, the first session of which began December 7, 1863." Cong. Globe, 38th Cong., vol. 7, p. 593.)

This case is a proper precedent and rules the case under consideration.

The foregoing are the leading cases in which the disqualifications sought to be established by this resolution as to Members of Congress have been investigated by Congress or a committee thereof; and it is respectfully submitted that none of them are precedents upon which the committee can report against the validity of Mr. Robbins's seat or his right to continue as a Member of the Fifty-fifth Congress.

Belknap case.

Another precedent to which the attention of the committee is respectfully directed is the Belknap impeachment proceedings. Mr. Belknap was impeached for misconduct in office while Secretary of War. On the trial, which will be found at length in the Forty-fourth Congress, first session, volume 7, it was held that having resigned before articles of impeachment were preferred, that is, having removed the cause of complaint, the Senate had no jurisdiction, and the charges could not be sustained. I am not holding any office except that of Member of Congress, and have not since October 14. If there ever was any cause such as to render my seat voidable, such cause has long since been removed, and therefore it is respectfully suggested that the committee ought not to find at this time that I am disqualified.

Even if, for the sake of argument, my action rendered my seat voidable or forfeitable, from but two sources could the matter be called in question, namely, the attorney general of Pennsylvania and the House itself. Neither my constituents nor the attorney general of Pennsylvania has found any fault with my course, or taken any action therein; and the cause having been removed before the House has taken 22 any action, it is respectfully submitted they ought not now to declare my seat vacant.

It is a well-known principle that the law abhors forfeiture. Equity never lends itself to enforce a forfeiture or a penalty. (Marshall v. Vicksburg, 15 Wall., 146.) It is therefore respectfully submitted that no action having been taken, there was no forfeiture of the seat of Mr. Robbins in Congress. The cause having been removed, it would be manifestly inequitable and unjust to declare a forfeiture now.

Cases of members of the present Congress who hold offices.

It is respectfully suggested for the consideration of your honorable committee that the case of Mr. Robbins is not as susceptible of criticism as the case of many other Members of the present Congress.

Peace commission: The peace commission appointed to Paris by virtue of the President, under his general treaty-making powers, are certainly exercising office as much as one who entered the Volunteer Army. Messrs. Frye, Gray, and Davis, of the present Senate, were appointed by the President on this commission.

Hawaiian commission: Under public resolution 51, entitled "Joint resolution to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States," section 2 provides that the commissioners hereinbefore provided for shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. On this commission Senators Morgan and Cullom and Representative Hitt, of this Congress, were appointed and acted.

Canadian commission: Under the provisions of the general deficiency bill a Canadian commission was provided for, and on it the President appointed Senators Faulkner and Fairbanks and Representative Dingley.

Industrial commission: Under an act of Congress designated as public act 146, approved June 18, 1898, a nonpartisan commission was created, which is to extend over a number of years, and invested with plenary powers. On this commission the following Members of the present Congress were appointed: On the part of the Senate, Messrs. Kyle, PENROSE, Mantle, Daniel, and Mallory; and on the part of the House, Messrs. Gardiner, Lorimer, Lovering, Livingston, and Bell.

Mail-transportation commission: The following Members of the present Congress were appointed on this commission: Senators Allison, Chandler, and Faulkner, and Representatives Moody, Catchings, and Fleming.

These are a few of the offices upon which Senators and Representatives in the Fifty-fifth Congress have been appointed, some of which have already discharged their duties, others of which are in full life and still actively engaged in the discharge of their various official functions. These are respectfully suggested to your honorable committee as precedents sinning stronger against the Constitution than the case of Mr. Robbins. He, instead of spending his vacation in rest and recreation, at the risk of his life, at great financial sacrifice, entered the Army and served till the war was over and resigned.

23 These cases are not cited for the purpose of urging that these gentlemen have forfeited their seats in Congress, but for the purpose of showing that Mr. Robbins's case is not so strong as theirs, and, as we believe neither Mr. Robbins nor any of these gentlemen have forfeited their right to their seats, we ask the committee in their report to so find. And they are cited for the further purpose of drawing attention of your honorable committee to a thorough investigation and to prevent any discrimination or narrow construction of the resolution introduced, so that it shall be confined to those who entered the Volunteer Army.

LEGAL DEFINITION OF AN OFFICE.

An office is "a special duty, a trust, a charge or position, conferred by authority for a public purpose; a position of trust or authority, as an executive or judicial office, a municipal office; that which a person does, either voluntarily or by authority for or with reference to others." (Webster.) "A right to exercise a public function or employment and to take the fees and emoluments belonging thereto." (Bouvier.)

It is contended that this definition is broad enough to cover all of the various functions held by the gentlemen above referred to; and it is suggested also that a position in the Volunteer Army, which is indefinite as to time and revocable as to authority, is much less an office than any of the positions above mentioned, and that none of them should be held to be in violation of the Constitution. (Last clause of Article VI, section 1.)

The Committee on the Judiciary is instructed by the resolution to ascertain whether or not Members of Congress have accepted any other office, and the inquiry should be complete and the various cases considered and distinguished. If this rule be adopted, the case under consideration would be found to differ widely from any that has yet been considered in the precedents above referred to, and to be ruled by none of the precedents, and that Mr. Robbins has not forfeited his seat in Congress by any act done or committed by him.

This question has been considered by the present law officers of the Government, and the committee is respectfully referred to the opinion in the case of Col. Melvin Grigsby, rendered by the Attorney General June 10, 1898, a copy of which is attached hereto, in which it is held that although Col. Grigsby was attorney general of South Dakota, and at the same time was commissioned colonel of the Third Dakota Cavalry by the President, he did not forfeit the right to exercise the office of attorney general and draw the salary therefor while exercising the office of colonel of the Third Dakota Cavalry.

In this discrimination the Attorney General distinguishes between the Volunteer Army and the Regular Army, holding that while the volunteers may be said to be actively engaged in military service they are not permanently so engaged:

"He is called out to meet an emergency and must be discharged when the purpose for which he entered the service has been accomplished. Unlike the Regular Army officer, he has not selected the military service for a profession. He has simply responded to a patriotic call, and expects, when the war is over, to return to civil life. His term of military service is uncertain and contingent. He may be taken from his civil duties for a few months, for a year, for two years at the most. The Government does not need or demand a complete and final severance of his relations with civil life. He may be able to make arrangements to bridge over his absence, and on his return resume his former work. Whether he is to be permitted to do this and retain a civil office during a temporary absence is a matter for determination by those to whom he is accountable for the proper discharge of the duties of such office.

24 This is the theory of a volunteer appointment. Those to whom Mr. Robbins is accountable are his constituents. They have made no complaint; and it is respectfully submitted that none should be made against him by the present Congress.

The same ruling was made in the case of revenue collector of the port of Buffalo, who, while holding office as collector of internal revenue, entered the military service as colonel of Volunteers. It was held that he did not vacate his appointment as collector and was permitted to retain his office and receive his salary and emoluments therefrom while being absent serving in the military forces of the country.

It is respectfully submitted, in the light of this examination into the Constitution and the precedents arising under it, the present practice in Congress, and the views taken by the legal department of the Government upon the question of the relation of the volunteer to the other departments of the Government, during the recent war, that the proper construction to be placed upon the present case is that I have not forfeited my seat in Congress or done any act that would warrant the committee in reporting that my seat is vacant and recommending to the House that I be excluded from membership.

It is respectfully urged that the case of Mr. Robbins is not ruled adversely by any of the precedents decided by Congress. It is true the recommendation of the committee in the Blair case was adverse; but it never was adopted. The case that does rule the case of Mr. Robbins is the Schenck case, and rules it in favor of Mr. Robbins retaining his seat. The points of similarity in these two cases are such that the committee is respectfully requested to apply the ruling in the Schenck case to this one. Gen. Schenck had resigned his commission, although his resignation was held by the Secretary of War and never actually accepted, and he had the privilege of withdrawing it and reentering the service with the same rank that he left; yet Congress refused to declare his seat vacant.

In the present case Mr. Robbins does not hold any position in the Army, and has not since the meeting of Congress and the reference to the committee. It would be a monstrous doctrine to establish that under the facts in this case Mr. Robbins had forfeited his seat in Congress and because he had gone into the service to discharge a patriotic duty the reward should be expulsion from the House.

I therefore respectfully submit to the committee and request the committee to report that I am still a Member of the Fifty-fifth Congress and entitled to the rights and privileges of such.

Respectfully submitted.

EDWIN E. ROBBINS.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., June 10, 1898.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

SIR: I am in receipt of your communication of the 3d instant, in which you request my opinion upon a question of law growing out of the following facts:

At the time of the recent call for volunteers Melvin Grigsby was attorney general of the State of South Dakota. While thus holding a civil office the President appointed and commissioned him a colonel in the Volunteer service. Subsequently, in a telegram dated the 31st ultimo, the governor of South Dakota informed you "that Col. Melvin Grigsby, of the Third Cavalry, has this day drawn his pay as attorney general of South Dakota, and that he assumed to be such attorney general," and asked you whether Col. Grigsby was "to be continued as colonel of the Third Cavalry."

Section 1222 of the Revised Statutes provides:

"No officer of the Army on the active list shall hold any civil 25 office, whether by election or appointment, and every such officer who accepts or exercises the functions of a civil office shall thereby cease to be an officer of the Army and his commission shall be thereby vacated."

Upon a reference, the Judge Advocate General of the Army, in his indorsement of the 1st instant, expressed the view, "if Col. Grigsby has held or exercised the functions of the office of attorney general of South Dakota since he became an officer of the Army, he thereby 'ceased to be an officer of the Army,' and his commission was thereby vacated."

It is to be observed that the view expressed is not restricted to the case presented. The governor of South Dakota does not state that Col. Grigsby, since his acceptance of a commission in the volunteer service, has exercised any of the functions of the office of attorney general. He states that Col. Grigsby "has this day drawn his pay as attorney general, and assumed to be such attorney general." The presumption is that he assumed to be attorney general by drawing his pay, but for what time he drew his pay does not appear.

If, however, the statement of the governor were amended so as to present a case of the exercise of the functions of the office of attorney general by Col. Grigsby since he became an officer in the Volunteer Army, I should hold that the provisions of section 1222 do not apply to vacate his commission, for the reason that he is not an "officer of the Army on the active list" within the meaning of the statute.

While it is true that the act of April 22, 1898, entitled "An act to provide for temporarily increasing the Military Establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes," under which Col. Grigsby was appointed and commissioned, provides that the Volunteer Army shall be "subject to the laws, orders, and regulations governing the Regular Army," the act clearly points out the distinction between the Regular Army, "the permanent Military Establishment which is maintained both in peace and war" (sec. 3), and the Volunteer Army, which "shall be maintained only during the existence of war" (sec. 4). Section 4 specially provides:

"That all enlistments for the Volunteer Army shall be for a term of two years, unless sooner terminated, and that all officers and men composing said Army shall be discharged from the service of the United States when the purposes for which they were called into service shall have been accomplished or on the conclusion of hostilities."

Title XIV of the Revised Statutes, which regulates the Army of the United States, contains sections which in terms are applicable only to the Volunteer Army, sections which in terms are applicable only to the Regular Army, and sections whose applicability depends upon the character of their provisions. Sections which in language are restricted or in provisions are appropriate only to the Permanent Establishment—the Regular Army—can not, of course, be held to apply to the Volunteer Army.

For example, chapter 2 of Title XIV, providing for the retirement of Army officers, clearly has no application to the Volunteer Army, organized for simply temporary service. This chapter creates two lists of Regular Army officers, the active and the retired list, a distinction which does not obtain in the Volunteer Army. When, therefore, section 1222 places a restriction on every "Army officer on the active list" it plainly refers to Regular Army officers. An Army officer on the active list is one not only actively but permanently engaged in the military service of the Government. Having chosen the Army for his career, and being actively engaged therein, the statute properly prohibits him from accepting or exercising the functions of a civil office.

While an officer in the Volunteer Army may be said to be actively engaged in the military service, he is not permanently so engaged. He is called out to meet an emergency and must be discharged when the purpose for which he entered the service has been accomplished. Unlike the Regular Army officer he has not selected the military service for a profession. He has simply responded to a patriotic call, and expects when the war is over to return to civil life. His term of military service is uncertain and contingent. He may be taken from his civil duties for a few months, for a year, for two years at the most. The Government does not need nor demand a complete and final severance of his relations with civil life. He may be able to make arrangements to bridge over his absence and on his return resume his former work. Whether he is to be permitted to do this and retain a civil office during a temporary absence is a matter for determination by those to whom he is accountable for the proper discharge of the duties of such office. It does not concern your department nor this department.

Very respectfully,

JOHN K. RICHARDS,
Solicitor General.

Approved:

JOHN W. GRIGGS,
Attorney General.

Mr. TERRY. Referring to the Yell case, what time expired between the death of the sitting Member and the election that took place, or the proclamation for an election?

26 Mr. ROBBINS. I can not give you that.

Mr. TERRY. He was killed at the battle of Buena Vista, was he not?

Mr. ROBBINS. I believe he was.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not recall in the record any reference to the death of Yell.

Mr. ROBBINS. Poore's Manual gives that.

Mr. RAY. He was killed in battle; but his seat was declared vacant because he accepted a commission in the Army of the United States?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes; quite awhile afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the date?

Mr. ROBBINS. I can not give dates.

Mr. RAY. The resolution declaring the seat vacant was based upon the fact of his death, do you mean to say?

Mr. ROBBINS. It was based upon the fact that his constituents raised the question by electing his successor. Whether Mr. Yell had been killed does not appear in the Congressional Globe. They acted upon the supposition that he had not vacated his seat because they elected his successor.

Mr. TERRY. You have not been reelected?

Mr. ROBBINS. I have not.

Mr. RAY. Does not the record show that Congress declared Yell's seat vacant upon the ground that he had accepted a commission in the Army of the United States?

Mr. ROBBINS. The record shows the question was called up and postponed. The resolution shows that that was the ground of inquiry, but the resolution was not adopted.

Mr. JENKINS. His successor came and took the seat.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Do you consider that similar to the Baker case?

Mr. ROBBINS. The Baker case is the next one I have examined. That case does not seem to have been finally disposed of.

Mr. RAY. In the case of Col. Baker, when the question was raised he rose upon the floor of the House during the session and formally resigned and left the House.

Mr. ROBBINS. The case of Col. Vandever; he was elected a Member of Congress and took his seat in the Thirty-seventh Congress, and on the 30th of August, 1861, was appointed colonel of the Ninth Iowa, and entered the service on the 24th of September, 1861.

Mr. RAY. Was not his seat contested?

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not know his name. The report will be found on page 61, volume 3, second session, Thirty-seventh Congress, report 68.

Mr. TERRY. Do you know whether or not he resigned before Congress met?

Mr. PARKER. No; after the adoption of the resolution without discussion, it was reconsidered on the same day upon the question being raised as to whether a two-thirds vote was necessary. It was afterwards postponed from time to time.

Mr. RAY. You are all mistaken, as I read the records, and have fallen into error in this way: The question in regard to Mr. Vandever's seat arose in two ways. In one way, there was a resolution reported declaring the seat vacant. That resolution reads, "That William Vandever has not been entitled to a seat as a Member of this House since he was mustered into the military service of the United States as colonel of the Nineteenth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, to wit, since the 24th day of September, 1861." It was debated, and among those who participated in the debate were Mr. Dawes and Mr. Shellen-
27 barger. The resolution was adopted unanimously without division. What you refer to is the case of Byington against Vandever, and that came up on resolution declaring Byington entitled to the seat to which Vandever was elected, but it was postponed from time to time, and finally no action was taken on that resolution, and some of the gentlemen of the House were looking that up and were calling attention to certain statements in which that resolution was pointed out. When you investigate it you will find that the resolution declaring Byington entitled to the seat was not acted upon, but the resolution which I have already read was acted upon by the House and was adopted without division. I want to say that in the Schenck case there is a misunderstanding as to the fact. Mr. Schenck filed his formal resignation in writing before the meeting of Congress, and it was accepted in writing.

Mr. ROBBINS. It was not accepted in writing. This says it was upon the distinct verbal understanding that he might withdraw his resignation and return to the field.

Mr. RAY. You contend his resignation was not accepted?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. Do not the proceedings show that the resignation was accepted in writing?

Mr. ROBBINS. The debates may disclose it.

Mr. RAY. It was accepted, and this verbal understanding was entered into at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. This was at the first meeting of Congress after he had been elected in December?

Mr. ROBBINS. I would suppose so.

The CHAIRMAN. He had not qualified and had not acted before his resignation had been tendered and accepted?

Mr. ROBBINS. That is my understanding of the fact. Your committee is referred to the case of Belknap as a case kindred to the one under consideration. You will find it reported in the first session Forty-fourth Congress, volume 7, which is devoted entirely to that case. Belknap was impeached and tendered his resignation before the proceedings were approved by the House. The Senate, because the case was before it, took cognizance of it, but it could not do anything in the case, because he had resigned.

Mr. ALEXANDER. In reference to the Hawaiian commissioners, they were confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not know whether they have been or not; but if not, they will be, because the act is not complete until that is done. The Canadian High Commission was appointed by the Speaker of the House under an act creating it, investing him with authority. Then you have the labor commission, which includes some Members of the House who are vested with special duty. You have other commissions on which 30 or 40 Members of the House are serving. Not one of them is a violation of the statutes, and they are all kindred cases, and similar to the case of the Members who have accepted military service.

Mr. TERRY. Do I understand you to say that 30 or 40 Members of the House have accepted places on commissions?

Mr. ROBBINS. There are some 30 serving on various commissions. This question of the status of a volunteer officer was considered by the law department of the Government, and it arose in the case of Col. Grigsby. Grigsby, at the time of his appointment as colonel of Volunteer Cavalry, was attorney general of the State of South Dakota. After entering upon the discharge of his duties he drew pay as a mili-
28 tary commander and drew his salary as attorney general of South Dakota. A letter was addressed to the authorities of South Dakota inquiring as to his status and whether the office had been forfeited. I have read an extract from it as to the discussion between the attorney general and the authorities of South Dakota.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Was it the attorney general or the assistant attorney general?

Mr. ROBBINS. It was written by the Attorney General of the United States on Col. Grigsby's status. It was not written by Col. Grigsby or any person connected with the law department of South Dakota, but by the Attorney General of the United States, and addressed to the authorities of South Dakota. It is signed John K. Richards, and is approved by John W. Griggs, Attorney General, and addressed to the Secretary of War, defining the status of Col. Grigsby.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Suppose Congress had been in session the whole time when you were at Camp Thomas, could the Sergeant at Arms have gone to camp and taken you away and brought you to the House?

Mr. ROBBINS. I have never examined into that, and I do not know that I could answer it.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Congress was in session for a week when you were at Camp Thomas. The Sergeant at Arms could not have gone there with a writ and enforced it?

Mr. ROBBINS. I am not so sure about that.

Mr. CONNOLLY. He could have done so, provided your military superiors would have permitted him to do it. He would have the legal authority. Your action affected your seat in Congress if you were outside of the jurisdiction of the House.

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not think I was at the time.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Do you think we could have sent the Sergeant at Arms and enforced your presence?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes; I think that is right.

Mr. SMITH. Do not these authorities or cases to which you have referred concede the incompatibility of the two offices?

Mr. ROBBINS. So far as the reports of the committees are concerned, they do.

Mr. SMITH. As to the Schenck case, you are insisting that it applies to your case. Did not Mr. Schenck resign his seat?

Mr. ROBBINS. He filed his resignation.

Mr. SMITH. He regarded them as incompatible. Can you show any authority by which you can establish the fact that the acceptance of an incompatible office does not invalidate the one previously held?

Mr. ROBBINS. I have no authority except what I have cited in this brief.

Mr. MCCALL. You said you wanted to be heard on the question as to whether there was an incompatibility of the offices.

The CHAIRMAN. I think he answered by claiming that he was not then in office.

Mr. MCCALL. I mean this particular office of volunteer.

Mr. ROBBINS. The discussion of the subject discloses the fact that the volunteer officer was not an officer within the meaning of the Constitution at all.

Mr. TERRY. You read the opinion of the Attorney General?

Mr. ROBBINS. That refers to the office where a man took part in the Regular Army, with its retired list, fixed tenure of service, etc. That is the incompatible office which the Constitution refers to; but a 29 mere volunteer, whose term is uncertain and who enters for a temporary purpose, does not come within that meaning.

Mr. RAY. To be incompatible, must it be a permanent office or one for life and not terminable by terms of enlistments? During the War of the Rebellion men enlisted for three years or during the war. A man entered the service as a colonel for three years, and would you claim that he could have been a Member of Congress and an officer in the Army at the same time, even though only an officer of volunteers, and his service was to continue for at least one year after his term as a Member of Congress had ceased. Would that be exactly consistent?

Mr. ROBBINS. One is a mere temporary employment and not regarded as an office in my view of the thing at all.

Mr. JENKINS. Have you examined the record in the case of Gen. Sickles?

Mr. ROBBINS. That was a case where a man was on the retired list of the Army and held an office under the Government of the United States.

Mr. MCCALL. The Supreme Court of the United States decided that a man on the retired list of the Army is an officer of the United States.

Mr. RAY. It has held that he was not. So holds the court of appeals in New York State.

Mr. SMITH. It held so in the Badeau case.

Thereupon the committee adjourned to meet Wednesday, January 25, at 10.30 a. m.

WEDNESDAY, January 25, 1899.

STATEMENT OF HON. JOSEPH WHEELER.

Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

GENTLEMEN: Pursuant to your direction, I respectfully submit the following with regard to the resolution introduced by the Hon. Joseph W. Bailey, and now pending before this committee.

I concur with the committee that the question before them is one of very grave importance.

If the extreme view is taken that the clause in the Constitution is mandatory and that it applies to all Members of Congress who accept offices of a temporary character which may be terminated at any moment, then the Government will frequently find itself embarrassed in selecting men for certain duties. For instance, it would have been unfortunate if the President had been inhibited from appointing Senators Davis, Fry, and Gray on the peace commission. It would have been detrimental for him to have been inhibited from appointing Senators Morgan, Cullom, and Hitt on the Hawaiian Commission; and it would have been equally unfortunate had he been inhibited from appointing Mr. Dingley and Senators Fairbanks and Faulkner on the Canadian Commission. It would also have been unfortunate had he been inhibited from appointing such a distinguished and able man as Senator Morgan on the arbitration court in Paris.

It has frequently been the case, and will often be hereafter, that Members of the House and Senate possess knowledge with regard to important matters which eminently fits them for holding offices or performing duties of vital importance. So thoroughly have Con-
30 gress and the Executive been impressed with this that, during the 110 years of the existence of our Government, many hundred Members of the Senate and of the House have been appointed to offices.

The committee will readily understand my embarrassment in a matter of this character. There are three other Members of this House who have accepted military commissions and some 28 others who have accepted civil positions. It would be very unjust to them for me to have assumed to decide this question by attempting to resign, as it has been urged that such action on my part would be used as an argument against their right to retain their seats in Congress. Again, I have received continued and urgent appeals from my constituents not to resign, and these have come from men who have successfully supported me in 10 primary elections and in 10 elections as a Member of this body.

In deference to the views of the distinguished Members of Congress who are insisting upon my seat being vacated, I have studiously refrained from taking any active part in the proceedings of Congress, and since the day of my appointment, on May 4, I have refrained from voting. It is true that at first I entered the Hall a few times to see some of my fellow Members, but since learning that this was distasteful to one or two of my old friends I have refrained from even availing myself of this privilege. I have not drawn any congressional pay, mileage, or clerk hire since May 4, notwithstanding that I have been compelled to employ clerks at my own expense to perform routine duties.

No principle of law is more firmly established than that the construction of a statute will not be favored which would result in the destruction of any branch of the Government. That the clause in the Constitution referring to a Member of Congress holding any office has been considered as only directory is certainly shown by the fact that hundreds of Members of Congress have received and held offices without any objection or question being raised.

Members of the present Congress who are holding other civil offices.

Even at this very moment, as stated by Hon. Edward E. Robbins in his brief, Senators are holding very important offices under the appointment of the President as peace commissioners, and many Members of this House are holding high offices. The following are a few of those which occur to me:

Labor Commission.—House: Gardner, New Jersey; Lorimer, Illinois; Lovering, Massachusetts; Livingston, Georgia; Bell, Colorado. Senate: Kyle, Penrose, Mantle, Daniel, Mallory.

Mail Transportation Commission.—House: Moody, Catchings, Fleming. Senate: Allison, Chandler, Faulkner.

Hawaiian Commission.—Senators Morgan and Cullom, and Representative Hitt.

Canadian Commission.—Mr. Dingley and Senators Faulkner and Fairbanks.

Peace Commission.—Senators Frye, Gray, and Davis.

Hons. Sereno E. Payne and Joseph D. Sayers are directors of the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, and Senators S. N. Cullom and George Gray and Representatives R. R. Hitt and Robert Adams are Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. And yet, no one contends that these 30 or more Members of Congress have vacated their seats by accepting and performing the duties of these offices.

31 Take, for instance, the cases of the Hawaiian and Canadian commissioners. They were appointed by the President pursuant to a law enacted by the same Congress of which the appointees were Members. No question whatever was raised about these appointments, and the reason was that the right of Congressmen to hold offices of this character has become settled. The appointments were made pursuant to a fixed construction of the Constitution.

There were three Members of the House and two of the Senate appointed as visitors to West Point. They received pay for their services, besides their pay in Congress, and this has been repeated for many years, and no one raised the point that they vacated their seats in the House.

Ten Members of Congress were appointed on the Labor Commission, 6 on the Mail Transportation Commission, 3 on the Hawaiian Commission, 3 on the Canadian Commission, and 3 Senators on the peace commission, making 28 Members out of the present Congress who were appointed to various offices.

Legal definition of office.

I do not think that there should be any distinction between those appointed by the President and those appointed by the Speaker of the House. They are all offices within the legal meaning.

Bouvier's Law Dictionary, Peterson edition, 1897, page 539, defines the word office as follows:

"Office: A right to exercise a public function or employment, and to take the fees and emoluments belonging to it. Shelf. Mortm., 797; Cruise Digest, index; 3 S. & R., 149.

"An office is a public charge or employment; 2 Borck., 102, per Marshall, C. J."

It can not be logically contended that on account of the fact of the appointments not being made by the President they are not offices. Many officers of the Government are appointed by heads of the departments.

Congress has virtually taken the appointments of certain offices in their own hands. They have passed a law providing that the appointment of naval cadets shall be made by Congressmen. A naval cadet is an officer, and the fact that he is virtually appointed by a Member of Congress does not make him any the less an officer than if his appointment was placed solely in the hands of the President.

We see that 28 Members of the present Congress have been appointed to public civil offices. A careful examination of the records shows that in some former Congresses nearly this number of Members have been appointed to fill public offices. This would make 1,540 cases where Members of Congress have been appointed to public civil offices during their term without a single objection being made that the Constitution was being infringed; but, to be conservative, we will put the number at one-third of that, and estimate that 500 cases of this character have existed.

Congress by its practice for 100 years has assumed the clause in the Constitution as directory and not mandatory.

Now, Congress having decided by a uniform practice of over 100 years that a Member of Congress may be appointed to a civil office by the President of the United States, even though the office was created by the same Congress of which the appointee was a Member, shows clearly that Congress has uniformly constructed the clause of the Constitution as directory and not mandatory.

32 Or, perhaps, it might be more correct to say that the construction has been that the inhibition of the Constitution applies only to persons who hold an office permanent in its character, and not to persons who are appointed to an office for a special duty, which may be terminated at any moment. This is the view taken by the Attorney General of the United States in the Grigsby case.

Strongest reasons that inhibition does not apply to volunteer officers.

If that construction has been assumed with regard to civil offices, the construction becomes more imperative in cases where Members are appointed to temporary duty with the volunteer troops. The Members of Congress who went to the front in the Spanish War were simply performing a duty which devolved on every citizen. It would be proper to say that they were detailed or ordered to perform a special duty in defense of their country, and, so far as the Constitution is concerned, it makes no difference whether the order directed that this duty was to be performed in one capacity or another; the effect would be the same whether the person detailed was to be called general, colonel, lieutenant, corporal, or private. It makes no difference whether the person so detailed to do militia duty was to command and direct others, or whether he was to be himself directed.

Effect of the extreme view.

The introducer of the resolution which is being considered by the Judiciary Committee takes the extreme view that to hold any office whatever would vacate a seat in Congress. This is the extreme view on one side. Let us look at what the introducer of the resolution would call an extreme view on the other side.

An officer of the volunteer service does not belong to the Regular Military Establishment, but is a part of the militia of the United States. The general principles upon which governments are founded make it the duty of every citizen to be at all times ready to take up arms in its defense, and the Constitution provides that this militia shall be used "to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion." It follows, therefore, that every citizen of the United States is primarily a member of the militia.

If it is contended that to be a member of the militia is an office such as was contemplated by the Constitution (Art. I, sec. 6), then an extreme constructionist would contend that it would be impossible to have a Congress, because everyone would be a member of the militia, and therefore no one could be a Member of Congress. It must be admitted that this is an extreme view, and it may be contended that Congress has met this view by passing a law by which a Member of Congress could escape military duty, but it must also be remembered that, with regard to personal exemptions, every Congress is a law unto itself.

Now, bear in mind that we are all primarily members of the militia, and that the Constitution makes it the duty of Congress "to provide for calling forth the militia, to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasions."

Now, supposing it were necessary for the militia in the city of Washington to be called forth for any of these purposes. The Members of this House would not fly before the enemy and set such an example to the people, which, if followed, would bring disgrace and ruin to our country, but they would, with the true, brave American spirit which actuates them, leave their seats and confront the enemy of the country, and, by such an example, give an inspiration of patriotism and chivalry to all the people of our land. If they did so, the extreme constructionist would contend that this patriotic action on the part of Members of Congress had dissolved this body and virtually destroyed the Government. All decisions of all courts hold that a literal construction of any law which could by any possibility bring about such a result is not a construction which should be followed.

Attorney General Griggs's decision.

The Attorney General of the United States has in effect decided this question. In a matter in which the principle is the same he says:

"While an officer in the Volunteer Army may be said to be actively engaged in the military service, he is not permanently so engaged. He is called out to meet an emergency, and must be discharged when the purpose for which he entered the service has been accomplished. Unlike the Regular Army officer, he has not selected the military service for his profession. He has simply responded to a patriotic call, and expects, when the war is over, to return to civil life. His term of military service is uncertain and contingent. He may be taken from his civil duties for a few months, for a year, for two years at the most. The Government does not need or demand a complete and final severance of his relations with civil life. He may be able to make arrangements to bridge over his absence and on his return resume his former work. Whether he is to be permitted to do this and retain a civil office during a temporary absence is a matter for determination by those to whom he is accountable for the proper discharge of the duties of such office."

The Sickles case.

Again, in the Sickles case it was decided that Gen. Sickles, who was then a major general on the retired list, was not such an officer as was inhibited by the Constitution from holding a seat in Congress.

The Yell case.

Mr. Bailey and his admirers have gathered precedents to sustain his view. The decision upon which they specially rely is the Yell case, from Arkansas. How different that one is from the case being pressed by Mr. Bailey. Arkansas had but one Member of Congress, and Col. Yell was that Member. On November 7, 1846, the Government notified the Legislature of Arkansas that unless Col. Yell's seat was declared vacant and a new election held Arkansas would have no representation whatever in the House of Representatives. On November 11 a resolution was offered calling upon the governor to order an election, and it was asserted that interests vital to Arkansas were pending in Congress which made it necessary that that State should be represented. Notwithstanding the great necessity for having a Member of Congress in the House, the feeling against interfering with Col. Yell was so strong in Arkansas that a motion to table the resolution only failed by 5 votes, 34 being cast for tabling and 39 against it.

At that time Col. Yell was in central Mexico, far removed from communication with his country, and therefore absolutely unable to give any attention to legislation which affected Arkansas. An election was ordered, and on February 8 Mr. Newton was elected and presented himself to Congress. George S. Houston, who had long served as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and also of the Judiciary Committee, opposed the seating of Newton, as he stated that if Col. Yell presented himself he would be entitled to take his seat and proceed with the business of Congress.

Gov. Houston, of Alabama, contended that Yell's seat was not vacated.

Gov. Houston insisted (vol. 17, p. 339, Congressional Globe) that Mr. Yell was still a Member of the House, and also insisted that the action of the House in that very session, in welcoming Col. Baker back from Mexico and permitting him to resume his seat and perform his duties, conclusively authorized a Member to accept a volunteer commission and to retain his seat in the House. He said:

"The action of this House itself must preclude the gentleman who now presents his credentials from taking his seat, at all events, for the present.

"The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Baker], after being absent during a part of the last session and about half of this, presented himself here, took his seat, and resumed the discharge of all his official duties. The House then sanctioned the principle that Mr. Baker, after serving in the Army for months, and still retaining his commission, was entitled to his seat as a Member of this body. The gentleman took his seat, discharged his duties, received his emoluments, and did everything that was incumbent on him to do in the capacity of Representative of the people. How, then, can the House now turn round, on the precedent which it has itself established by its own solemn act, and admit another Member from the State of Arkansas? I regret that this question has been presented, and I feel bound, under the circumstances of the case, and especially after the observations of the gentleman from New York, to take the course which my remarks indicate. Let what will come, I shall endeavor to carry out the principles of the Constitution." (Congressional Globe, vol. 17, p. 339.)

It will be seen that such a profound lawyer and experienced legislator as George S. Houston, who served 20 years in Congress, and also in the Senate of the United States, and who was also twice governor of Alabama, contended that under the proper interpretation of the Constitution Mr. Yell was entitled to retain his seat.

Finally, upon it being represented that the interests of Arkansas were involved, Newton was allowed to take a seat pending the investigation of the matter by the Committee on Elections. Two weeks from that date Yell was killed in the Battle of Buena Vista.

House refused to unseat either Yell or Baker.

Notwithstanding this, the House resisted every attempt to take up the resolution to confirm Newton in his seat, and finally, on March 3, just before an adjournment, the RECORD says (vol. 17, p. 573), in reference to this case, "The question was put, and the House refused to take up the report and resolution." The House also refused to take up the report which declared that Edward D. Baker was not entitled to his seat on account of his acceptance of an appointment in the Volunteer service.

The Wheeler case is much stronger than that of Col. Yell. He was appointed in the Volunteer forces on May 4 last. A petition was presented to the governor of Alabama asking him to declare the seat vacant and to order an election. Protests of the most vehement character were sent to the governor from the eighth congressional district of Alabama, and the governor published that he would not take any action in the matter. The people then, by a ballot election, unanimously renominated Gen. Wheeler for Congress, giving him a vote even exceeding the Democratic vote of the district. The people then 35 reelected him to the Fifty-sixth Congress by unanimous vote, thus showing clearly their construction of the Constitution.

Again, Yell was in central Mexico, where he could give no attention whatever to congressional business, and was actively exercised in military command. Wheeler, on the contrary, has relinquished all military command. He is quietly but efficiently attending to his congressional matters in which his State and district are interested. So far from complaints coming from the district, appeals of the strongest character come to him, urging him to retain his seat. The main objection seems to have been the fear that Gen. Wheeler would draw Army pay and congressional pay also. This he has scrupulously abstained from doing, and the records show that he has never drawn any congressional pay since May 4, 1898, the date on which he was commissioned.

House refused to unseat Gen. Schenck.

Gen. Robert C. Schenck was appointed a brigadier general May 7, 1861, and a major general August 7, 1862, and served as such. In November, 1862, he was elected a Member of the Thirty-eighth Congress, his term commencing March 4, 1863. He served in the Army until December 5, 1863, when he entered Congress, still holding a commission, but, as a matter of fiction, filed his resignation with the Secretary of War and the Executive, with the distinct understanding that he might at any time during the session, at his own pleasure, withdraw his resignation and return to the field. He therefore sat as a Member of Congress, still holding a commission as a major general. This is Mr. Lincoln's statement, and Gen. Schenck admitted that there was an understanding that he could return to the service with the same rank and date, and this could only be done by withdrawal of his resignation. Mr. Lincoln says that later, in December, the same plan was adopted with regard to Gen. Frank Blair, and admits that Gen. Blair's commission was held in abeyance, and that on April 23, after serving actively in Congress for nearly five months, Gen. Blair withdrew his resignation and returned to the Army. President Lincoln's message to Congress on these subjects is as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

In obedience to a resolution of your honorable body, a copy of which is hereby returned, I have the honor to make the following brief statement, which is believed to contain the information sought:

Prior to and at the meeting of the present Congress, Robert C. Schenck, of Ohio, and Frank P. Blair, jr., of Missouri, Members elect thereto, by and with the consent of the Senate, held commissions from the Executive as major generals in the Volunteer Army. Gen. Schenck tendered the resignation of his said commission and took his seat in the House of Representatives at the assembling thereof, upon the distinct verbal understanding with the Secretary of War and the Executive that he might at any time during the session, at his own pleasure, withdraw said resignation and return to the field. Gen. Blair was by temporary agreement with Gen. Sherman in command of a corps through the battles in front of Chattanooga and in the march to the relief of Knoxville, which occurred in the latter days of December last, and, of course, was not present at the assembling of Congress. When he subsequently arrived here he sought, and was allowed by the Secretary of War and the Executive, the same conditions and promise as allowed and made to Gen. Schenck.

Gen. Schenck has not applied to withdraw his resignation, but when Gen. Grant was made lieutenant general, producing some change of commanders, Gen. Blair sought to be assigned to command of a corps. This was made known to Gens. Grant and Sherman and assented to by them and the particular corps for him designated. This was all arranged and understood, as now remembered, as much as a month ago, but the withdrawal of Gen. Blair's resignation and making the 36 order assigning him to the command of a corps were not consummated at the War Department until last week, perhaps on the 23d of April, instant. As a summary of the whole, it may be stated that Gen. Blair holds no military commission or appointment other than herein stated, and that it is believed he is now acting as major general upon the assumed validity of the commission stated, and not otherwise. There are some letters, notes, telegrams, orders, entries, and perhaps other documents in connection with this subject which is believed would throw no additional light upon it, but which will be cheerfully furnished if desired.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

APRIL 28, 1864.

House allowed Gen. Blair, without objection, to perform all duties in the House during a period of 17 months, while holding a commission in the Army.

Frank P. Blair, jr., was elected a Member of the Thirty-sixth Congress. He was afterwards elected Member of the Thirty-seventh Congress, the first session of which commenced July 4, 1861, and the last session ended July 3, 1863. He was elected to the Thirty-eighth Congress, the first session of which commenced December 7, 1863. He was appointed a colonel July 7, 1862, and on November 29, 1862, was appointed a brigadier general, and on the same date a major general. He continued to perform the duties of a Congressman and a general until April 23, 1864, when he left Congress to take command of the Seventeenth Army Corps under Gen. Sherman. On June 29, 1864, he then being in command of an Army corps in Georgia, and having been absent from the House since April 23, and objection being made to such an action, the House passed a resolution that he had forfeited his seat. It must be borne in mind that Blair had been holding a commission in the Army and in Congress for 17 months before the House took this action.

The position taken by Mr. Bailey, the mover of the resolution, is that the moment any office under the Government is accepted by a Member of Congress he ceases coinstanter to be a Member of Congress, and that his seat stands vacant from that moment. The contention of Mr. Bailey and his friends is that a Member of Congress who has accepted any office can not resign because, his seat having been vacated, he stands in the same attitude as any other citizen. There is, therefore, nothing which I can legally do but to await the decision of Congress upon this question.

I desire here to state that there is no Member of Congress who reveres the Constitution more than myself, and there is no one who would regret being instrumental in the infringement of its provisions more than myself. And I will further state that my very high regard for the integrity and ability of the Members of this House—many of whom I have had the honor and pleasure of serving with for nearly one-fifth of a century—convinces me that the question will receive their best possible consideration, and my feelings of regard and, I may say, of affection for them is such that I desire to refute the intimations which have been made that anything personal enters into the question. Certainly, so far as I am concerned, no such idea enters or could possibly enter my mind.

My contention is, and I think the House concurs with me, that the committee is called upon to decide whether the inhibition of the Constitution includes any performance of duty by a Member of Congress for the Government, irrespective of its very temporary character, or, whether the inhibition was only intended to apply to a person holding an office of a permanent character or for a definite and fixed period. The Attorney General of the United States gave this question most careful consideration in the Grigsby case, and decided that the inhibition was 37 only intended to apply to offices of a permanent character. It is true that the question was not upon the case of a Member of Congress, but the reasoning of the Attorney General certainly has a bearing on the question before the committee.

I know that the members of the committee and the Members of the House, whom I am proud to call my friends, will decide this case as they believe to be in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution. To those who contend that I should have resigned my seat I will say that I was urged not to do so by persons whose requests and recommendations I could not disregard, and it has also been urged that for me to have done so would have been quasi an expression of my judgment on the matter, and thus in a measure have prejudiced the case of some 30 other Members of the House who are in the same position as myself.

STATEMENT OF HON. J. J. GARDNER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 19, 1899.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th instant, transmitting House resolution No. 354, submitted by Mr. Bailey, the body of the resolution being in the following words:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it is hereby, instructed to ascertain and report to this House;

"First. Whether any Member of the House has accepted any office under the United States; and,

"Second. Whether the acceptance of such office under the United States has vacated the seat of the Member accepting the same."

Your letter of transmittal informs me that—

"I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to transmit to you House resolution No. 354, and to say that the committee have fixed Tuesday, January 24, 1899, 10 o'clock a. m., to hear those who may desire to be heard on the subject. Your being a member of the United States Industrial Commission has made it my duty to bring this matter to your attention."

Fearing that I may not be able to be present on Tuesday, January 24, 1899, the time fixed for the hearing, I avail myself of the privilege of submitting a brief communication.

The only provision of organic or other law known to me that would suggest the propriety of this inquiry is Article I, section 6, paragraph 2, of the Constitution of the United States, which is as follows:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no such person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

Permit me to say that I am unable to perceive why the resolution should have suggested an inquiry with reference to the members of the United States Industrial Commission who are Members of the House. This commission was created by the present Congress, and during the time for which the Members of the House of Representatives appointed upon it had been elected. If, therefore, being appointed to membership on this commission was being appointed to a civil office, such attempted appointment was in defiance of the plain provisions of the paragraph and nugatory, since "no Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office. * * *."

No Member has been so appointed, and I, a Member of the House, 38 am not on the commission. My membership in the House debarred me from becoming a member of the commission if such membership is a civil office under the Constitution.

But membership in the United States Industrial Commission is not an office within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States. (See Art. II, sec. 2, par. 2.) Officers must be appointed by the President by and with the consent of the Senate, by the President alone, by a court of law, or by the head of a department. No one appointed otherwise is appointed to an office within the meaning of the Constitution.

Without attempting to amass authorities on this point from the States which have similar provisions in their constitutions, I refer only to the case of The United States v. Germaine (99 U. S., 508).

It will go for the saying with the Committee on the Judiciary that a contention that the House of Representatives is a department of the Government within the meaning of the organic law and the Speaker of the House the head of the department would be too absurd for consideration.

Respectfully submitted.

J. J. GARDNER.

STATEMENT OF HON. DAVID G. COLSON.

WASHINGTON, January 23, 1899.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary,
House of Representatives.

DEAR GEN. HENDERSON: Answering your letter of the 6th instant, asking whether I desire to be heard in respect to House resolution No. 354, I beg to state that some one of the Members interested in the matter to which the resolution relates will very probably appear before the committee at the time fixed in your subsequent communication, Tuesday, January 24, at 10 o'clock a. m.

Thanking you for your kindness, I am,

Very truly, yours,

DAVID G. COLSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 23, 1899.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary,
House of Representatives.

DEAR GEN. HENDERSON: Since writing you this forenoon I have found that I can not appear before the committee at 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. I write to state the following facts which the committee may desire to use in the consideration of the House resolution 354. I was commissioned colonel of the Fourth Kentucky Regiment Infantry, United States Volunteers, in June, 1898, and served as such until the 5th of December of same year, since which latter date my connection with the Army, while technically the same, has been actually nominal. I have never signed the pay roll as an officer in the Army, and therefore have not drawn a cent from the Government as an Army officer. I have drawn my salary as a Member of Congress to the 1st of December. I have performed the duties of a Member of Congress all the time I have been an officer in the Volunteer Army.

I will submit no argument to the question as to whether my seat should be declared vacant excepting to say that it may be well doubted that the language contained in section 6 of the Constitution of the United States—"and no person holding any office of the United States shall become a Member of either House during his continuance in office"—was intended to cover the cases in the hands of the committee for consideration. No injury has resulted to my constituency or to the Government by reason of my service in the Army, nor has such service impaired in any way my service as a Member of Congress. Constitutional restrictions are intended, as I understand them, to be invoked only to prevent injustice or wrong, and not in cases of this character, where a patriotic impulse might well be given some play.

Very truly, yours,

DAVID G. COLSON.

Joint resolution (Public resolution, No. 51) to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States.

Whereas the Government of the Republic of Hawaii having, in due form, signified its consent, in the manner provided by its constitution, to cede absolutely and without reserve to the United States of America all rights of sovereignty of whatsoever kind in and over the Hawaiian Islands and their dependencies, and also to cede and transfer to the United States the absolute fee and ownership of all public, Government, or Crown lands, public buildings or edifices, ports, harbors, military equipment, and all other public property of every kind and description belonging to the Government of the Hawaiian Islands, together with every right and appurtenance thereunto appertaining: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That said cession is accepted, ratified, and confirmed, and that the said Hawaiian Islands and their dependencies be, and they are hereby, annexed as a part of the territory of the United States and are subject to the sovereign dominion thereof, and that all and singular the property and rights hereinbefore mentioned are vested in the United States of America.

The existing laws of the United States relative to public lands shall not apply to such lands in the Hawaiian Islands; but the Congress of the United States shall enact special laws for their management and disposition: Provided, That all revenue from or proceeds of the same, except as regards such part thereof as may be used or occupied for the civil, military, or naval purposes of the United States, or may be assigned for the use of the local government, shall be used solely for the benefit of the inhabitants of the Hawaiian Islands for educational and other public purposes.

Until Congress shall provide for the government of such islands all the civil, judicial, and military powers exercised by the officers of the existing government in said islands shall be vested in such person or persons and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct; and the President shall have power to remove said officers and fill the vacancies so occasioned.

The existing treaties of the Hawaiian Islands with foreign nations shall forthwith cease and determine, being replaced by such treaties as may exist, or as may be hereafter concluded, between the United States and such foreign nations. The municipal legislation of the Hawaiian Islands, not enacted for the fulfillment of the treaties so extinguished, and not inconsistent with this joint resolution nor contrary to the Constitution of the United States nor to any existing treaty of the United States, shall remain in force until the Congress of the United States shall otherwise determine.

Until legislation shall be enacted extending the United States customs laws and regulations to the Hawaiian Islands the existing customs relations of the Hawaiian Islands with the United States and other countries shall remain unchanged.

The public debt of the Republic of Hawaii, lawfully existing at the date of the passage of this joint resolution, including the amounts due to depositors in the Hawaiian Postal Savings Bank, is hereby assumed by the Government of the United States; but the liability of the United States in this regard shall in no case exceed $4,000,000. So long, however, as the existing Government and the present commercial relations of the Hawaiian Islands are continued as hereinbefore provided said Government shall continue to pay the interest on said debt.

There shall be no further immigration of Chinese into the Hawiian Islands, except upon such conditions are are now or may hereafter be allowed by the laws of the United States; and no Chinese, by reason of anything herein contained, shall be allowed to enter the United States from the Hawaiian Islands.

The President shall appoint five commissioners, at least two of whom shall be residents of the Hawaiian Islands, who shall, as soon as reasonably practicable, recommend to Congress such legislation concerning the Hawaiian Islands as they shall deem necessary or proper.

SEC. 2. That the commissioners hereinbefore provided for shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 3. That the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be immediately available, to be expended at the discretion of the President of the United States of America, for the purpose of carrying this joint resolution into effect.

Approved, July 7, 1898.

An act (Public, No. 146) authorizing the appointment of a nonpartisan commission to collate information and to consider and recommend legislation to meet the problems presented by labor, agriculture, and capital.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a commission is hereby created, to be called the "Industrial Commission," to be composed as follows: Five Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the Presiding Officer thereof; five Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker, and nine other persons, who shall fairly represent the different industries and employments, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of this commission to investigate questions pertaining to immigration, to labor, to agriculture, to manufacturing, and to business, and to report to Congress and to suggest such legislation as it may deem best upon these subjects.

SEC. 3. That it shall furnish such information and suggest such laws as may be made a basis for uniform legislation by the various States of the Union, in order to harmonize conflicting interests and to be equitable to the laborer, the employer, the producer, and the consumer.

SEC. 4. That the commission shall give reasonable time for hearings, if deemed necessary, and if necessary it may appoint a subcommission or subcommissions of its own members to make investigation in any part of the United States, and it shall be allowed actual necessary expenses for the same. It shall have the authority to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths and affirmations. All necessary expenses, including clerks, stenographers, messengers, rent for place of meeting, and printing and stationery, shall be paid from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; however, not to exceed $50,000 per annum for expenditures under this section.

SEC. 5. That it may report from time to time to the Congress of the United States, and shall at the conclusion of its labors submit a final report.

SEC. 6. That the term of the commission shall be two years. The salary of each member of this commission appointed by the President shall be $3,600 per annum. Each member of the commission shall be allowed actual traveling expenses.

SEC. 7. That any vacancies occurring in the commission by reason of death, disability, or from any other cause shall be filled by appointment by the officer and in the same manner as was the member whose retirement from the commission creates the vacancy. That in case the term of a Senator or Representative expires while a member of this commission, said Senator or Representative shall not thereby cease to be a member of said commission, but shall serve until the expiration of the term for which he was appointed, drawing pay from the time his term as Senator or Representative expires at the same salary as those members of the commission appointed by the President of the United States.

SEC. 8. That a sum sufficient to carry out the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, June 18, 1898.

[PUBLIC—NO. 131.]

An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899.

SEC. 5. That a commission consisting of the chairmen of the Committees on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate and House of Representatives, and three Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker, is hereby created to investigate the question whether or not excessive prices are paid to the railroad companies for the transportation of the mails and as compensation for postal-car service, and all sources of revenue and all expenditures of the Postal Service, and rates of postage upon all postal matter.

Said commission is authorized to employ experts to aid in the work of inquiry and examination; also to employ a clerk and stenographer and such other clerical assistance as may be necessary, said experts and clerks to be paid such compensation as the said commission may deem just and reasonable.

The Postmaster General shall detail, from time to time, such officers and employees as may be requested by said commission in its investigation.

For the purposes of the investigation, said commission is authorized to send for persons and papers, and, through the chairman of the commission or the chairman of any subcommittee thereof, to administer oaths and to examine witnesses and papers respecting all matters pertaining to the duties of said commission, and to sit during the recess of Congress.

Said commission shall, on or before February 1, 1899, make report to Congress, which report shall embrace the testimony and evidence taken in the course of the investigation, also the conclusions reached by said commission on the several subjects examined, and any recommendations said commission may see proper to make by bill or otherwise with a view of correcting any abuses or deficiencies that may be found to exist.

The sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the necessary expenses of said commission, such payments to be made on the certificate of the chairman of said commission.

Any vacancy occurring in the membership of said commission, by resignation or otherwise, shall be filled by the presiding officer of the Senate or House, respectively, according as the vacancy occurs in the Senate or House representation on said committee.

SEC. 6. That if the revenues of the Post Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by this act, a sum equal to such deficiency of the revenues of said department is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply said deficiencies in the revenues for the Post Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1899.

Approved, June 13, 1898.

Subsequently, on February 1, 1899, Gen. Wheeler filed the following supplemental brief:

"Mr. Bailey and his friends are trying to rest this question upon precedents: On July 12, 1861, Mr. Vallandigham raised a similar question with regard to those Members of Congress who held commissions in the United States Army. The House refused to even consider it, and the motion to table his resolution was carried by an aye-and-nay vote, 92 votes being cast for tabling and 51 against it, many Democrats voting to table the resolution. This precedent is found on pages 92 and 93, volume 45, Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-seventh Congress."

The resolution is as follows:

"Whereas it is rumored that Gilman Marston, of New Hampshire; James E. Kerrigan, of New York; Edward McPherson and Charles J. Biddle, of Pennsylvania; and Samuel R. Curtis, of Iowa, holding seats in this House as Members thereof, have been sworn into the military service of the United States, and hold military offices under the authority of the same; and

"Whereas James H. Campbell, of Pennsylvania, also holding a seat in this House as a Member thereof, has admitted upon the floor of this House that he has been so sworn and does so hold office as aforesaid: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Committee on Elections be instructed to inquire, and without unnecessary delay to report, whether the gentlemen above named, or any others claiming or holding seats as Members of this House, and at the same time holding any military office under the authority of the United States, are constitutionally disqualified to be Members of this House by holding such military offices."

The only time that the House has ever acted upon such a case since that time was the case of Hon. Frank Blair, who, from August 7, 1862, to April 23, 1864, was alternately doing duty as a general and performing duties as a Member of the House. On April 23, after actively doing his duties in the House for some months, he left the House, bade his friends good-by, and took command of an Army corps in Georgia. This was regarded as abandoning his seat in the House, and on June 11 a resolution was passed that he has forfeited his seat. No opposition whatever was made to this by Mr. Blair or any of his friends.

43 Since the hearing of January 24, 1899, a letter has been received from Hon. James R. Campbell, which is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS NINTH ILLINOIS, CAMP COLUMBIA,
Havana, Cuba, January 23, 1899.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON,
Chairman Judiciary Committee,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your very kind invitation to appear before your committee, and either orally or in writing submit authorities bearing on House resolution No. 354, will say that my duties here with my regiment make it impossible for me to appear in person, and as my library at this place is very limited, being confined to the Army Regulations, infantry drill book, firing regulations, guard manual, and a few works on the art of war, it is impossible for me to refer you to such authorities as might enable you and the other members of the committee in arriving at a correct conclusion. Besides this, I feel somewhat indifferent as to taking any action personally in the matter, as I am sure the committee has no feeling against me and that any conclusion that you might arrive at will be from a high sense of duty as Representatives and not in any way personal to me.

In conclusion I might say that I have a fine regiment of over 1,200 men, all from my congressional district, and we have a beautiful camp overlooking the Gulf, surrounded with magnificent plantations, which makes it a delightful winter resort.

We have but little sickness, and all are in good spirits and contented.

If any of your committee should visit Cuba after the adjournment of Congress, I will be greatly pleased to offer you the hospitality of our camp.

Yours, very respectfully,

JAMES R. CAMPBELL,
Colonel, Ninth Illinois Volunteers.

The authority for the appointment of the Canadian commission is found in sections 3 and 4 of the act approved July 24, 1897, Statutes of the United States of America, passed at the first session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, 1897, pages 203, 204, and 205; also in pursuance of a provision in the act of July 7, 1898, page 571, an act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for prior years, and for other purposes. Said provision is as follows:

"Canadian Commission: For the expense on the part of the United States of a joint commission to be appointed for the adjustment of differences between the United States and Great Britain in respect to the Dominion of Canada, including the compensation of the commissioners representing the United States, the pay of expert service for preparation of papers, for the portion of joint expenses chargeable to the United States, for printing, and all other incidental expenses, to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of State, $50,000, to remain available during the fiscal year 1899."

In pursuance of the foregoing law and a provision in the deficiency appropriation bill, Hon. Sereno E. Payne has been appointed by the President, has qualified, and is acting as a member of the Canadian Commission.

In this connection it is proper to insert here a letter from the Secretary of the Senate in answer to an inquiry in regard to the Canadian Commission:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 2, 1899.

Gen. D. B. HENDERSON, Chairman, etc.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry of the present instant, I beg to say the members of the Canadian Commission were not sent to the Senate for confirmation. It appears their appointment required no action on the part of the Senate.

Very respectfully,

WM. R. COX,
Secretary.

A further fact may be stated, that the names of the Hawaiian commissioners, including that of Hon. R. R. Hitt, of the House, were 44 sent by the President to the Senate, but no action has been taken thereon and they have not been confirmed.

The committee also considered the matter of the appointment of committees to visit the Naval and Military Academies, and of the regents and trustees of institutions in the District of Columbia belonging to the United States where said committees, regents, and trustees were Members of Congress.

Facts found in the case of Joseph Wheeler.

The Committee found the following facts in the case of Hon. Joseph Wheeler:

The committee finds that Joseph Wheeler, a duly qualified Representative in this Congress from the eighth district of Alabama, was on the 6th day of May, A. D. 1898, while acting as such Representative, commissioned by the President of the United States as major general of Volunteers in the United States Army, and that on the 6th day of May, A. D. 1898, he accepted such commission and was then duly mustered into the military service of the United States as such major general of Volunteers, and still continues in such service.

Facts found in the case of Hon. James R. Campbell.

The committee found the following facts in the case of Hon. James R. Campbell:

That James R. Campbell, a duly qualified Representative in this Congress from the twentieth district of Illinois, was, on the 28th day of June, A. D. 1898, while acting as such Representative, commissioned by the governor of the State of Illinois as colonel of the Ninth Regiment of Illinois Infantry Volunteers, for service in the war between the United States and the Kingdom of Spain; that he accepted said office, and was, on the 11th day of July, A. D. 1898, mustered into the service of the United States as such colonel, and still continues in such service.

Facts found in the case of Hon. David G. Colson.

The committee found the following facts in the case of Hon. David G. Colson:

That David G. Colson, a duly qualified Representative in this Congress from the eleventh district of Kentucky, was, on the 27th day of July, A. D. 1898, while acting as such Representative, commissioned by the governor of the State of Kentucky as colonel of the Fourth Kentucky Infantry Volunteers, for service in the war between the United States and the Kingdom of Spain; that he accepted said office, and was, on the 27th day of July, A. D. 1898, mustered into the service of the United States as such colonel, and that he still continues in such service.

Facts found in the case of Hon. Edward E. Robbins.

The committee found the following facts in the case of Hon. Edward E. Robbins:

That Edward E. Robbins, a duly qualified Representative in this Congress from the twenty-first district of Pennsylvania, was, on the 21st day of June, A. D. 1898, while acting as such Representative, duly commissioned by the President of the United States as captain 45 and quartermaster of Volunteers in the military service of the United States, and that afterwards, on the 1st day of July, A. D. 1898, he accepted such office and entered upon the discharge of its duties; that afterwards, on the 19th day of August, A. D. 1898, he was promoted to major and quartermaster of Volunteers, and duly commissioned as such by the President and mustered into the military service of the United States as such major and quartermaster of Volunteers, which he thereupon accepted and entered upon the discharge of the duties thereof, and so continued until the 14th day of October, A. D. 1898, when he was honorably discharged and mustered out of said service.

The investigations of the committee justify the statement that no compensation was received by the Members of the House who were on the Hawaiian, the Canadian, the Postal, or the Industrial Commissions, and also that regents and trustees of Federal institutions served without compensation.

46. ACTION OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

The part of the Constitution of the United States which must be considered in discussing these important questions is as follows:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office." (Art I, sec. 6, clause 2, Constitution of the United States.)

It may be interesting as well as instructive in this discussion to follow the consideration and treatment of the subject by the framers of the Constitution. After the Constitutional Convention was organized Mr. Randolph opened up with a discussion of the work before the great convention. He pointed out by a series of resolutions what he thought were necessary in a new Constitution. The fourth resolution suggested by him, and having reference to the Senate, is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Members of the first branch of the National Legislature ought to be elected by the people of the several States every ——— for the term of ———; to be of the age of ——— years at least; to receive liberal stipends by which they may be compensated for the devotion of their time to the public service; to be ineligible to any office established by a particular State, or under the authority of the United States, except those peculiarly belonging to the functions of the first branch, during the term of service, and for the space of ——— after its expiration; to be incapable of reelection for the space of ——— after the expiration of their term of service, and to be subject to recall."

Then follows the fifth resolution relating to the House, which is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Members of the second branch of the National Legislature ought to be elected by those of the first, out of a proper number of persons nominated by the individual legislatures, to be of the age of ——— years at least; to hold their offices for a term sufficient to ensure their independency; to receive liberal stipends, by which they may be compensated for the devotion of their time to the public service; and to be ineligible to any office established by a particular State, or under the authority of the United States, except those peculiarly belonging to the functions of the second branch, during the term of service; and for the space of ——— after the expiration thereof." (The Madison Papers, vol. 2, pp. 731, 732.)

These propositions, with others, were referred to the Committee of the Whole. Mr. Pinckney then laid before the House the draft of a Federal Government which he had prepared. A part of article 5 of Mr. Pinckney's proposition was as follows:

"The Members of each House shall not be eligible to, or capable of holding, any office under the Union during the time for which they have been respectively elected, nor the Members of the Senate for one year after." (Art. V, p. 739, vol. 2, The Madison Papers.)

Mr. Pinckney's draft of the proposed Constitution was also referred to the Committee of the Whole to consider the state of the American Union. When the Committee of the Whole rose Mr. Gorman made a report from the committee, in which, among other things, were the following resolutions:

"No. 3. Resolved, That the Members of the first branch of the National Legislature ought * * * to be ineligible to any office established by a particular State or under the authority of the United States (except those peculiarly belonging to the functions of the first branch) during the term of service and under the National Government for the space of one year after its expiration.

"No. 4. Resolved, That the Members of the second branch of the National Legislature ought * * * to be ineligible to any office established by a particular State or under the authority of the 47 United States (except those peculiarly belonging to the functions of the second branch) during the term of service and under the National Government for the space of one year after its expiration." (The Madison Papers, vol. 2, pp. 858–849.)

A committee on detail, which was appointed to consider the work of the convention, had referred to them, among other things, the following:

"3. Resolved, That the Members of the first branch of the Legislature ought * * * to be ineligible to, and incapable of holding, any office under the authority of the United States (except those peculiarly belonging to the functions of the first branch) during the term of service of the first branch.

"4. Resolved, That the Members of the second branch of the Legislature of the United States ought * * * to be ineligible to, and incapable of holding, any office under the authority of the United States (except those peculiarly belonging to the functions of the second branch) during the term for which they are elected, and for one year thereafter." (The Madison Papers, vol. 2, p. 1221.)

Subsequently the committee on detail reported, through Mr. Rutledge, chairman, a form of a constitution, a part of which was as follows:

"SEC. 9. The Members of each House shall be ineligible to, and incapable of holding, any office under the authority of the United States during the time for which they shall respectively be elected; and the Members of the Senate shall be ineligible to, and incapable of holding, any such office for one year afterwards." (The Madison Papers, vol. 2, p. 1230.)

Subsequently a committee of 11 was appointed, to which was referred such parts of the Constitution as had been postponed and such parts as had not been acted on. This committee of 11, through its chairman, Mr. Brearly, reported, among other things, the following:

"That in lieu of article 6, section 9, the words following be inserted, viz: 'The Members of each House shall be ineligible to any civil office under the authority of the United States during the time for which they shall respectively be elected; and no person holding an office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office.'" (The Madison Papers, vol. 3, p. 1479.)

The report of the committee of 11, as amended and agreed to, was as follows:

"The Members of each House shall be ineligible to any civil office under the authority of the United States, created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during the time for which they shall respectively be elected; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office." (The Madison Papers, vol. 3, p. 1485.)

Subsequently a committee of style and arrangement was appointed to arrange the style of the Constitution, and in its report is found the following:

"Article I, section 6, clause 2: No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office." (The Madison Papers, vol. 3, pp. 1547, 1548.)

In the form just given it was finally incorporated into the Constitution of the United States.

From the debates during the consideration of the foregoing questions and up to the final selection of Article I, section 6, clause 2, it is evident that the framers of the Constitution were determined to separate as far as possible the executive from the legislative departments of the Government. This purpose is all the more emphasized when we observe that they felt and observed the difficulty of getting able men for Congress who had not been officers in the American Army. Many thought that the young Republic would be crippled in a sense by preventing the Members of Congress holding commissions in the Army, but notwithstanding this difficulty incident to our youth as a country the final judgment of Congress culminated in the provisions of the Constitution as we have them now.

48 MEMBERS OF COMMISSIONS, ETC.

While it may be admitted that all of the commissions, examining boards, regents, etc., considered by the committee, do differ in many particulars as to their duties, still the legal principles involved in the consideration of this class of public servants apply to all of them, and therefore they will be considered together in discussing the law in respect to them.

It can not be contended that every position held by a Member of Congress is an office within the meaning of the Constitution, even though the term office may usually be applied to many of these positions. We are therefore led to an analysis and discussion of the word "office."

The chairman of a committee of Congress is in one sense an officer holding a position different from other members of the committee. Marks of honor and distinction are given to Members of Congress in many ways, but all incident to or growing out of their position as a Member of Congress. It is a mark of distinction to be selected as members of escorts to those of our number who die; designations are made of committees to notify the Senate and the President of certain matters. The mind will readily run over a list of many positions of trust and honor that are conferred upon Members of Congress where no pretense will be made that they are offices within the meaning of the Constitution.

In United States v. Hartwell (6 Wallace, 393) it is laid down that "an office is a public station or employment conferred by the appointment of Government. The term embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties."

Elsewhere it is held that an office is "an employment on behalf of the Government, in any station or public trust, not merely transient, occasional, or incidental." (20 John., Rep. 492, 7th Ohio State, 556.)

A careful consideration of all of the positions above referred to will show that they are merely transient, occasional, or incidental in their nature, and none of them possess the elements of duration, tenure, or emolument. All of these appointees were but instruments to procure detailed information for the better information and guidance of Congress and are wholly lacking in the essential elements of an office within the meaning of the Constitution.

"A public office is the right, authority, and duty, created and conferred by law, by which for a given period, either fixed by law or enduring at the pleasure of the creating power, an individual is invested with some portion of the sovereign functions of the Government to be exercised by him for the benefit of the public." (Mechem's Public Offices and Officers, sec. 1; Matter of Hathaway, 71 N. Y., 238–243; 3 Greenleaf (Me.), 481; Public Officers, Throop, sec. 6; Olmstead v. The Mayor, etc., 42 N. Y., Sup. Ct., 481.)

It has been held that these functions must be either legislative, executive, or judicial, and that to constitute the person an officer he must have conferred upon him either legislative, executive, or judicial powers. (Mechem's Public Offices, sec. 4, and cases cited.)

Says the author:

"SEC. 4. Office involves delegation of sovereign functions. The most important characteristic which distinguishes an office from an employment or contract is that the creation and conferring of an 49 office involves a delegation to the individual of some of the sovereign functions of government, to be exercised by him for the benefit of the public; that some portion of the sovereignty of the country, either legislative, executive, or judicial, attaches, for the time being, to be exercised for the public benefit. Unless the powers conferred are of this nature, the individual is not a public officer."

This involves necessarily the power to (1) legislate; or (2) execute law; or (3) hear and determine, judicially, questions submitted.

Therefore, mere power to investigate some particular subject and report thereon, or to negotiate a treaty of peace, or on some commercial subject, and report without power to make binding on the Government, does not constitute a person an officer.

"It (public office) implies a delegation of a portion of the sovereign power to, and the possession of it by, the person filling the office; and the exercise of such power within legal limits constitutes the correct discharge of the duties of such office." (3 Greenleaf (Me.), 481; Mechem's Pub. Office, etc., sec. 2; Olmstead v. The Mayor, 42 N. Y. Sup. Ct., 481; Public Officers, Throop, sec. 6.)

Again, the employment must not be merely transient, occasional, or incidental.

In United States v. Hartwell (6 Wall., 385) the court held that the term public office embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties, and that the duties were continuing and permanent, not occasional or temporary.

In United States v. Germaine (99 U. S. Sup. Ct., 508) the question of who is or who is not a public officer was again up, and the court said:

"If we look to the nature of defendant's employment we think it equally clear that he is not an officer. In that case (referring to United States v. Hartwell) the court said the term embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties, and that the latter were continuing and permanent, not occasional or temporary. In the case before us the duties are not continuing and permanent, and they are occasional and intermittent. * * * He is required to keep no place of business for the public use. He gives no bond and takes no oath, unless by some order of the Commissioner of Pensions of which we are not advised. * * * He is but an agent of the commissioner, appointed by him, and removable by him at his pleasure, to procure information needed to aid in the performance of his own official duties. * * * There is no penalty for his absence from duty or refusal to perform, except his loss of the fee in the given case."

The duties of the commissioners appointed under the statutes (to which attention will be called) are not continuing or permanent; they have no place of business for the public use, or even for their own use; they give no bond and take no oath. In fact, they are mere agents appointed by direction of Congress for the purpose of gathering information and making recommendations for its use if the Congress sees fit to avail themselves of the labors of the commission. The commissioners appointed under these statutes or resolutions can not be compelled to attend or act, and in the broadest sense they are mere agents of the Congress. These commissioners are not to execute any standing laws which are the rules of action and the guardians of rights, nor have they the right or power to make any such law, nor can they interpret or enforce any existing law.

Under a statute of Maine the governor was authorized "to appoint one or more agents for the preservation of timber on the public lands, and for other purposes," and the judges held that these agents were not a civil office of profit under the State, although they were entitled to compensation. (See 3 Greenleaf Reports (Me.), p. 481.)

In United States v. Hendee (124 U. S., 309) it was held that a paymaster's clerk in the Navy is an officer of the Navy, and in United States v. Mouat (124 U. S., 303) it was held that such paymaster's clerk, appointed by a paymaster in the Navy, with the approval of the Sec-
50 retary of the Navy, is not an officer of the Navy in the sense that he is an officer of the United States.

The constitution of the State of New York, 1846, article 6, section 8, prohibits the judges of the court of appeals and justices of the supreme court from exercising any power of appointment to public office.

Section 16, chapter 280, laws of 1847, conferred upon the chancellor power to issue a commission to some person empowering him to act as a surrogate in a particular case when by reason of statutory disqualifications the officers designated to act could not do so. It was contended that such person when designated to act as surrogate became a public officer, inasmuch as for the time being and in the matter before whom he was to act as a judicial officer, with full power to hear, try, and determine the particular case, but the court of appeals In matter of Hathaway (71 N. Y., 23) held:

"The term 'public office' as used in the constitution has respect to a permanent public trust or employment, to be exercised generally and in all proper cases. It does not include the appointment, to meet special exigencies, of an individual to perform transient, occasional, or incidental duties, such as are ordinarily performed by public officers; as to such appointments the legislature is left untrammeled and at liberty to invest the courts with power to make them." (Church, Ch. J., Andrews and Miller, J., dissenting.)

In Hall v. State (39 Wis., 79), chapter 40, laws of 1857, appointed certain-named persons "commissioners to make a geological, mineralogical, and agricultural survey of the State," and provided that such commissioners should arrange and distribute the functions of such survey by mutual agreement. The law provided a salary and provided for filling vacancies, and gave the governor power to remove any member for incompetency or neglect of duty. The court held that these commissioners were officers. The court said:

"The geological survey commissioners were appointed directly by the legislature; no specific term of office was fixed (except by the governor, whose power to do so may well be doubted); provision was made by law for removing them for cause and for filling vacancies; their salaries were paid out of the State treasury, and their functions were not of merely private, local, or temporary concern, but related to the material and permanent interests of the whole State. The duty imposed upon them was an important public trust, to be exercised for the benefit of all the people of the State, and could only be discharged properly by gentlemen of high attainments in physical science. * * * It may safely be asserted that any person charged by law with the performance of public functions affecting the general interests of society, especially if he be elected thereto by the people or appointed directly by the legislature, and who receives his compensation out of the public treasury, is a public officer, and as such can have no vested right in his office, unless secured by the constitution. * * * It may be difficult to draw the exact line between an office and a mere service or employment, but, as already observed, when public functions are conferred by law upon certain persons elected by the people or appointed by the legislature, if those functions concern the general interests of the State and are not of a nature merely local or temporary, such persons are public officers, especially if they are paid a salary for their services out of the public treasury."

In re Corliss (11 R. I., 638) the question was up whether the office of a commissioner of the United States Centennial Commission is an office of trust under Article II, section 1, of the Constitution of the United States, and it was held that he was such an officer. The law creating that commission provided "for the holding of an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures, under the auspices of the Government of the United States," and the functions of such commissioners were to continue until the close of the exhibition, and their duties were "to prepare and superintend the execution of a plan for holding the exhibition." By the act of Congress approved June 1, 1872, 51 the duties and functions of the commission were further increased and defined, and a corporation was created called "The Centennial Board of Finance," to cooperate with the commission and to raise and disburse the funds. It was to be organized under the direction of the commission. The commission was also to adopt plans for the erection of buildings, and the corporation created was to erect them in accordance with these plans.

The act also provided that the commission should "have power to control, change, or revoke all such grants, and shall appoint all judges and examiners and award all premiums." The commission was also "to supervise the closing up of the affairs of said corporation, to audit its accounts, and submit in a report to the President of the United States the financial results of the centennial exhibition." The act also provided "no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act from the Treasury of the United States." The only other officers provided for by the act were alternates to serve as commissioners when the commissioners were unable to attend.

The court properly held that these commissioners were officers of the United States. They were certainly vested with sovereign functions of the Government, which were to be exercised by them for the benefit of each and every State in the Union and for the benefit of all the people of the United States.

In Bunn v. The People (45 Ill., 397), the court held:

"A person employed for a special and single object, in whose employment there is no enduring element, nor designed to be, and whose duties when completed, although years may be required for their performance, ipso facto terminates the employment, is not an officer in the sense in which that term is used in the constitution of Illinois."

In re Attorneys, etc. (20 Johnson, N. Y.), the court defines the legal meaning of the term "office" to be "an employment on behalf of the Government in any station or public trust not merely transient, occasional, or incidental."

In matter of Hathaway (71 N. Y., 238–243) the court said:

"'Public office,' as used in the Constitution, has respect to a permanent trust to be exercised in behalf of the Government, or of all citizens who may need the intervention of a public functionary or officer, and in all matters within the range of the duties pertaining to the character of the trust. It means a right to exercise generally and in all proper cases the functions of a public trust or employment."

In McArthur v. Nelson (81 Ky., 67) the question was up as to whether certain commissioners were district officers, and the case says:

"The first section of the act authorizes the judge of the circuit court to appoint three commissioners, residents of the district, who shall hold their office at the will and pleasure of the judge. It is made the duty of the commissioners to have the courthouse constructed, at a cost not exceeding $50,000, and to enable them to raise this money they are authorized to issue bonds, with coupons attached, bearing interest at 5 per cent, payable semiannually; and to redeem the bonds and pay the interest they are further empowered to levy an annual tax on the real and personal property in the district, not exceeding 12 cents on the $100, etc. * * * They are not district officers within the meaning of section 10 of article 6 of the constitution, but are the mere agents for the district, required by the act to discharge certain duties with reference to the building of the courthouse, and when those duties end their employment terminates."

In United States v. Germain (99 U. S., 508), the question as to who are and who are not officers of the United States was quite fully considered. Under section 4777 of the Revised Statutes, United States, it is provided:

"That the Commissioner of Pensions be, and he is hereby, empowered to appoint, at his discretion, civil surgeons to make the periodi-52 cal examinations of pensioners which are or may be required by law and to examine applicants for pensions where he shall deem an examination by a surgeon appointed by him necessary; and the fee for such examinations and the requisite certificates thereof in duplicate, including postage on such as are transmitted to pension agents, shall be $2, which shall be paid by the agent for paying pensions in the district within which the pensioner or claimant resides out of any money appropriated for the payment of pensions, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe."

It was held in the case cited that the appointees under this statute are not officers of the United States, but mere agents of the Commissioner of Pensions.

It is perfectly clear, therefore, that the commissioners appointed under the act approved July 7, 1898, "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for prior years, and for other purposes," the resolution approved July 7, 1898 (Public Resolution No. 51), entitled "Joint resolution to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States," and the act approved June 18, 1898, entitled "An act authorizing the appointment of a nonpartisan commission to collate information and to consider and recommend legislation to meet the problems presented by labor, agriculture, and capital," are not persons "holding any office under the United States."

They are persons designated by authority of Congress to make certain investigations, inquiries, etc., or to conduct certain negotiations preliminary to and as a basis for possible action by the Congress of the United States or by one branch of it. They neither make law, execute law affecting the rights of the people, nor perform judicial functions. These commissioners are and are intended to be mere advisory agents of the Congress of the United States. Their investigations are confined to some particular matter or subject, and they are not required to take an oath of office. They have no power to decide any question or bind the Government or do any act affecting the rights of a single individual citizen.

If the House or Senate authorizes or directs the Speaker or President of the Senate, as the case may be, to appoint a special committee to investigate some particular matter or subject and report and recommend legislation, can it be claimed that an office is created or that the Members of the House or Senate appointed hold "an office?" Suppose the President of the United States is authorized to make the appointments. Does this create offices, and are the appointees "officers?"

The acts performed are for the information of the Congress, and it alone. Their suggestions and recommendations have no force; they may or may not be adopted. To make their suggestions or recommendations operative bills or resolutions must be introduced embodying the provisions recommended, or their substance, and these must be enacted into law. If a treaty is recommended by peace commissioners, it must be submitted to the Senate and by it ratified. The acts of such a commission do not bind the President, the Senate, or the Government. Then such commissioners neither make, execute, nor interpret law. They do not possess or exercise any of the sovereign power of the Government of the United States.

That the Senate may feel that it ought to ratify or approve the recommendations of such a commission can make no difference, the fact remains that their acts are not binding upon anyone or upon any departments of the Government.

If the Congress of the United States should see fit by joint resolution to authorize the President to appoint 10 persons as com-
53 missioners, whose duty it should be to investigate the condition of the people residing in Porto Rico and recommend laws suitable to their government, and should appropriate money to pay the expenses of the commission, would anyone contend that such commissioners, when appointed, would become other than mere agents of the Congress for the purposes specified? Would they possess or exercise legislative, executive, or judicial functions or powers? Such commissioners would possess the mere naked power to investigate and report, and their action would conclude no one, nor would they execute or interpret any law. Their action would not affect in the slightest degree the personal or property rights of a single citizen of the Republic. They would be answerable to no power for misconduct; they would be bound by no oath.

"The officer is distinguished from the employee," says Judge Cooley, "in the greater importance, dignity, and independence of his position; in being required to take an official oath, and perhaps to give an official bond; in the liability to be called to account as a public offender for misfeasance or nonfeasance in office, and usually, though not necessarily, in the tenure of his position."

Attorneys and counselors admitted to practice in the courts of the United States are not officers of the United States. (Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. (U. S.), 333; see also, In re Robinson, 131 Mass., 376.)

In People v. Nichols (52 N. Y., 478), one of the judges of the court of appeals was designated by statute as one of three persons to examine and report upon the genuineness and value of certain relics which the State proposed to purchase, and upon the certificate of these commissioners the purchase price was to be paid. The court held that this was not an office or a public trust within the meaning of the constitution of that State, which prohibits such judge from holding an office or public trust. Said the court: "It is very plain that the doing of such an act, a single act like this, is not within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition against holding any other office or public trust" (p. 485).

Applying these principles to what is known as the Postal Commission, the committee finds that those Members of the House of Representatives appointed or designated as commissioners under public act 131, "An act making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899," are not, nor are any of them, officers under the United States within the meaning of the Constitution.

In respect to the Industrial Commission, the committee finds that those Members of the House of Representatives appointed or designated as commissioners under public act No. 146, "An act authorizing the appointment of a nonpartisan commission to collate information and consider and recommend legislation to meet the problems presented by labor, agriculture, and capital," approved July 7, 1898, are not, nor are any of them, officers under the United States within the meaning of the Constitution.

In respect to the Canadian Commission, the committee finds that those Members of the House of Representatives appointed or designated as commissioners under public act No. 182—"An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and prior years, and for other purposes"—are not, nor are any of them, officers under the United States within the meaning of the Constitution.

In respect to the Hawaiian Commission, the committee finds that those Members of the House of Representatives appointed or 54 designated as commissioners under public resolution No. 51—"Joint resolution providing for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States"—are not, nor are any of them, officers under the United States within the meaning of the Constitution.

In respect to visitors to the Military Academy, etc., the committee finds that those Members of the House of Representatives appointed and designated as visitors to the Military Academy at West Point, to the Naval Academy at Annapolis, and the regents and directors and consulting trustees to the various public institutions in the District of Columbia and appointed by the Speaker of the House, are not, nor are any of them, officers under the United States within the meaning of the Constitution.

55 MEMBERS OF CONGRESS ACCEPTING COMMISSIONS IN THE UNITED STATES ARMY.

Before entering into a discussion of the law governing Members of Congress holding commissions in the United States Army, it is but due to the committee to say that it has approached the consideration of the questions involved with a delicacy growing out of their appreciation of the patriotic services tendered to their Government and rendered by these officers. Every opportunity has been given to them to be heard. The committee has proceeded with deliberation and care, and there is not a member of the Committee on the Judiciary but entertains the highest respect for the gentlemen interested. But the resolution was sent to this committee by a vote of the House, and it becomes our duty to consider and report to the House our findings of the law and fact governing these cases.

The most exhaustive treatment that has been given to these questions will be found in Report No. 110, Thirty-eighth Congress, first session, in the matter of the military appointment of Hon. F. P. Blair, jr., which is known as the "Dawes Report." The feeling of this committee can not be better expressed than by quoting a paragraph from that report:

"These questions are all of the gravest importance, and have ever been so considered whenever they have arisen. They affect seriously the privileges and the independence of the House, and can not be disregarded without trifling with both; and when the House of Representatives shall cease to guard its own privileges, and even its own independence, it will cease also to be worthy of a free people, and be fit only to be cast out."

The facts already found in this report clearly show that four Members of the present House of Representatives, after being duly elected, qualified, and acting as such, accepted commissions in the United States Army in the Spanish-American War, and acted in the Army as United States officers under such commissions.

Does a Representative in Congress, duly elected, vacate such office by accepting, during the term for which elected and after he has qualified as such, a commission, issued by the President, as an officer in the Army of the United States? is the practical question suggested by the inquiry directed by the House to be made by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question is not now presented for the first time, and we have, therefore, precedent, as well as the plain and unequivocal language of the Constitution, to guide us in answering the question propounded.

Section 6 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States provides as follows:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

A person holding a commission in the Army or Navy of the United States and not on the retired list is an officer of the United 56 States, and he holds that office under the United States. The office is created by law and filled by appointment of the President, when such appointment is confirmed by the Senate. Such a person is not, however, a civil officer—he does not hold a "civil office."

It follows that a person while holding the position of Senator or Representative in the Congress of the United States may be appointed to an office in the Army or Navy either created or the emoluments of which have been increased during the time for which he was elected, or to any office in that service.

(I Story on the Constitution, sections 791–792.)

The first prohibition relates solely to a "civil office." May such person accept such new office or any office under the United States and still hold his position as Representative in Congress?

It is evident that it was the policy of the framers of our Constitution to prohibit Senators and Representatives in Congress from creating civil offices or increasing the salaries pertaining to civil offices and then enjoying the fruits of their own work during the term for which they were elected. This provision removes, to some extent, the temptation to bad or unnecessary legislation by Members of Congress. It is true that they may vote to create a civil office or to increase the emoluments thereof and be appointed thereto after their term has expired, but the idea seems to have prevailed that a newly created office might, and probably would, be filled by the appointing power at once, or at least before the legislators creating it would be out of office and so situated as to accept its benefits or emoluments.

But the Constitution goes further and in the same connection declares that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House (of Congress) during his continuance in office." (The office held by him under the United States.)

The second prohibition relates to "any office" held under the United States, whether it be civil or military or naval. It is evident that the framers of the Constitution used the word "civil" understandingly and intentionally in the first prohibition and for the purpose of distinguishing civil offices from military and naval offices. It is also evident that the framers of the Constitution used the word "any" in the second prohibition intentionally and for the purpose of declaring that no Senator or Representative in Congress shall hold an office under the United States and at the same time "be a Member of either House" of Congress.

It has been suggested that it was the purpose of the framers of the Constitution to declare that a person shall not act as a Senator or Representative in Congress during the time he holds an office under the United States, and that the effect of the constitutional provision is to permit a Senator or Representative in Congress to hold his position as such Representative and at the same time hold, accept, and perform the duties of another office under the United States, his right to act in the first capacity being suspended while holding and performing the duties of the second.

Such a construction of this section of the Constitution imputes to its framers the inability to express their ideas with any clearness whatever. It is plainly declared that "no person shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office" if he holds any office under the United States. This language goes to the very existence of the individual as a Member of the Senate or House of Representatives while holding another office under the United States. Had suspension of the power to act been aimed at, apt words expressing the purpose would have been used. The words "act as" would have been 57 substituted for "be." "Be" means "to exist, have existence or being." Therefore the Constitution declares that no person holding any office under the United States shall exist or have existence or being, while in such office, as a Member of either House of Congress.

At the present time, when the patriotic impulses of our people have been so deeply stirred, it may seem unpatriotic to say this—to assert that a Member of this House may not accept a commission in the Army, go upon the field of battle and fight for his country, and still retain his seat in the House of Representatives; but the manifest dangers that would follow any other construction of the Constitution—even were any other construction possible—must make the meaning of the framers of that instrument plain, and no mere patriotic sentiment should be permitted to override the plain language of the fundamental written law.

Both Story and Rawle, in their able and admirable works on the Constitution, have accepted the language of the Constitution of the United States above quoted as prohibitory and without discussion have proceeded to point out the wisdom of the provision.

Rawle says, chapter 19:

"But although no reasons merely of a legal nature might be opposed to it, the impolicy of admitting such officers to compose a part of the legislature is exceedingly plain."

Again, he says:

"The public officer being therefore considered with us as having actual living duties which he is bound to perform, and as having no more time than is necessary to perform them, the Constitution expressly excludes him from a seat."

Story says, Volume I, section 869:

"The other part of the clause which disqualifies persons holding any office under the United States from being Members of either House during the continuance in office has been still more universally applauded and has been vindicated upon the highest grounds of public policy."

In section 871 he says:

"It is true that an acceptance of any office under the Crown is a vacation of a seat in Parliament. This is wise and secures the people from being betrayed by those who hold office and whom they do not choose to trust."

The Hon. James Wilson, LL. D., one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and professor of law in the college of Philadelphia (and also a signer of the Declaration of Independence and a member of the convention that framed the Constitution of the United States), in his lectures delivered in 1790–91 (I Wilson's Works, pp. 446–449) takes the same view of the Constitution, and after condemning in severe language the English practice of appointing members of Parliament to other offices under the Crown and then permitting them to be reelected to Parliament while holding such offices, says:

"The result is that a provision by which the members of the legislature will be precluded, while they remain such, from offices, finds, with great propriety, a place in the Constitution of the United States. In this important particular it has a decided superiority over the constitution of Great Britain."

This language, contemporaneous with the adoption of the Constitution itself, and coming from one of the framers of that instrument, is significant.

And see also Angell and Ames on Corporations, section 434, Wilcox on Municipal Corporations, section 617, in which the doctrine is distinctly laid down that "a resignation by implication may not only take place by an abandonment of the official duties, as before mentioned, but also by being appointed to and accepting a new office incompatible with the former one."

58 Again it is stated:

"It is a rule of general law that an officer who accepts another appointment inconsistent with the first is held to have thereby resigned the first." (Rawle on the Constitution, chap. 19, p. 184.)

And again we find the doctrine clearly laid down as follows:

"By force of the constitutional inhibition against the holding of two lucrative offices by the same person at the same time, the acceptance of and qualification for a second office incompatible with the precedent one ipso facto vacates the precedent office; and neither a quo warranto nor other amotion from the office thus vacated is necessary before the vacancy can be supplied." (Blencourt v. Parker, 27th Texas, 558; Rawle on the Constitution, chap. 19, p. 184.)

Clearly one accepting an office under the United States, he having previously qualified as a Member of Congress, vacates his seat by such acceptance, and there is no way that he can again hold a seat in Congress but through a reelection by the people and then again becoming qualified as a Member of Congress without the disqualification of holding another office under the United States.

Practical construction was given to this constitutional prohibition by the Seventh Congress of the United States. (Annals of Congress, 7th Cong., 2d sess., 1802–03, p. 297.)

In that case John P. Van Ness, of New York, after being elected to and while occupying a seat in the House of Representatives, accepted a commission and exercised the office of a major of militia in the District of Columbia under the authority of the United States. By a unanimous vote his seat was declared vacant. (See pp. 296, 352, 395.)

The same question has been raised since that time and directly passed upon by a vote in Congress.

The question was also passed upon by the Twenty-ninth Congress and again by the Thirty-seventh and Thirty-eighth Congresses.

Archibald Yell, of Arkansas, was elected to the Twenty-ninth Congress and took his seat. In July, 1846, he accepted a commission as colonel of volunteers authorized by act of Congress approved May 13, 1846. His commission was issued by the authorities of the State of Arkansas, but he and his command were mustered into the service of the United States and he came under the authority of the United States and drew his pay from the General Government. In December, 1846, Thomas W. Newton was elected to fill the vacancy alleged to exist by reason of said facts. Newton appeared and claimed the seat. Yell did not appear, neither did he formally resign. The committee reported the following:

"Resolved further, That Thomas W. Newton is entitled to a seat as a Member of this House from the State of Arkansas."

When it appeared that Mr. Yell had accepted his commission and been mustered into the service of the United States, all opposition to the resolution was withdrawn, and it was adopted. (See 1 Bartlett's Dig. Contested Elec. 1834–1865, 2d sess., 38th Cong., 92–97.)

In the Thirty-seventh Congress (2d sess., Apr., 1862) the case of Byington v. Vandever arose. Vandever was duly admitted to this seat, having been elected in 1860. Mr. Vandever raised a regiment of volunteers in the State of Iowa, pursuant to the act of Congress, and August 30, 1861, was appointed colonel of the Ninth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, being commissioned by the governor of Iowa, and September 24, 1861, he was mustered into the service of the United States and continued in such service thereafter, and was in the service when 59 the question was raised of his right to a seat, or whether he was a Member of the House.

The following resolution was reported and adopted without division:

"Resolved, That William Vandever has not been entitled to a seat as a Member of this House since he was mustered into the military service of the United States as colonel of the Ninth Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry, to wit, since the 24th day of September, A. D. 1861."

Mr. Dawes, in report 210, says this was afterwards reconsidered and postponed to a day certain, but never reached.

The debate, participated in by Mr. Dawes and Mr. Shellabarger, is interesting and instructive, and the case may be found in First Bartlett's Digest Contested Election Cases, 1834 to 1865, pages 395–400.

The question was again up in the case of Gen. Frank P. Blair, of Missouri (1st sess., 38th Cong.; see Report No. 110). Gen. Blair was elected in the fall of 1862. The Thirty-eighth Congress did not organize until December, 1863. Gen. Blair continued to hold his commission as major general in the Volunteer service of the United States and perform his duties as such commissioned officer after that date, and his seat was declared vacant, although he resigned his commission before taking his seat.

It appears that the question has been passed upon by the House itself as follows: Case of John P. Van Ness, Seventh Congress, second session; case of Archibald Yell, Twenty-ninth Congress; case of William Vandever, Thirty-seventh Congress; case of Frank P. Blair, Thirty-eighth Congress, first session.

In the House, incidentally through reports of committees: Case of Samuel Herrick, Fifteenth Congress, first session; case of Elias Earle, Fifteenth Congress, first session; case of George Mumford, Fifteenth Congress, first session; case of E. D. Baker, Twenty-ninth Congress, first session; case of Robert C. Schenck, Thirty-eighth Congress, first session.

In the Senate, report of Committee on the Judiciary: Case of Gen. James H. Lane, Thirty-seventh Congress.

The action has always been uniform and adverse to the proposition that a person may be a Member of either House of Congress (subsequent to its meeting) and an officer in the Army of the United States or in the Volunteer forces mustered into the service of the United States.

E. D. Baker, then of Illinois, afterwards Senator from Oregon and colonel in the Union Army, a Member of the Twenty-ninth Congress, accepted and exercised the office of colonel in the Volunteer service of the United States (War with Mexico), and drew his compensation as such. At the commencement of the controversy he resigned his seat, and no vote was taken. (See also Stanton v. Lane, vol. 6, S. Misc. Docs., 2d sess. 52d Cong.; "Compilation of Senate election cases," p. 180; 1st and 2d sess. 37th Cong., Cong. Globe, 1st sess., pp. 406 and 407, etc.)

The case of Stanton v. Lane was finally determined on two grounds: (1) The office of brigadier general did not exist when Lane was appointed, and (2) he resigned as such brigadier general before taking his seat in the Senate.

It may be claimed that an exception is found in the action of the Thirty-seventh Congress when on July 12, 1861, Mr. Vallandigham offered the following resolution:

"Whereas it is rumored that Gilman Marston, of New Hampshire; James E. Kerrigan, of New York; Edward McPherson and Charles J. Biddle, of Pennsylvania; and Samuel R. Curtis, of Iowa, holding seats in this Congress as Members thereof, have been sworn into the military service of the United States and hold military offices under the authority of the same; and

"Whereas James H. Campbell, of Pennsylvania, also holding a seat in this House as a Member thereof, has admitted upon the floor of this House that he has been so sworn and does so hold office as aforesaid: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Committee on Elections be instructed to inquire, and without unnecessary delay to report, whether the gentlemen above named, or any others claiming or holding seats as Members of this House and at the same time holding any military office under the authority of the United States, are constitutionally disqualified to be Members of this House by holding such military office."

This resolution upon its introduction was discussed and the facts denied, and on motion was laid on the table without being sent to the Committee on Elections or to any other committee. It was laid upon the table by a vote of 92 yeas to 51 nays, such gentlemen as Roscoe Conklin, Crittenden, Holman, Voorhees, and others voting in the negative. Nothing was settled, excepting that in the then temper of the House and country the House was determined not to allow Mr. Vallandigham's motion to be investigated either as to the law or the facts. If it settles anything it demonstrates what many will remember, that this was at a heated and exciting time in the history of our country, and the majority of the House was in no temper to receive suggestions from Mr. Vallandigham, who at that time was far from being in harmony, as many believed, with the burning patriotic sentiment of the country in the North. It should be borne in mind also that notwithstanding this action the same Congress, as shown in this report, laid down the doctrine that military officers of the United States could not at the same time be Members of the House.

It is evident that it was the policy of the framers of our Constitution to prohibit Senators and Representatives in Congress while remaining such from holding any other office under the United States, and no plainer language to declare the purpose could have been used than the words of the Constitution, viz: "No person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office." The framers of the Constitution intended to keep the legislative, judicial, and executive branches of our Government separate and distinct; to prevent Cabinet officers from being Members of Congress, and thereby giving undue power to the President and his immediate advisers; to prevent the centralization of power and office-holding power in a few hands; to prevent judges from acting at the same time as legislators and thus concentrating power in the courts; to avoid the manifold dangers to the existence and perpetuity of our free institutions and a representative government that would follow a concentration of the legislative and judicial or the legislative and executive (the military and naval power being a branch of the executive) in a few and the same hands.

Without this constitutional restraint it would be possible for a President and the Congress to act in collusion; for the Congress to create high military and naval positions without limit and for the President to fill these offices from the ranks of unscrupulous, unpatriotic, and ambitious Senators and Representatives in Congress (the Senate confirming as a matter of course), and as the President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, to thus concentrate all power in the hands of the executive branch of the Government. These military legislators might increase the Army, control the elections by the bayonet, and government by the people and for the people would end. Two printed lines in the Constitution of the United States has made all this impossible.

61 The 13 infant Colonies, subsequently the 13 original States of this Union, were dependencies of Great Britain, and in England a person holding a seat in the House of Commons at once vacates it by accepting any public office under the Crown. (1 Story on the Constitution, sec. 871.)

This had been the law of England for more than a hundred years prior to the Revolution. It is true, however, that persons holding such an office might be reelected to the House of Commons without vacating the office and then hold both at the same time. The evils and the alleged advantages of this system are many and have been ably pointed out by many writers. It is fair to presume that the framers of our Constitution carefully considered this question and inserted the language quoted for the express purpose of avoiding the abuses that had sprung up under the English system and of making our liberties the more secure.

So long as we keep the legislative, the judicial, and the executive departments of this Government separate and keep the legislative independent of the military and naval power, seeing to it that competent and patriotic men administer the affairs of each of these branches of Government, we may hope for national prosperity and to preserve our liberties and maintain good government. But when those who make the laws shall at the same time also interpret and execute them, or when those who make the laws hold high places in our Army and Navy, powerful branches of the executive, the lust of power may and probably will lead to encroachments upon the rights and liberty of the citizens, and our form of government will be at an end.

There would be no danger to the Republic in allowing the gentlemen whose seats are in question here to hold their places as Representatives in Congress and their commissions in the Army at the same time, but the question is one of law, and involves a principle of vast importance which must be met and decided without reference to individual cases.

If it be proper and constitutional for one general in the Army to hold the position of Senator or Representative in Congress at the same time, it is also lawful for the President to appoint every Senator and Representative in Congress to a high place in the Army and Navy, and the result would be to transform the National Legislature into a band of military officials, and, while there is no present danger that this will be done, it is easy to see, in the light of history, that this very danger was guarded against by the framers of the Constitution, who believed that the safety of the Republic depended upon the making of encroachments by the military upon the legislative powers impossible.

The result is and must be that the acceptance of an office in the Army under the United States by a Representative in Congress at once and by force of this constitutional provision vacates his position as such Representative and he ceases to be such. Such acceptance of office is per se equivalent to an absolute resignation of the seat in Congress. (See the numerous cases hereafter cited.)

As already stated, there is no prohibition upon the President in appointing Senators or Representatives in Congress to offices in the Army or Navy. It is evident that in times of war it may be necessary to create a large number of military and naval offices, and the public good and safety may demand that such offices be at once filled by men holding seats in the National Legislature. Soon after the close of our Civil War many of our most able, experienced, and distinguished generals, after being mustered out, were elected to Congress. Had 62 a war broken out with some foreign nation, and a large increase of the Army or Navy, or both, been made necessary, and had a score of important Army and naval positions been made necessary and created by the Congress, the public good and safety would have demanded the appointment of such men as Logan and Garfield to high military commands.

During the late war with Spain the appointments of Gen. Wheeler from the House of Representatives and of Gen. Sewell from the Senate to high offices in the Army were commended as wise and proper. It was, however, incumbent upon these gentlemen to elect whether they could best serve their country in its legislative halls or upon the field of battle, and he who accepted the position in the Army necessarily and, ipso facto, vacated his position as a Member of the Congress of the United States. (See cases cited hereafter.)

It may be said that there are many offices under the United States of little importance and carrying little or no pay, and that it can not be possible that the framers of the Constitution contemplated forbidding a Member of the National Legislature to hold one of these small offices. This is not the question. No line could be drawn between the large and the small offices. The principle declared was that a Member of the Congress of the United States shall not hold any office under the United States and retain his seat as a national legislator.

It will not do to say that the appointment of a Representative in Congress to an office under the United States and its acceptance by him merely operates to suspend the power of the legislator to act, for if so the President of the United States by collusion with the Congress might appoint a majority of the legislators chosen by the people to high offices, and thus destroy a quorum in the law-making body, and as the people would be powerless to elect others in their places, there being no vacancies, the power to enact laws for the protection of the people and the preservation of the Republic would be destroyed. Thus by indirection and collusion between the Executive and the legislative bodies might the destruction of the Republic be accomplished. In any event great inconvenience would result.

It may be politic and wise at times for some legislator skilled in military science to abandon the halls of Congress for the field, but when he does this his place should be filled by the people of his district or State, who have the right to be represented at all times by a living, acting Member. It was not intended by the framers of the Constitution that a congressional district or a State should go unrepresented while the elected Member or Senator, with the approval of the President and Senate, sees fit to absent himself and serve as a military or naval officer, or as a judge, or in some other office under the United States. The Senator or Representative in Congress is a representative of the people, and is elected by them to perform certain specified constitutional duties in their interest, and he has no right to enter some other public office under the United States and, even temporarily, abandon the performance of the duties of the position to which he was elected.

It is evident that our Constitution contemplates, and that public policy demands, that no Representative in Congress shall suspend by his own act, and without the consent of his constituents, his power and duty to act as their Representative during such time as he sees fit to serve in some other obtainable Government office. From a legal standpoint it is immaterial whether such action is taken from patriotic or selfish motives.

It may be argued that our executive and legislative bodies are composed of men too pure minded and patriotic to endanger the 63 Nation. This is undoubtedly true as matters now are, but once open the door, extend the temptations, and who can foresee the results?

It may be suggested that there is not an entire and complete severance of legislative and judicial or of legislative and executive powers, duties, and functions under the Constitution. This is true in a limited and restricted sense. The President of the United States must approve acts of the Congress before they become laws, unless passed over his veto, and, as he is to execute the laws, we have here the Executive taking part in the enactment of laws. So the President, heads of departments, and judges may openly suggest and recommend legislation. As the President is also the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, we find here a mild and modified blending of the legislative and military powers. But the President is not a member, even ex officio, of the legislative branch of the Government. So the Senate forms an integral part of the court for the trial of impeachments. Again, both the Senate and House act judicially in determining the rights of persons to seats in those bodies, respectively.

"All American constitutions, State and Federal, provide for the separation of the three great powers of government and their apportionment to distinct and independent departments of the Government.

"It is a fundamental maxim of political science, recognized and carried into effect in the Federal Constitution and the constitutions of all the States, that good government and the protection of rights require that the legislative, executive, and judicial powers should not be confided to the same person or body, but should be apportioned to separate and mutually independent departments of government.

"The idea of an apportionment of the powers of government and of their separation into three coordinate departments is not a modern invention. It was suggested by Aristotle in his treatise on politics and was not unfamiliar to the more advanced of the medieval jurists. But the importance of this division of power, with the principle of classification, were never fully apprehended in theory until Montesquieu gave to the world his great work on the Spirit of the Laws. Since then his analysis of the various powers of the state has formed part, as Maine says, of the accepted political doctrine of the civilized world. Montesquieu says:

"'In each State there are three sorts of power—the legislative power, executive power with relation to matters depending on international law, and executive power with relation to matters depending on the civil law. * * * The last is called judicial power. * * * If the legislative power is united in the same person or body of magistrates with the executive power, there is no liberty, for it is to be apprehended that the monarch, or the senate, as the case may be, will make tyrannical laws in order to execute them tyrannically. Neither is there any liberty if the judicial power is not separated from the legislative and the executive power. If it were joined with the legislative power there would be arbitrary authority over the life and liberty of the citizens, for the judge would be the lawmaker. If it were joined with the executive power, the judge would have the might of an oppressor. All would be lost if the same man, or the same body of chiefs, or of nobles, or of the people, exercised these three powers—that of making the laws, that of executing the public resolutions, and that of judging the crimes or controversies of individuals. The framers of our Constitution were strongly influenced by these opinions of the French jurist, to whose views in general they were disposed to pay great deference, as is fully apparent from the pages of the Federalist.'" (Black's Constitutional Law, sec. 51, p. 73; Sill v. Village of Corning, 15 N. Y., 297–303.)

It must be remembered that our Constitution was framed soon after the close of the Revolutionary War, during the exciting times of the French Revolution, and that it was the declared purpose of the founders of our Republic in establishing its system of government to establish and perpetuate by constitutional guaranties the rights and liberties of the citizen.

See debates where this very provision of the Constitution was discussed and adopted. (Compilation of Senate election cases, Senate Mis. Doc., 2d sess, 52d Cong. (vol. 6), pp. 13–19.)

We may well ask, and the inquiry is a pertinent one, who in this Republic desires to see a single Member of the National Legislature under the absolute command of the President of the United States? And who desires to see generals of the Army with the Army under their command and bound to implicit obedience, exercising power as legislators or clothed with the power to pass from the Army into Congress and from the Congress into the Army, exercising the powers of either position without reference to the will of the people, and only as the President might command?

It can not be that the framers of the Constitution wrote therein a provision so repugnant to the spirit prevailing in that body and among the people—a provision that might completely subordinate the legislative to the military power. In this country we do not fear an encroachment by the military upon the legislative power, because of this very provision, which makes it impossible for an officer in the military department to hold a place in the legislative, and for the further reason that the legislative body, by refusing to raise taxes or vote supplies or appropriate money, may absolutely cripple the military and naval organizations. But fill our legislative halls with Army officers or with those who may swing back and forth at their election, or, in some cases, place therein a small number, and a military despotism will in the end usurp the Government in fact, even if the name and form remain the same.

It may be suggested that military officers after being retired and placed on the retired list have been Members of Congress.

This is true, but it is settled law that persons on the retired list of the Army do not hold office under the United States in the constitutional sense. (People v. Duane, 121 N. Y., 367; In re Hathaway, 71 N. Y., 238; U. S. v. Hartwell, 6 Wall., 385; U. S. v. Germaine, 99 U. S., 508; U. S. v. Tyler, 105 U. S., 244.)

It may be contended that persons on the retired list of the Army do hold office under the United States, citing Badeau v. United States (130 U. S., 439), but this authority does not so hold. That case simply relates to salary under particular statutes.

These persons are still in the service but hold no office unless assigned to duty.

To hold an office under the United States the person must occupy a public station or employment conferred by the appointment of government; and it embraces tenure, duration, emoluments, and duties.

Says the court in 212 New York, page 373:

"It is difficult to conceive of the existence in this country of a military office without the power of command, the right of promotion, or the obligation to perform some duty."

And for the reason that retired Army officers are not entitled to promotion, do not perform duty, and exercise no command, it is held that when retired they cease to be officers.

It remains to consider what action, if any, is necessary on the part of the House of Representatives.

It is the settled and unquestioned law in England and the United States that—

"The appointment of a person to an office incompatible with one already held by him is valid, and he has a right to elect." (Angell and Ames on Corporations, 255.) "If he accepts, takes the oath, and enters on the duties of the second office, the first office is absolutely determined." (People v. Carrique, 2 Hill, 93; Rex v. Trelawney, 3 Burr, 1616 (opinion by Lord Mansfield); Milward v. Thatcher, 2 Term Rep. (Durnforth & East), 87; Gabriel v. Clark, Cro. In People v. Nostrand, supra, the court says:

"It is a settled rule that the acceptance of an incompatible office operates as a resignation of the incumbent of the office then held by him."

In People v. Kelly, supra, the court said:

"The moment he accepted the new office the old became vacant. His acceptance of the one was an absolute determination of his right to the other and left him no shadow of title, so that neither quo warranto nor a motion was necessary (citing cases). These cases also show that this would be so at common law and independent of the statute. * * * The office was and is as vacant as if Mr. O'Reilley had never been born; his removal is as complete as if caused by death. When he accepted the new office the other ceased to have an incumbent."

Says Angell and Ames on Corporations, first edition, 255:

"This is an absolute determination of the original office and leaves no shadow of title to the possessor; so that neither quo warranto nor a motion is necessary before another may be elected."

Said Parke, J., in Rex v. Patteson, supra:

"Where two offices are incompatible they can not be held together, is founded on the plainest principles of public policy, and has obtained from very early times."

This rule is not limited to corporate offices but extends both in principle and application to all public offices. (Dillon on Mun. Corp., 3d ed., sec. 227; Glover on Corp., 139.)

The whole question is somewhat fully discussed in McCrary on Elections (3d ed., secs. 302–904, inclusive).

Is the position or office of Representative in Congress incompatible with any other office under the United States?

The Constitution itself answers the question when it declares, "and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

This is a constitutional declaration that the two positions are incompatible. In the case of Stanton v. Lane (Compilation of Senate Election Cases, p. 181, where the report of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary is found in full) the report says:

"In the opinion of the committee the office of brigadier general under the United States is incompatible with that of Member of either House of Congress. By accepting the office of brigadier general the sitting Member, Mr. Lane, virtually resigned his seat in the Senate, and it became vacant at that time."

In Kerr v. Jones (19 Ind., 351), the court held:

"The offices of reporter of the Supreme Court and colonel of militia are incompatible, and the acceptance of the latter vacates the former."

Says the report in the case of Blair and Schenck, Thirty-eighth Congress, first session, No. 110:

"The duties of the two offices are so entirely incompatible that this of itself, were there no other obstacle, would render their discharge by the same person an impossibility. The Representative is elected by the people, and represents them in the House, discharging the duties they require of him under the Constitution; the major general is appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and is required to obey him as Commander in Chief, and 'no man can serve two masters.' The Representative is required to discharge his duties in this House, and can not leave his seat without consent of the House; the major general is required to discharge his duties in the field, and can not leave his saddle without consent of his Commander in Chief—the President—and no man can be in two places at the same time.

"The Representative 'shall not be questioned in any other place' 'for any speech or debate' in the House, but if he be a major general, and that 'speech or debate' be construed as disrespectful to his superior officer, he may be court-martialed for it. He 'shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during his attendance at the session of the House, and in going to and returning from the same,' but if he be in the military service and his furlough has expired, he may be arrested and lodged in a guardhouse by a corporal of guard to await trial. He may as a Representative be called upon to vote upon the propriety or continuance of the Rules and Articles of War for the violation of which he may be at the very moment on trial; and his duty as a Representative may require of him to impeach the President, his Commander in Chief, if he be a major general, while his duty as a soldier may at the same time require of him unquestioned obedience, on pain of death, to the order of that same Commander in Chief to absent himself from his seat and report in person a thousand miles from the Capital.

"It is not necessary to cite other instances of incompatibility, though they will crowd at every step the path of him who attempts thus to travel at the same time in opposite directions. These are sufficient to show the impossibility.

"If there was not any such impossible incompatibility as has been shown to exist, still the holding of these two offices by the same person at the same time would be against the whole theory of our institutions, antirepublican, and most dangerous in its consequences. Nothing is plainer in the theory and plan of this Government than the distinct and separate organization of the executive, judicial, and legislative departments, and the sedulous care with which each has been clothed and guarded in the exercise of duties entirely independent of the others. Yet the attempt to invest the same person with two offices—one legislative and the other executive—and require of him at the same time the discharge of the duties of both, is, whether they be conflicting or not, a commingling of the duties of the executive and legislative departments.

"It is bringing the Executive himself into the very Halls of Congress, and if persisted in might ultimately prove as pernicious as if he had a seat therein and as many votes as he had commissions. If one Representative in Congress may at the same time hold under the Executive the office of major general so may another, and another may as well be a brigadier general, or hold any other official position in the military service under the Executive and Commander in Chief, and bound to obey him. By such process the House may at any time be put under the control and become the pliant instrument of the Executive to any end. Its Members would cease to be the representatives of the people and become only the agents of the Executive.

"The framers of the Constitution saw this so clearly and felt that the independence of the legislative over the executive department was so essential and vital that they deemed the inhibition worthy of an express constitutional enactment, that 'No person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office.' (Art. I, sec. 6.) And here ends the argument. Nothing can be said to gainsay or to enforce a plain constitutional provision. Thus saith the Constitution. The two offices can not be held by the same person at the same time."

The foregoing is from the Dawes report, which is commended for its exhaustive treatment of this subject. Attention is called to this emphatic language in that report:

"The House has ever been awake to this constitutional guard of its independence, and has never failed when occasion requires to resist any invasion of its privileges in this particular." (Rept. 110, 38th Cong., 1st sess., p. 5.)

Two questions were distinctly settled in that report, and two cases were considered by the committee together.

In the case of Robert C. Schenck, he was elected in the fall of 1862, his term to begin March 4, 1863. The first session of the Congress to which he was elected commenced December 7, 1863. He resigned the military office of major general to take effect December 5, 1863. His resignation was accepted to take effect on that date. He then appeared and was qualified December 7, 1863, and entered upon his duties as Member of Congress. He performed no act as Member of Congress until December 7, 1863. He indicated no acceptance as Member of 67 Congress until the latter date. He drew no pay as a Member of Congress until the session commenced, December 7, 1863. After that date he drew pay and performed the duties of a Member of Congress. The House held that he was entitled to his seat, as he was not a military officer of the United States when he determined to accept and did accept and qualify as a Member of Congress. The following is the resolution reported by the committee in that case:

"Resolved, That Robert C. Schenck, having resigned the office of major general of volunteers, which he then held, on the 13th of November, 1863, which resignation was accepted November 21, 1863, to take effect December 5, 1863, was not by reason of having held such office disqualified from holding a seat as Representative in the Thirty-eighth Congress, whose first session commenced on the 7th day of December, 1863."

In the case of Gen. Blair, he acted as a major general after the date of the meeting of the Congress to which he was elected, and in this same report of Mr. Dawes the following resolution was submitted:

"Resolved, That Francis P. Blair, jr., by continuing to hold the office of major general of volunteers, to which he was appointed November 29, 1862, and to discharge the duties thereof until January 1, 1864, the date of his resignation, did thereby decline and disqualify himself to hold the office of Representative in the Thirty-eighth Congress, the first session of which commenced on the first Monday in December, 1863."

Again, Article I, section 1, of the Constitution says:

"All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

The powers of Congress are then specified.

Article II, section 1, says: "The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." Section 2: "The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia," etc. Article III, section 1: "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts," etc.

It is therefore apparent that it was not intended that the duties of those three departments should be performed by the same man or bodies of men.

"Whether offices are incompatible depends upon the charter or statute and the nature of the duties to be performed. (1 Dillon on Mun. Corp., 3d ed., sec. 227; Milward v. Thatcher, 2 Term Rep. (D. & E.), 87; People v. Carrique, 2 Hill, 93.)

"Incompatibility in offices exists where the nature and duties of the two offices are such as to render it improper from considerations of public policy for one incumbent to retain both." (1 Dillon Mu. Corp., 3d ed., sec. 227 and note; Kerr v. Jones, 19 Ind., 351.)

In the light of the common law, of the Constitution, of the fact that a person should not at the same time both make and execute the law, and that the legislative should not be subservient to the executive, it is clear that the position of Representative in Congress and of an officer in the Army of the United States are incompatible offices.

The duties of a Member of the National Legislature demand his presence in the legislative Chambers at Washington, making laws, as a Representative of the people, while the duties of a military officer demand his presence in other places at all times and that he engage himself in executing the laws of Congress under the command of the President.

It is true that the mere impossibility of the incumbent of 68 two offices being present at all times to perform the duties of each does not make them incompatible, but—

"Offices are said to be incompatible and inconsistent, so as not to be executed by the same person when from the multiplicity of business in them they can not be executed with care and ability, and when their being subordinate and interfering with each other it induces a presumption that they can not be executed with impartiality and honesty." (5 Bacon's Abridgement, Title Offices, K; Public Offices; Throop, sec. 33; People v. Green, 58 N. Y., 304–305, per Folger, C. J.)

Is it proper and public policy for the officers of the Army and Navy acting as legislators to appropriate the money for the support of these departments, expend it as they see fit under laws of their own making, while governed and restrained only by such limitations and restrictions as they see fit to place upon themselves?

If their power as legislators is suspended only while holding offices in the Army or Navy, they may first (and in anticipation of commissions) make obnoxious laws and then go into the military and naval service to execute them, leaving the people powerless, for while there is no possible quorum to do business there are no vacancies in either House, and hence a repeal of obnoxious laws or the enactment of new ones is made impossible. Even repentant and patriotic Representatives would be unable to return to the halls of legislation unless by the consent of the President without committing the crime of desertion and incurring the death penalty. Even the court of impeachment might be in the Army and Navy, unable to convene, and the whole Government would be in the hands of what might prove to be an ambitious and unscrupulous Executive.

It is no answer to say, what we all concede, that our present patriotic Executive is above suspicion. What is constitutional to-day will be so until the fundamental law is changed. We are building for the centuries and to avoid all probable, if not all possible, dangers. Our fathers had all these dangers in mind when the Constitution was framed.

In Indiana, State v. Allen (21 Ind., 516), the court went so far as to hold that an enlistment in the Army of the United States for three years or during the war was an abandonment and vacation of a civil office held under the State. (See also Willcock on Corp., 238. But see Bryan v. Cattell, 15 Iowa, 537.)

The question may be asked, What will be the situation if a person holding a commission in the Army of the United States is elected to Congress and, without resigning his office in the Army, presents himself as a Member of the House? In such case does he vacate the Army position? Assume that he refuses to resign either and claims to act in both positions. It will be time enough to cross that bridge when reached. It is clear, however, that in such case he is not entitled to his seat in Congress and should not be sworn in or allowed to act.

It follows that the seats of those Members of the House of Representatives in the Fifty-fifth Congress who entered the Army as officers, commissioned by the President, during the late war with Spain, and took the oath and acted as such, are vacant, and have been since they accepted their commissions in the Army. The only action necessary is to so declare by resolution, as matter of convenience and to aid the Speaker and others in discharging their public duties. No act or resolution of Congress can change the legal effect of their acts.

Our attention has been called to the case of Bryan v. Cattel (15 Iowa, 538) as sustaining the doctrine that a Member of Congress might hold a military appointment in the Army. But this case will not sustain the doctrine. Bryan was appointed a captain in the 69 Army, being at the time district attorney for the fifth judicial district of Iowa, for four years commencing with the 1st day of January, 1859. At that time there was no provision of law against holding two offices, but by chapter 54, laws of 1862, it provided as follows:

"The acceptance of a commission to any military office, either in the militia of this State or in the volunteer service of the United States, which requires the incumbent in the civil office to exercise his military duties out of the State for a period not less than 60 days."

This was enacted as a ground for the vacation of any civil office where the officer had entered the United States Army.

Capt. Bryan sued for his salary for the entire period covered by his election. The court denied that for such part of the time as came after the enactment just quoted. This clearly sustains the position that with the provisions of Article I, section 6, clause 2, United States Constitution, the office would have been declared vacant by the Iowa court. For the period prior to the enactment just quoted the court allowed the captain his salary as district attorney upon the ground that he might discharge the duties of district attorney and also the duties of captain. The language of the court is:

"It by no means necessarily follows that the person in the military service might not discharge all the substantial duties of the attorneyship. It is scarcely probable that he could or would, and yet he might."

Upon this line of thought, not at all sustained by the current authorities, they allowed Capt. Bryan to recover for that portion of his salary for the time heretofore stated. But the court laid down this doctrine in the same decision:

"If a party accepts another office which within the meaning of the law and the case is incompatible with that which he holds, we have no doubt but the first one would become vacant."

We can well understand how the very patriotic chief justice, Judge Wright, in the great patriotic State of Iowa, then throbbing with very generous impulses for the Government, would use the reasoning quoted in respect to the possibility of his discharging the duties of the two offices. But this case, taken as a whole, thoroughly sustains the position taken by the committee, and when we are confronted with the constitutional provisions it is absolutely certain that had such a case arisen as a Member of Congress holding a commission in the Army, Judge Wright and the Supreme Court of Iowa would have held, as Congress has ever held, that the offices were absolutely incompatible.

We have, then, in considering this matter, two kinds of incompatibility in respect to offices: First, where in the very nature of the two offices they are incompatible and can not be held by the same person at the same time. Clearly, for reasons above given and sustained by the authorities without reference to the Constitution, the office of Member of Congress and an officer in the Army of the United States are incompatible and can not be held at the same time. But while we have considered this view of the case fully it was not really necessary, for the constitutional provision in itself makes it absolutely impossible to hold these two offices at the same time.

The committee therefore recommend to the House the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Joseph Wheeler, a Representative in the Fifty-fifth Congress of the United States from the Eighth district of the State of Alabama; Edward E. Robbins, a Representative in the Fifty-fifth Congress of the United States from the twenty-first district of the 70 State of Pennsylvania; David G. Colson, a Representative in the Fifty-fifth Congress of the United States from the eleventh district of Kentucky, and James R. Campbell, a Representative in the Fifty-fifth Congress of the United States from the twentieth district of the State of Illinois, by accepting commissions in the Army of the United States, and being mustered into such service after being sworn in as such Representatives, thereby vacated their seats as such Representatives and ceased to be Members of this House as of the dates they accepted such military offices, respectively, and are not now Members of the Fifty-fifth Congress of the United States.

I most respectfully dissent from the views of the committee as expressed in the resolution recommended to the House for adoption.

JOHN J. JENKINS.

[House Report 2205, part 2, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session.]

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS TO MILITARY AND OTHER OFFICES.

Mr. De Armond, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following views:

In submitting some minority views there is no disposition to find fault with the majority. Upon the contrary, it is a pleasure to say that the report of the committee—to much of which cheerful approval is accorded—is able and learned, and a valuable contribution to the records of the American Congress.

The House saw fit to impose upon the committee a duty which was entered upon by the committee in the right spirit, and discharged in uprightness and with ability. That the report is not one in which all can join heartily is a source of regret to the minority quite as great as any of the majority can feel. The fact that the search after the true light of the Constitution has been so harmoniously pursued by the committee encourages the minority to lay before the House some views not entertained by the committee, so far as the report shows, in the hope that possibly thereby the House may be more fully advised concerning the subject submitted to the committee for consideration and report.

The committee properly directs special attention to paragraph 2, section 6, article 1, of the Constitution, and with much care and learning seeks to construe, interpret, and apply that portion of the supreme law of the land to the facts ascertained and reported. The resolution, the adoption of which the committee recommends, is based upon what, in the judgment of the committee, is the imperative requirement of the Constitution. The committee has not found, and perhaps no one has discovered, actual danger to our institutions from the appointment to military office under the United States of any of the four Members of this House whose seats are declared to have been vacated by the acceptance of such appointments. As before stated, the recommendation of the committee is based upon the constitutional behest, as the committee understands it, without any predilection to fly to the rescue of an imperiled Constitution. The committee did not hunt for a breach into which it might throw itself, but faithfully and to the best of its ability performed the duty assigned it by the House.

2 Unconsciously, I think, the committee regarded the instruction of the House in the light of the antecedent understanding of the scope of the investigation and action originally proposed. In this view, it seems, special prominence has been given to the status of the Members of the House who were appointed to military office. However restrictive or comprehensive the resolutions under which the committee proceeded may have been by original intendment, the language employed in them is broad enough, as the committee determined, to cover the cases of other Members of the House who accepted places upon commissions created under legislation of the present Congress. At the same time it does not appear that the committee dwelt upon the evils which might result from giving Congressmen civil office, the creation of their own legislative acts, to anything like the same extent that it dwelt upon the bad results likely to flow from the disregard of the second branch of the paragraph of the Constitution above cited. It is not thought improbable that this difference in estimating the weight of these kindred parts of the provision under consideration is traceable in some degree to a preconceived notion, not embodied in the resolutions before the committee, but evidenced otherwise and earlier, that the case of the Army appointee is the one to be dealt with. But, however this may be, it is evident that the committee was much more impressed with the importance of holding rigorously to the strict letter of the Constitution as applicable to the military officer than as applicable to the appointee to a post made by the Congress of which the appointee was or is a member.

Again, the committee lay much stress upon the exact, technical meaning of the term "office," and apply that meaning to the word as employed in the above-mentioned provision of the Constitution. It is not disputed that the report deals learnedly and upon authority with "office," as contradistinguished from "employment." The question, however, remains whether "office," when used in the provision referred to, has the technical or the general meaning of the word. In considering this question the precise words of the Constitution may be set before us. They are:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time, and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office."

What good is to be secured, what evils prevented, by the observance and enforcement of this portion of our Constitution? Evidently freedom for the legislative branch of the Government from undue Executive influence, no more surely than the prevention of the many wrongs that might arise by permitting legislators to make places for themselves to fill, regardless of the public welfare. Indeed, it is by no means clear that the first clause of the paragraph above quoted is less in value than the one which follows it. Which meaning of the term "office" gives the greater weight and efficacy to the constitutional safeguard? If "office" has the technical, precise, restricted meaning which the committee give it, then a Senator or Representative shall not "during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time," unless artful enough to create, or increase the emoluments of, a something lacking some of the elements of an "office," in the technical sense, though possessing all the substance and inducements calculated and designed to 3 make the "employment" most desirable. Is that what the Constitution makers meant? Did they intend to prohibit in terms what they encouraged in fact if accomplished by a legislative trick? Were they careful to put up the bars to prevent Senators and Representatives from providing for themselves and enjoying, at the expense of the public and the peril of free government, what they might make and enjoy, by due legislative regard for the important function of omitting something technically essential to constitute an "office," while providing for the same thing in substance?

Upon the other hand, if the term "office," as used by the fathers, has its general, popular meaning, and not its narrow, technical meaning, the prohibition is complete, and, if enforced, truly effective in accomplishing what we may believe it was intended to accomplish.

There is a broad and plain distinction between the appointment by one branch of Congress of certain ones of its members to serve upon a legislative committee or commission, and the appointment by the President of such members. The Canadian commission was created under a law of the present Congress, providing that its members should be appointed "by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." Thus are members of the Supreme Court, members of the Cabinet, ambassadors to the courts of foreign nations, and many other high officers of the Government appointed. It is the opinion of the committee, however, that Members of Congress, whether Senators or Representatives, were not appointed to "office" in being thus made members of the Canadian Commission, but at most were only "employed," with due regard to and without any breach of the constitutional provision already quoted. The nominations of these commissioners are now awaiting senatorial confirmation, having been made originally in vacation. Let it be noted that nothing in the legislation authorizing the appointment of the Canadian Commission suggested that Congressmen should be members of it. And how much membership upon this commission lacks of being an office, within the most technical meaning of the term, let the curious determine. At the same time let them note carefully the solemnity and decorum attendant upon the "employment" of persons by the President, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

What has been said concerning the Canadian Commission applies to the Hawaiian Commission, with the suggestion that the legislation providing for the creation of the Hawaiian Commission, while it prescribes that the President shall appoint the five commissioners, "at least two of whom shall be residents of the Hawaiian Islands," does not require that the appointments shall be with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. Robbins was appointed captain in the volunteers on or about the 21st of June of last year; was mustered into the service as such officer on the 1st day of the following July, and a week later Congress adjourned. In October (in the meantime having been promoted to major) he was discharged. He received no pay for his Army service, claiming his congressional salary instead. When Congress assembled last December he appeared in his seat, answered to the call of his name, and ever since has been acting as a Member of this House, voting upon the last roll call, or yea-and-nay vote, before the filing of the report of the committee, recommending the adoption of a resolution declaring that he and the others named in the resolution "vacated their seats as such Representatives and ceased to be Members of this House as of the dates they accepted such military offices, respectively,

4 and are not now Members of the Fifty-fifth Congress of the United States."

Now, as a matter of fact, Robbins is to-day, as he has been during all of the present session, a Member of this House, for he has appeared and served, and been permitted to serve, as such as fully and completely as any other Member of the body. It would thus appear that a Representative, when admitted to a seat in this body and duly qualified by taking the oath of office, actually remains a Member until the expiration of the term for which he was chosen, unless before the expiration of such term he goes out by death, resignation, or action of the House. Therefore, it is suggested that once admitted to membership as Representative, and not dying or resigning, and the term still continuing, one goes out of the House or remains in it pursuant to the action or nonaction of the House.

Most naturally, perhaps, the question of whether one is or ought to continue to be a Member of the House arises (in the absence of misconduct warranting or considered as warranting his expulsion) when another claimant appears and demands the seat. In the cases before us no adverse claimants appear. Upon the contrary, in the case of Gen. Wheeler, as we are advised, the governor of his State declined to regard his seat as vacated and to call a special election to fill it, though urged by some interest or influence to do so; and his constituents are content to have no other Representative, not only during this Congress, but also in the next.

It may not be out of the way to remark that probably the Congress will be measurably freed from Executive influence, not sanctioned by the Constitution, when Executive appointments to "office," as well as Executive "employments," reach congressional households less frequently. Assuredly, if membership upon "commissions" by presidential appointment and senatorial advice and consent are held to be prohibited by the Constitution, no public hardship will follow. What is there unreasonable in such understanding and application of that instrument?

The present would appear to be the time when full force ought to be given to the prohibition of the Constitution against the appointment of Congressmen to places which they have created, or which, in the absence of law, the President may make at will, with such powers as he may see fit to confer upon this or that commission, sent to this or that island, where he may choose to have it operate.

If it be urged that the Constitution is not in the way of presidential appointments of Congressmen to places upon commissions, whose duty it is to make investigations and report for the information of Congress, it should not be overlooked that too often those who are thus the especial marks of the President's confidence and favor will not unlikely, as a natural consequence of his preferment, become champions of his policies, after aiding in formulating them, and of his treaties, after making them for him, when otherwise their stand might be very different, indeed. It is perhaps quite as important that the legislator shall devote his energies and abilities to legislative business outside the domain of the Executive as that the Executive shall refrain from assuming the rôle of the legislator.

It is but just to say that in the presidential appointments of Congressmen falling under the consideration of the committee nothing has appeared, either in the motives of the Executive or in the conduct, character, or qualifications of the appointees, to provoke criticism;

5 and no criticism is offered as to individual cases, but only as to a practice, not new, but surely growing with dangerous rapidity.

In conclusion, it is submitted that clearly within the spirit and probably within the letter of the Constitution the President has not the right to appoint a Member of Congress to a place or office such as the members of the Canadian Commission hold, nor has a Member of Congress a right to accept such appointment. What has just been said about appointments to the Canadian Commission may be repeated concerning Hawaiian Commission appointments.

All that is said in the report of the committee about the dangers to be apprehended from a disregard of the provision of the Constitution governing the cases of the Representatives who were appointed to and accepted offices in the Army may be applied, with equal force, and out of greater necessity, in considering the associated provision of the same Constitution prohibiting certain appointments to civil office.

DAVID A. DE ARMOND.

[House Report 2205, part 3, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session.]

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS TO MILITARY AND OTHER OFFICES.

Mr. PARKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, by leave of the House, submits the following views in dissent from those of the majority committee as to House resolution No. 354:

On Wednesday, December 21, 1898, on a report from the Committee on Rules, without debate, the House adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it is hereby, instructed to ascertain and report to the House:

"First. Whether any Member of the House has accepted any office under the United States; and

"Second. Whether the acceptance of such office under the United States has vacated the seat of the Member accepting the same."

The resolution leaves to the committee no discretion. Usually resolutions are referred to a committee in order to determine whether they are in proper form, and whether as matter of governmental and national policy they ought to be reported and considered. In this case the resolution was passed by the House, without debate and without consideration. It is for the House, and not for the committee, to decide whether the question should be taken up, and whether in time of war, when the temporary services of Members of the House have been of value to the country in high military and diplomatic position, and when that temporary service has been performed, or is being performed without injury to the House, action should be taken in the nature of a forfeiture, branding patriotic service as inconsistent with legislative duty.

It may well be suggested that the constitutional provisions for the integrity of the legislature were intended only to enable the House to protect itself against Executive interference with its prerogatives and independence, and that when the reason for such action fails the House may well in its discretion pass the matter by in silence. The necessities of such a time as this know no law.

The sacred provisions of the Constitution, whether for the protection of the citizen or of the legislature, ought to be enforced as well as construed in a sensible, liberal, and practical way. High 2 policy is at the basis of all government. No technical spirit should prevail with reference to such provisions as the guaranty to every State in the Union of a republican form of government, nor as to the qualifications of electors voting for the President; nor have we yet thought it advisable or politic to attempt to diminish the basis of representation of the various States, whether in Massachusetts or South Carolina, because the right to vote is abridged, or because educational and other qualifications are enforced, so as to bring the case within the fourteenth amendment.

The House has always treated these questions of membership as largely within its discretion.

II. THE UNEXPECTED WIDE SCOPE OF THE INQUIRY.

The inquiry took a far wider range than was generally expected when the resolution passed the House. Question was made in the following cases:

A. Members who received commissions in the Volunteer Army. One of these resigned before the meeting of the House and is performing his duties honorably here. The others, though still serving their country as soldiers, may be discharged at any moment and be ready to return to their duties here, and meanwhile they are not attempting to exercise the privileges of Members nor invading the independence of this House, and there would be no time to fill their seats in this Congress if the House should in its discretion declare them vacant.

B. Members who have been appointed as commissioners plenipotentiary to adjust differences with Canada. It is noted that the principle as to this class may extend further and touch the right of Senators to have acted as commissioners with full power to negotiate and sign a treaty of peace with Spain.

C. A Member who, in the recess of the House, under the authority of a joint resolution and appointment of the President as commissioner, has investigated the condition of affairs in Hawaii and aided in the preparation of a code of laws for those islands.

D. Members who are serving on the Industrial Commission, appointed for two years, with provision that they shall continue as such and receive a salary after the expiration of their present terms.

E. Members of the so-called postal commission who investigated postal conditions in recess and have reported to the House.

F. Members who under various statutes are intrusted with the government of various institutions under the authority of the United States. For example, section 5580, Revised Statutes, as to the Smithsonian Institution, provides that "the business of the Institution shall be conducted by a Board of Regents, to be composed of * * * three Members of the House of Representatives" and others.

NOTE.—This principle may likewise govern the question what persons can be elector for President. Article II, section 1, paragraph 2: "No * * * person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector."

III. WHAT IS MEANT BY AN OFFICE.

By the views of the majority, and while enforcing a rule as to the effect of holding office that is much stricter than the words of the Constitution, the whole constitutional rule is largely nullified by the 3 declaration that the highest advisory and diplomatic positions shall not be considered offices, because especial, and created for special great emergencies.

The clause of the Constitution is as follows:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office." (Art. I, sec. 6, par. 2.)

Several questions arise, viz:

What is an office under the authority of the United States, or an office held under the United States, what is the legal result of holding such office, and what discretion has the House in the enforcement of such legal result?

It is unnecessary to take much time with offices which do not come within the spirit of the constitutional provision. Directors and trustees of charitable or scientific institutions may be technically "officers under the authority of the United States," but so long as there is no compensation attached to their office, they are practically and for common good sense only ministers of science or public charity. If it were the question of a governmental directorship of a vast incorporated commercial system, say of railroads and canals, public policy might require a different conclusion. No technical rule can apply. The Post Office and Industrial Commissions are really committees of the House. They are joint committees, it may be, with Senators and others, but appointed by the Speaker of the House to investigate and recommend legislation. As to the Industrial Commission, if any part of the law of the present Congress gives congressional members of that commission the powers of any civil office, that part of the law is unconstitutional and the appointment is void, while the membership remains. Mr. Gardner states this point well on page 37.

As to diplomatic commissions, their dignity and their powers are so great that it is only fair to say that the suggestion that they are not offices under the United States is certainly not a settled question. But in theory and in practice it is not needful to determine this question now. Whether these positions be offices or not, we can agree that no member holds office or is an officer of the United States under these statutes, for the commissions were all created during this Congress; and even if offices were created, the Members of this House can not be appointed to hold such office, and in law are therefore only unofficial aids to the Executive and to these various commissions.

Practically, as well as theoretically, it is the same. If service with these commissions had taken Members from their duties here during the session, the House might hold this work inconsistent with membership. But the work was done in recess, principally, and was such as any patriotic citizen could perform and did not in any way interfere with work as Representatives.

If the commissioners had large emoluments, as plenipotentiaries and special envoys, this fact might be considered inconsistent with the independence of the House and the integrity of its legislation, and the House might take action as for breach of privilege or the question might be raised by the Treasury as to their right to such emolument.

But there are no such emoluments of any kind. The question is absolutely unpractical and purely academic. It is not theoretically or practically before this House for discussion or decision.

The majority report is therefore entirely correct (pp. 53, 54) that 4 the persons appointed or designated as commissioners under these various statutes are not officers, nor is either of them an officer, under the United States within the meaning of the Constitution. They could not be such. If these be officers, it is their tenure of the office that is void, and not their membership.

It is therefore unnecessary now to decide that the place of special envoy, no matter how great the authority, dignity, and emolument attached thereto, is not an office. Ambassadors were at first only sent as special envoys and not permanently. They represent the sovereign, whether monarch or republic, more than any other office under the Chief Executive, and such a decision would trench on dangerous ground.

It is only to be added that if offices which are temporary in their character are not within the constitutional prohibition, the same reasoning might apply to the emergency military officers. Gen. Wheeler takes this point on pages 32 and 33, citing a decision of Attorney General Griggs, as follows:

"The Attorney General of the United States has, in effect, decided this question. In a matter in which the principle is the same, he says: "'While an officer in the Volunteer Army may be said to be actively engaged in the military service, he is not permanently so engaged. He is called out to meet an emergency, and must be discharged when the purpose for which he entered the service has been accomplished. Unlike the Regular Army officer, he has not selected the military service for his profession. He has simply responded to a patriotic call, and expects, when the war is over, to return to civil life. His term of military service is uncertain and contingent. He may be taken from his civil duties for a few months, for a year, for two years at the most. The Government does not need or demand a complete and final severance of his relations with civil life. He may be able to make arrangements to bridge over his absence, and on his return resume his former work. Whether he is to be permitted to do this and retain a civil office during a temporary absence is a matter for determination by those to whom he is accountable for the proper discharge of the duties of such office.'"

The Attorney General's view is consistent that neither these diplomatic nor emergency volunteer offices are so permanent as to vacate other offices.

IV. THE CONSTITUTION CODIFIES AND INCLUDES THE WHOLE LAW ON THIS SUBJECT SO FAR AS MEMBERS OF CONGRESS ARE CONCERNED.

The doctrine of incompatibility of offices has no place here. That doctrine is rather rashly laid down in certain textbooks, but it will be found that the cases are always to be discriminated from this.

In some cases the Constitution had ordered the legislative, judicial, and executive branches to be kept strictly separate; therefore, the offices were held incompatible. In other cases the offices were plainly incompatible. No one person could be President and Vice President at the same time, or judge and suitor, or judge and marshal. These are plain cases.

No such incompatibility between legislative, executive, and judicial offices generally exists by the common law outside of the constitutional provision. History disproves it.

On April 16, 1794, John Jay, Chief Justice of the United States, was nominated by George Washington as envoy extraordinary to His Britannic Majesty. His nomination was sent to the Senate and confirmed April 19, after acrimonious debate, a principal objection being that he was Chief Justice. (See Pellew's Life of Jay, p. 298.) He continued in the office of Chief Justice and therefore refused all compensation for his services except expenses. (Pellew's Life, p.
5 314.) The State papers (Foreign Relations, vol. 1, p. 470, etc.) show his commission and instruments granting various powers, together with a letter of credence to the King certifying the nomination of John Jay, Chief Justice, as envoy extraordinary. In the next year, May 28, he reached New York, and on June 8 the treaty was presented to the Senate. Before landing, May 26, 1795, he had been elected governor of New York, and on June 29 he resigned his place as Chief Justice and took his place as governor July 1.

Will it be insisted that an envoy extraordinary is not a diplomatic officer? It can hardly be suggested that a Secretary of State is not. John Marshall was Secretary of State for John Adams, and while such was nominated and confirmed as Chief Justice. He was sworn in and took his seat February 4, 1801. Nevertheless, at the President's request he remained as Secretary of State till Jefferson was sworn in March 4, 1801, and at his request continued as such Secretary one day longer, until March 5, 1801.

Without a constitutional provision, the doctrine that legislative, executive, and judicial offices are incompatible by common law is absolutely unsupported by authority.

It is well known that officers of the Crown always sat and now sit in Parliament. This practice was unlimited until the statute of Anne. That statute declared that such appointment should forfeit the membership, but allowed reelection. Story, in his work on the Constitution, sections 868 to 872, says that legislative and executive offices are not in principle incompatible, and obviously favors the measure, so strongly urged of late, that the chief Secretaries should be members of the Legislature, so that information as to the Government may be called for in the House. He by no means considers the constitutional prohibition sacred in point of policy or principle. Ministerial responsibility in the Houses limits instead of increasing executive power.

V. THE EFFECT OF APPOINTMENT TO OFFICE PROHIBITED BY THE CONSTITUTION.

The effect of attempted appointment of a Member to a civil office created during the time for which he was elected has been sufficiently discussed.

The appointment is void. The Member can be held merely to be an unofficial helper or volunteer aid. If he accept emolument, or desert his legislative duties, or there be other just cause to deem his action a breach of the Constitution and the independence of either House, that House can take proper measure to protect itself. No such cause appears here, nor is any such question referred to the committee. We can only report that if these diplomatic functions are, in law, offices created by this Congress, they are not held by any Member hereof. The most jealous regard for the privileges of this House need go no further. And under the specific inquiry referred to us we can go no further.

VI. THE EFFECT OF "HOLDING OFFICE UNDER THE UNITED STATES" ON MEMBERSHIP.

The question should be a practical one in each case.

Here it is confined to temporary military service under an emergency call.

The question may hereafter arise as to civil officers. It is easy to suppose that a Secretary of a great department were elected Senator and that he should feel it necessary to the Government to delay
6 taking his seat until his successor as Secretary should be appointed, just as Marshall remained Secretary of State for a month after he was Chief Justice; or an emergency may be imagined in which the death of a great governmental officer should make it necessary to call in the aid of a Member experienced in the work to act ad intermim. Cases of public need, like those which created these commissions, might be multiplied.

The majority hold that acceptance of an officer for ever so short a time involves forfeiture of membership forever. This should not be. Neither the Constitution nor policy demand it. Attorney General Griggs does not hold it, but the contrary.

Acceptance of a permanent office may be held, and should probably be held, by the House to vacate the membership permanently. Acceptance for an emergency, whether military or civil, of a temporary office may, and in case of public necessity should, be held by the House at most to create only a temporary vacation of the seat; that is, a suspension of membership during the emergency.

The whole question is for the House. No self-acting abrogation of membership has ever come to pass. No Member has ever lost his right to his place until the House has acted. Gen. Wheeler, by his brief (Rep. p. 31), truly says: "Congress, by its practice for 100 years, has assumed the clause in the Constitution as directory and not mandatory."

The Constitution in this regard is a means by which the House may protect itself, but only if it see the need of protection.

There is no doubt that under the Constitution no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of the House during his continuance in such office. But the question does arise whether in cases of temporary calls to public duty the vacancy in the seat may not be merely temporary. A vacancy of this sort is not the same as forfeiture of the office. There is certainly question whether a Member who goes to serve his country, perhaps on emergency call for a few days, thereby forfeits his membership forever, or whether membership is merely suspended, unless such forfeiture of office be made by some action of the House or of the Member's State or constituency, and in their discretion whether such action ought to be taken is to be decided in each case. It is unquestionable that the Member can not exercise the legislative and military offices at the same time or be paid for both.

None of our brothers who went into the Volunteer Army have drawn double salary during their continuance in Voluntary Army office. One has now returned to the duties of this House. He served only during part of the recess of Congress, and resigned as an Army officer before this session. Others, though still in volunteer service, may be discharged on any day. The question is an actual one, whether by reason of such military service, no matter how brief, these Members ipso facto, and without action of the House or the constituency, have forfeited all right to return here as Members when their military duties have ceased and they no longer continue in such military office. The Constitution does not say so.

This construction would go far beyond the provision of the Constitution that they shall not be Members during the continuance of such office, and would say that they shall forfeit membership altogether and forever.

Plainly the framers of the Constitution chose their words carefully. They contemplated that their members might be called to newly 7 created military duties, and that such duties and the office so created might have a short continuance, and they changed the English statutes, with which they were familiar, so as to cover that case.

They certainly had in contemplation the possibility of being called to arms.

In order to understand the meaning of the provision of the Constitution, section 6 of Article I, we must put ourselves in the place of these members of the constitutional convention. A large number of them had been officers of the Continental Army. They knew that a great part of the First Congress of the United States had gone from that Congress into that Army; they recognized the duty of the citizen so to do.

The fact that the commander in chief during the Revolution had been taken from the Continental Congress was frequently urged in the debates in the convention.

When, therefore, they provided against the appointment of a Congressman to an office that had been created or made more lucrative during his term, they limited the prohibition to civil offices, and left Congressmen free as to military offices, no matter when created, expressly recognizing that they might be appointed or called to military office and that the needs of the country might so require. The provision is as follows:

Article I, section 6, paragraph 2: "No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a Member of either House during his continuance in office."

This prohibition by the first clause as to appointments to new offices is only as to civil offices, and expressly excepts new military offices as well as any call to military service and special appointments in time of emergency. The framers of that clause contemplated such appointments, and it only remains to consider the second clause and what effect they meant such appointment to have on the membership.

Obviously they did not mean it to forfeit the membership ipso facto, for they refused to follow the English law ordering such forfeiture, and made an entirely different provision based on the duration of the office, "his continuance in office."

It was an intensely practical question to each of them. They lived in a line of colonies along a narrow strip of seacoast, bordered immediately on the west and south by wild and often hostile Indians under French, English, and Spanish patronage. They were subject hourly to the danger of calls to defend their homes, on emergencies that might last only for a few days or might be for long service. They had before them the English statute of Queen Anne, declaring that if any member of Parliament accepted any office of profit under the Crown his seat should be thereby forfeited, and that a writ of election should immediately issue to fill the vacancy.

The statute in question is part of the act of settlement.

ACT OF SETTLEMENT.

[Anno Sexto Anne, C. 7.]

"XXVI. Provided always, That if any person, being chosen a member of the House of Commons, shall accept of any office of profit from the Crown during such time as he shall continue a member, his 8 election shall be, and is hereby, declared to be void, and a new writ shall issue for a new election as if such person so accepting was naturally dead: Provided, nevertheless, That such person shall be capable of being again elected, as if his place had not become void as aforesaid.

"XXXVIII. Provided also, That nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to any member of the House of Commons being an officer in Her Majesty's navy or army, who shall receive any new or other command in the navy or army, respectively."

This statute has always been construed in a practical way.

"The act of settlement is part of the fundamental law of the land, regarded with utmost reverence, but we find that the House of Commons dealt with all provisions as to its members in a practical way. For instance, by the Fifth William and Mary, chapter 7, section 57, no member can be concerned in farming taxes, but in various cases it was held that where a commissioner of stamps was elected to Parliament and ceased to be such officer before actually taking his seat, although after his election, he retained the seat. (See Hatsell's Precedents and Proceedings in the House of Commons, Vol. II, p. 43, par. 4; p. 44, par. 7.)

"So under the Statute of Anne a member who accepted the reversion of the Garter King of Arms retains his seat, and when the reversion fell in by death the matter was again brought up, but dropped (p. 44, par. 10). So, too, where Mr. Webb was appointed governor of the Isle of Wight before election and accepted afterwards, he continued his seat (p. 45, par. 11).

"Where a decision had been found unpractical, Parliament had no hesitation in reversing its action, especially in cases where officers of the army and navy were given high posts which were both civil and military, the later decisions being that they should retain their seats. So as to a naval officer made master of Greenwich Hospital (p. 46, par. 16). So as to an army officer made master of Chelsea Hospital (p. 48, par. 18). So as to army officers who were made governors of cities and forts, the rule being settled by resolution of 1733, after various precedents the other way (p. 48, par. 19). So as to an officer of the army accepting the office of general of ordnance (p. 52, par. 31).

"Hatsell's Precedents and Proceedings, Volume II, from pages 43 to 72, contains quite a discussion of this subject."

This statute is justly regarded as a part of the English constitution. But the framers of our Constitution refused to follow it or to declare that acceptance of office should ipso facto forfeit the seat. They left the question whether the vacancy in the membership was to be temporary or permanent and whether it was to be by way of suspension or to result in a forfeiture—all this they left to the exigencies of each particular case and to the decision of the House.

It is idle to say that membership can not be suspended and must be forfeited. This House can either suspend or expel a Member in its discretion, and what the House can do the Constitution can do, or can leave to the decision of the House in each case.

It is interesting to notice that other English statutes, which are followed in some State constitutions, rendered the holders of certain offices incapable of election to Parliament (see I Blackstone Commentaries, pp. 175–176). Our Constitution has no such provision. It leaves such an official free to resign after election and to take his seat. Our Constitution thus refused to follow English precedents. It refused to declare that the patriotic performance of military duty should forfeit membership altogether or that the holding of any office should bar a man from being elected to Congress by his fellow citizens.

The provisions of the Constitution are not to be enlarged. They did not prevent Chief Justice Jay from being sent to Europe as a special envoy. When the Constitution simply provided that the same functions should not be exercised at the same time, and that no person holding office should be a Member of either House during his continuance in such office, it did not declare that the holding of such office should thereby and ipso facto forfeit the seat forever. It
9 recognized this to be a practical question, which the House itself must determine in each particular case in its discretion and in a practical way.

In No. 51 of the Federalist (a number ascribed to Hamilton or Madison) the Constitution is paraphrased—

"A Representative * * * during the time of his service must be in no office under the United States."

That is, while he is actually serving. He shall not serve as Member—be an active Member—during his continuance in office. In no other way can the words "during his continuance in office" be given any effect.

This question is not to be confined to the cases now in hand. There are many others in which it may arise, and we must deal with each by the rules of common sense. For instance, we would all say that if a Member of the House accepts a place in the Regular Army, which is a life appointment, the House should certainly declare his seat vacant and order a new election, because he has declared an intention permanently to incapacitate himself as a Member. This principle applies and was enforced as to a Member who accepted a commission in the Militia of the District of Columbia, because he held a permanent office under the direct and continuing command of the President. Whether this decision would now be made if the question were new is somewhat doubtful.

An entirely different result is arrived at as to the State militia. It is true that the State militia is organized under the Constitution of the United States, and that its officers, though appointed by the States, "hold office under the United States" and, are subject to the direct call of the President (see the militia law, Rev. Stat., sec. 1642). But until such call is made they are under the training of the State, and it has never been pretended that a Member could not be an officer of the State militia, because, until such call, he is not "called into the service of the United States" (to follow the words of the Constitution, see Art. I, sec. 8, paragraphs 15 and 16, and Art. II, sec. 2, paragraph 1), and is not for practical purposes holding active office. Yet if he should be called out by the President, even to put down a riot, he certainly becomes for the time an officer of the United States, and so long as he is in the service of the United States he can not exercise the functions of a Member of Congress. But who would say as a practical matter that under those circumstances it would be good sense for the House to declare the seat forfeited, so that he could not return there after the riot was put down? His membership would only be suspended. But by the reasoning of the majority report it would be gone forever.

The examples are not exclusively military. If a Member of the House be admitted to practice at the bar of the United States Supreme Court, he becomes thereby and beyond question an officer of that court of the United States and holds office under the United States; but common sense says that this is an office not to be exercised continuously, but from time to time when he appears in court, and is not such as was contemplated by the constitutional prohibition.

"The cases as to an attorney are various. In re Attorneys (20 Johnson, 492) it was held they were not State officers, but had exclusive privilege, like licensed physicians, and therefore took a special attorney's oath and not merely official oath of the new constitution.

"In re Garland (6 Wallace, 378) the court held that a law requiring the iron-clad oath was a bill of attainder, and that attorneys were officers of the court and not of the United States. Justice Miller and three others dissented strongly. But if officers of a United States court, are they not under the United States?

"In re Garland (6 Wallace, 378) the court held that a law requiring is at least very near to an officer with an oath of office, and that a woman can not be licensed as the law then stood for reasons based on cases as to officers."

So if a Member be a Supreme Court commissioner or notary, common sense says, "De minimis non curat lex," and just as such officers have been allowed to act as electors under a precisely similar provision, no suggestion has been made that they are not likewise Representatives at least until the House, in its discretion, shall take action thereon. (See Art. II, sec. 1.)

In brief, this provision was intended to be a practical provision. There may be doubt whether temporary volunteer office under a special emergency statute was intended to be within its prohibition at all. The section itself recognizes that military offices may be created during the term of the Member of the House, and that a Member can be appointed to such office, and so long as such person holds such an office and is under the direction of the President as Commander in Chief his membership is suspended and he is not and can not be a Member of the House; but in view of the fact that such appointment may be only temporary, to execute the laws of the Union, or to put down a riot, or, in this case, till the end of a war, it may create a mere suspension of membership unless action be taken to forfeit it.

The question is, therefore, one of what the House, in its discretion, shall resolve to do and not of any self-executing law.

If the Constitution executed itself, the Member's name would be dropped from the rolls by the Clerk, without action by the House. In the words of the English statute, it would be as if he "was naturally dead." Not so here. The House has always exercised its discretion over the whole subject.

It was always the House's action that declared the seat vacant. It it not vacant ipso facto, and the House often refused to act.

This is true in all the precedents.

"In the Van Ness case (Majority Report, p. 57) Van Ness accepted a permanent commission under the President, and the House construed this as a resignation and forfeited his seat.

"Col. Yell (Majority Report, pp. 57 and 33, 34) was commissioned in July, 1846. A successor was elected by his State, and claimed his seat February 8, 1847. The House refused to take the matter up, and adjourned without final action. Yell was killed.

"Col. Baker, who had been away from his seat in the Mexican War, was welcomed back at this same Congress, and sat, the House refusing, on March 3, to take the matter up. (Majority Report, Wheeler's argument, p. 34.) This is the Robbins case exactly, except stronger, for Baker was absent part of two sessions.

"In Byington v. Van Dever, Thirty-seventh Congress (Majority Report, pp. 57, 58), Van Dever took his seat in 1861, was then commissioned colonel, and a resolution against him was reconsidered and never acted on. He sat in Congress during the controversy, at least part of the time.

"In the case of Gen. Schenck (Majority Report, pp. 35, 64, 65, and 66) it was held that, having resigned as brigadier general on November 13, 1863, he could take his seat in December, 1863, although his resignation was more than questionable, and his term began March 4, 1863.

"In the case of Gen. F. P. Blair (same report, pp. 64, 65, and 66) a resolution was submitted by the committee that he had forfeited his seat by not resigning till January 1, 1863, but he remained in that and the following Congress till April 23, 1864, and went back to the war, the resignation having never been accepted, and recalled at his request. Naturally, in June 1864, the House passed a resolution that his seat was vacant, in order to allow a new election and so that it might be occupied at the short session.

"In the Herrick case a United States officer elected to Congress resigned just before the session, and it was held that he could take his seat."

In every case the House has reserved its discretionary power over the subject, either to declare the membership forfeited and order a new election or to leave things as they are.

The action of the House makes the precedent, not the reports of committees.

No good end would now be subserved by declaring memberships forfeited and ordering new elections. A new Congress comes in on the 4th of March. Certainly no practical advantage could now be gained by acting upon the case of the Member who was an officer during the recess and declaring his seat vacant. He is no longer such officer and is able to perform his duty here.

Under the circumstances the question is so purely academic and so devoid of practical good results that the House may well refuse to consider it and to lay down general principles which may come back to plague them in other cases; but under the resolution adopted the Judiciary Committee have no option but to report.

If any action is to be taken, the passage of the following resolutions is recommended as a substitute for those referred to said committee:

"Resolved, That such Members of this House as have been employed as officers in the Volunteer Army of the United States were suspended from membership during such employment, and that they shall not be Members of this House or exercise the functions of such membership during the continuance of said offices, respectively.

"Resolved, That in the case where such office has already ceased before the present session there is no ground for action by this House or for interference with the performance of his duties therein by the Member.

"Resolved, That in view of the likelihood that the other said offices may cease at any time, and the impossibility of holding any election during the present Congress, it is not expedient to take action on the case of those whose membership is still suspended by the holding of such offices."

Respectfully submitted.

Democracy and the Initiative and Referendum.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT CROSSER,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, the subject of democracy and its extension throughout the world has been discussed very frequently during recent months. I therefore, pursuant to leave granted, extend in the RECORD the following remarks made by me on another occasion and at another place:

The task of enabling everybody to enjoy as much freedom as possible without interfering with the rights of others—that is to say, the problem of government—is one which has long been with us, in fact, every since there has been any attempt at government. Many plans have been tried, and practically all have failed.

Yet, after all, any form of government will be found in its final analysis to be based upon one of two principles—either upon theory that those enacting and administering the law should do so without restraint by the governed, or upon the opposite principle that government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed.

Publicly, at least, we in this country are believers in self-government, for whenever we find a fellow who has no patience with self-government he soon abandons us to our fate and, Astorlike, moves to Europe to hunt a job in the governing business.

After much deliberation the founders of the American Commonwealth declared that self-government was the principle upon which it should be and is founded. Accordingly, this Government has long been referred to as the final test of the principle of self-government, and the supporters of autocratic government are already loudly proclaiming that it is conclusive proof of its failure.

However, whatever be the cause, one thing is certain: This Government has not fulfilled the hopes of its founders. Different reasons have been given for the failure, but the fact is that we do not have genuine rule of the people, we have not real self-government.

Nevertheless, instead of agreeing with those who say "Destroy the semblance of self-government we now have; return to monarchy and oligarchy," we say "Give us more democracy, more rule of people instead of less."

Lawmaking by the unrestricted will of delegates or representatives is not self-government. Laws framed by such bodies may indeed sometimes be identical with the will of the people, but not because it is their will. It is only so because the will of the people happens to be the same as that of the legislative body. The people rejoice, indeed, when they find their will takes the form of law, but, on the other hand, they must also supinely submit to those alleged laws which are enacted absolutely contrary to the will of the majority; in other words, without their consent. Government that is thus administered is not self-government, but government by an elective oligarchy, if, indeed, we can call it elective, and therefore contrary to the intentions of those who founded this Government.

Such a method of lawmaking can not in the nature of things be otherwise than contrary to the best interests of the people, for the reason that it is only human nature to serve one's own interests before all others, and men intrusted with final authority in the matter of lawmaking are no exception to the rule. Naturally, self-advancement is foremost in the mind of the person intrusted with legislative power. This being true, the delegate or representative is generally inclined to legislate in favor of those who in turn can and will promote his interests. Inducements are constantly presented to shape his conduct on important measures. Of course, the reward conferred upon the legislator does not always, although often, consist of money.

That which is offered to influence their action upon pending measures may be money, political advancement, social position, the assistance of a friend, and so forth, according to the weakness and necessity of the person receiving the reward.

Few there are who are not influenced by one or other of these considerations, and yet often the legislators nobly resist all such temptations, but are then subjected to other species of torture.

Those seeking special advantage by the passage or defeat of a measure resort, if possible, to threats of blackmail. They have investigated the life of the lawmaker in every detail and have examined his conduct with microscopic care. If they have found some misstep which has not generally become known, or has long since been forgotten, the unfortunate man's honor and good name are threatened with destruction. If he have one who is dear to him and whose welfare he guards almost as his own life, he is warned that such person will suffer if there be found in such one's life the slightest irregularity upon which to base disagreeable publicity and scandal.

Another common method of coercion is to depreciate or threaten the value of the legislator's property; for example, his stocks, if he have any. But why multiply examples; the means of exerting pressure upon the lawmaker are various and drastic, and few there are who can finally escape from the clutches of the vulture. What, then, may we expect to be the nature of important legislation under our present system? Certainly it would generally be responsive to the influences of which we have spoken. This means that those who have wealth and influence can and will mold legislation to their own special advantage; in other words, that important laws will be passed or defeated in order to procure or preserve special privilege. This is true beyond doubt, or the statement that "self-preservation is the first law of nature" is a fallacy or a lie. No one, unless it be "Divine Providence Baer," of anthracite-coal fame, will have the temerity to claim that, but in order to show that we are not talking about mere possibilities, and also that selfishness is still an element of human nature, let us consider a few instances in point.

Not many years ago the Broadway Railway Co. of New York found it a fruitful investment to pay aldermen the sum of $20,000 a piece for the Broadway franchise steal, the total cost of the bribery and lobby expenses being about $500,000, and the company could have afforded to pay many times that amount if it had been necessary in order to procure the franchise.

We go over to Philadelphia and we find that the councils of that city refused to submit to the vote of the people the question of leasing the city's gas works, worth $30,000,000, to the United Gas Co., although an unofficial referendum showed that the voters were 80 to 1 against the lease. The deal was so outrageous that Wayne McVeagh's comment was "Bribed by the rich to rob the poor."

In the same city, when the Reading Railroad Co. was seeking special terminal advantages in Philadelphia, the company put $5,000 at the disposal of each member of the council, and a noted "boss," who was a member, said that there were only three members of that council who did not accept the money, and he was not one of them.

Prof. Bemis tells of a corporation voting $100,000 to buy the Chicago council as nonchalantly as if it were buying a new barn, and says that this is an ordinary thing.

Most of us remember the malodorous Rodgers Street Railway franchise bill passed by the Ohio Assembly some 15 years ago, giving the city councils the power to sell the people's streets for a period of 50 years. The city of Cincinnati, as a result, pays a very high rate of fare for an abominable street railway service. Then there was the famous attempted steal of a railway franchise in Cleveland, which was frustrated when angry citizens marched to the council chamber and in eloquent and earnest language portrayed the possible scene of councilmen dangling from telephone poles, and so dampened the ardor of the council for the proposed franchise that they failed to pass it. And so we might continue with examples if further illustration were necessary.

So we see that the legislator, both the one who is crooked and the one who honestly endeavors to serve the best interests of the people, is constantly confronted by temptation in various forms; if this does not overcome him he is met with threats and blackmail, and if neither of these are attempted he must then spend time in dissecting fallacious arguments and resisting urgent appeals. No one who has not had experience as a legislator can fully understand how great an annoyance and hindrance all this becomes.

Another objection to the unrestrained power of representatives to make laws is that the legislator naturally looks at things from his own particular surroundings and position in life, and is therefore inclined to act as if people in general were situated like himself. For example, the banker looks at things through banker's glasses; the merchant thinks everyone in pretty much the same condition as himself; so with the professional man, farmer, and others. This has a tendency, therefore, to cause such representative to legislate favorably to his own class.

But an evil which is more common still is the practice among legislators of trading votes, or log rolling, as it is generally called. Thus a member will procure the vote and support of his fellows for a measure in which he is vitally interested, perhaps because he thinks it to the advantage of his own constituents and therefore to his own political advantage. He in turn agrees to support the measures of those who at his solicitation support his. The result is that the majority of laws are enacted for the purpose of favoring some locality, but of necessity apply to the whole State, so that we have laws forced upon cities which are only needed in the country and laws thrust upon the farmer which only the city requires, and many which are not generally useful to either.

Now, we who believe in direct legislation claim that the initiative and referendum would remedy practically all of these evils. We do not deny, but, on the other hand, insist that the whole people are selfish and would endeavor to act in their own interest just as the legislator is selfish and tries to promote his own welfare. But, on the other hand, the selfish interest of the whole would naturally procure legislation desired by the whole people or a great majority of them.

In the first place, legislation would not be adopted by trading of votes or logrolling, as in legislative assemblies. When the electors of the whole State would go to the polls to vote upon a certain measure submitted to them for their consideration, each would vote in such a way as he thought would be better for his own interest, and accordingly we would get at least a majority satisfied with the approval or disapproval of the measure under consideration. This is, as we have shown, practically impossible in the legislative assembly, for a great many members are always willing to support the measure that is not desired by their constituents in order to get the support of other members for a measure he desires passed.

Then, again, the use of money would practically avail those desiring the success or failure of a measure in no way, because the temptation could not be concentrated against a few men, as is the case with the legislative body, and it would be an impossibility to bribe the whole electorate. For this reason the greatest evil we have, namely, legislation for a special class of interest, would be practically an impossibility.

"But," say the opponents of this plan, "you are destroying our representative system." On the contrary, we insist that the initiative and referendum would purify and strengthen our representative system, for it would be useless to bribe the representative or councilman, for the simple reason that if they did so the person so bribed could not deliver the goods he had been paid for, because the people, if dissatisfied with the passage of a measure would simply file their objection in the form of a petition, demanding the submission of the measure to the vote of the people; and if the legislation should be rejected by the people the briber would have paid his money for nothing. This being true, of course, members of the legislative assemblies would be let alone, and could, as most would do if not interfered with, follow their best ideal as to matters of government.

Then it would be a short time until the legislative body would be under no suspicion, and it would become an honor for any man to serve therein. Thus men of character and ability would gladly strive for election to office, and for the same reason men of low type that seek office for illicit gain would neither care to strive for office nor be elected if they did desire.

When this system has become thoroughly established representatives will then perform their proper function, the one function which is consistent with truly representative government, and that is to act as experts and to give expert advice, but not to dictate the policy of the government. And this is right, for can we imagine any person going to a lawyer or a doctor and permitting him to do anything further than recommend what should be done? The professional man realizes that it is his duty only to advise, but that it is the patron's right to say whether he will pursue the course outlined by his adviser.

Another advantage which will be derived from the system of direct legislation is that men will have greater respect for the law. This is true for several reasons. People always have more pride in that in which they have had a hand in creating. Men are always inclined to bow to the law of a real majority if for no other reason than the fact they feel that public sentiment is against them, and, as the whole people decide what the law shall be, none suspects undue influence as he does in the case of a legislative body.

Then, again, having discussed and heard the reasons for the enactment of a law by direct vote of the people, they thus understand the justice of it, or what seems just to the majority, and are accordingly inclined to respect it, while the great majority know nothing of the reasons for a law enacted by a legislative body.

It would also be the strongest bulwark against anarchy and appeal to passion for the reason that the knowledge on the part of each that the great majority of his neighbors had made the law would be a moral influence which would overcome such inclination as he might have to lawlessness.

Another advantage gained by the system of direct legislation would be that it would adjust law to public opinion, and this is an essential element to all vital law, for, after all, that which has no public opinion behind it has little force as a law.

We would also make a decided gain for good government in that the ignorant or indifferent voter would be automatically disfranchised, as would also be the bigoted partisan, because such men are interested in political matters only when there are jobs and spoils at stake, and would, accordingly, take no interest in an election upon a measure. Bitter partisanship would be destroyed, for, regardless of the person who might be elected to office, the people themselves would always retain the right to legislate, and so public officials of necessity would be honest, and, because of the removal of temptation, would stay honest. If particularly capable, the man of one party could be kept in office on account of his efficiency regardless of his partisan policy, because the people could dictate their own policy and let him do as was intended—administer the details of his office. Thus a good man once in office would be enabled to become an expert, and continue to hold the office, because the people would not be compelled to turn him out of office in order to adopt a policy different from that in which he believed.

But, best of all, direct legislation would develop civic conscience and intelligent participation in public affairs, because nothing develops skill so much as practice, and the constant participation in and discussion of proposed measures would develop political interest and sagacity in the whole people. Men thus coming to understand the problems of government would, in their enlightenment and confidence in political matters, demand and make the Government more responsive to the public needs.

Many people object to the initiative and referendum on the ground that the people do not know enough to make their laws, but certainly they could not make many more blunders than the average legislative body. At any rate, the people could understand a law which has been submitted to them in terms as well as they could understand and decide upon the question whether or not the man whom they choose to represent them is sufficiently wise, informed, and honest. In other words, they could understand a complicated law which is written out for them better than they could understand a complicated man. Surely it is not to be claimed that the average citizen is expert only in the art of choosing officials.

But, fortunately, we have the most respectable authority in favor of our proposition.

Thomas Jefferson, Notes on the State of Virginia, page 195:

The concentrating these in the same hands is precisely the definition of despotic government. It will be no alleviation that these powers will be exercised by a plurality of hands and not by a single one. One hundred and seventy-three despots would surely be as oppressive as one. Let those who doubt it turn their eyes on the Republic of Venice. As little will it avail us that they are chosen by ourselves. An elective despotism was not the Government we fought for.

Thomas Jefferson said:

Believing, as I do, that the mass of citizens is the safest depository of their rights, and especially that evils flowing from the duperies of the people are less injurious than those from the egotism of their agents, I am a friend to that composition of government which has in it the most of this ingredient. An elective despotism was not the Government we fought for.

Abraham Lincoln said:

A government of the people, by the people, and for the people.
According to our ancient faith, the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed.

The Kansas City Star of October 2, 1910, has a translation of stenographic notes by A. H. McCormick of a conversation by Lincoln with a general, as follows:

General, the day will come, but it will not be in your day or mine, when every State in this Union will have the initiative and referendum. When that day comes the people will rule; the people will rule.

James Russell Lowell says:

Democracy gives every man the right to be his own tyrant.

Emerson says:

Law is a memorandum of public sentiment.

But the cry that "the people are too ignorant to govern themselves" has always been the last word of the enemy against every effort and claim for self-government, progress, and justice. This has been the roar of the tyrant at his helpless subjects; this was in the reply of King George to the American Colonies; this has been the hypocritical whine of special advantage seekers and their nauseous puppets and minions, and this, gentlemen, is the masterly explanation given to the American people by their benevolent, all-wise and, of course, unpresumptuous servants in legislative halls assembled. Self-government! Declaration of Independence! Both wrong.

Shall modest, sensible men, men of independent mind, subscribe to such a heresy? No! A thousand times, no!

Let us begin the rebuke of such an infamous doctrine. Let us speed that bright day when the spirit of equality shall fill every heart, when the goddess of justice shall reign supreme in the land, when every man shall pay her homage, and when the light of brotherly love shall shine from every eye.

Then shall the men assembled in legislative halls as the honored counselors of the whole people say to the self-seekers and their servants who skulk in the shadows of the Capitol with specious pleas for special privilege, "Begone! We have neither power or wish to give title to what you seek, nor will your offers of reward and your threats of calamity and destruction avail you. Away! Take your cause to our great sovereign, the people; we are but sentinels to warn our masters against invaders of their fair estate."

And to the suffering, miserable, humble men who come, followed by weeping wives and clamoring children; to these men who ask only that they may be heard in the forum of mankind as to the theft of their birthright, to them shall they say, "Yes; you shall be heard. Aye, more, we shall plead your cause before that great jury, the people."

Let us continue the war upon oligarchy until the enemy has been routed from every intrenchment and self-government has been established in city, State, and Nation. The fight will be bitter, but—

Courage, then, ye men yet strong;
Gird up your loins, go join the throng;
Battle for freedom, long sung by the muse;
Leave not a foeman; heed no flag of truce.

And when the din of battle's o'er,
And selfish greed shall reign no more,
We'll hasten forth proclaiming then
Peace on earth, good will toward men.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT CROSSER,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, at the close of my six years of service in the House of Representatives, I wish to speak very briefly in regard to some of the measures of which I was author and which I urged during that time. My advocacy of these measures indicates in a general way the public policy in which I believe.

The more important measures proposed by me involve principles fundamentally different from what has been the policy of the Government heretofore.

The bill H. R. 289, providing for the ownership and operation of the Washington street railways by the city itself, as is well known, aroused a great deal of antagonism. Every public utility in the United States, either directly or indirectly, fought the passage of this bill. After a long struggle, however, the bill was favorably reported by the committee, and a carefully written report, urging the passage of the same, was filed. The chairman of the committee, however, was sincerely opposed to the measure and declined to call it up for consideration by the House.

The discussion which was aroused by the introduction of the bill, and the hearings which were held upon the same, without doubt did more than anything else in recent days to create public sentiment for the principle of city ownership of public utilities doing business in the city.

Another bill introduced by me (H. R. 5668), known as the colonization bill, involved a complete change in the policy of this Government as to the method of disposing of the public lands. The Government has always pursued the policy of giving away the public lands to private individuals, without providing any means which would enable the settler to make the necessary improvements. The consequence has been that in a short time the lands in question were bought up by a few people and monopolized, thus preventing the best use of the land. The Crosser colonization bill, on the other hand, provided for the leasing of public lands to individuals at a yearly rent calculated not to exceed 4 per cent of the value of the land. The bill provided further for the loan of money by the Government for the purpose of making improvements on the land, and a maximum time of 50 years was provided in which to pay back the money to the Government.

The plan proposed by this bill would have done more to insure the systematic development of the remaining public lands than any system heretofore proposed, and would have enabled the people occupying the lands to procure the full value of the product of their toil. The persons getting land from the Government under the terms of the bill would be guaranteed possession as long as they should pay the yearly charge, and could at any time sell to others whatever interest they might have in the improvements made by them on the land. This plan would make it certain that the land would be used.

Another measure which I introduced was H. R. 4024, providing for a direct tax on the value of land in the United States, for the purpose of raising $2,000,000,000 of revenue. The object of the bill was to compel the use of land and to prevent speculation in the sale of land. The present system of taxation in force in the different States of the United States increases the tax burden on those who make the improvements and those who use the land and encourages men to hold land out of use. In a speech delivered in the House on May 22, 1917, I gave more fully the reasons why a tax on land values would benefit the people and why the present system retards progress, decreases wages, and prevents men from getting the full value of their labor. Those who have a monopoly of the natural resources of the country, and those who speculate in land, have always been and probably will continue to be bitterly opposed to such measure as this, because it strikes at the very foundation of the evil which enables them to accumulate riches from the toil of others.

Another measure which I introduced and advocated was H. R. 20147, providing for the Government manufacture of all war materials and for prohibiting all private individuals from manufacturing such materials. The purpose of prohibiting the manufacture of such materials by private individuals is to destroy the incentive they would otherwise have to agitate for war. It is considerable satisfaction to me to know that the peace conference has determined on this policy for the nations of the world, and the action of the delegates to the peace conference fully supports my contention. The men at the peace conference are convinced that private profit from the production of war materials has been one of the chief causes of war.

The measures to which I have referred are, as I have already said, all measures which involve a very fundamental and, as some call it, radical change of policy, and it was perhaps too much to expect that it would be possible to bring about a sufficient change in public sentiment throughout the country to induce the representatives of the people to abandon their opposition to them.

If one desires simply to procure the passage of bills, he had better content himself with the introduction of the usual kind of measures, making slight changes in the details of laws. For my own part I prefer to carry on the fight, however long it may be, for fundamental changes in the laws relating to our economic and social welfare, although I know that public men who undertake to bring about a change in the laws which enable the few to accumulate vast wealth out of the toil of the many has laid out a hard task for himself.

We have been confronted by many difficult questions during the present war Congress. Practically none but war measures were considered during this Congress, and no more difficult question presented itself than the conscription issue. I became thoroughly convinced that the principle of conscription was contrary to the spirit of American institutions, and expressed my disapproval of the principle in a speech made in the House on April 26, 1917. I knew at the time, of course, that I was giving the powerful special-privilege seekers and their flunkies an excuse for attacking me, and it was urged by some of my friends that I was making an unnecessary sacrifice in opposing the measure. The question of life and death is, however, big enough to justify any sacrifice. It was urged by the newspapers of the big interests that conscription was the most democratic and equitable way of providing an army. In my disagreement from that contention I find myself supported by Premier Lloyd George, head of the British peace delegation, who, near the close of the British campaign for the election of members of Parliament, announced as the policy of his administration that one of the first things the British Government would insist upon at the peace conference was the abolition of conscription throughout the world. This was the statement of one of the leading men of the allied nations, with which the United States fought side by side.

If conscription were so just and democratic as its advocates claimed it to be, then, since the war was fought to make the world safe for democracy, and the peace conference is writing the policy of insurance for its safety, why is it that after having had experience with conscription the delegates from all of the allied nations are determined to abolish the policy of conscription? I do not dispute the right of others to differ from me and to advocate the compulsory military system if they believe it to be wise, and I know that Members of the House advocating that system concede my right to differ from them on the subject, and also acknowledge the force of the argument against the compulsory military system. I am sure also that they must frankly admit that conscription is neither a democratic method nor an American method of raising an army.

Land for Soldiers.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. BAER,

OF NORTH DAKOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, I greatly regret that this third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress will adjourn without passing the urgent legislation required to adequately meet the imperative needs of the reconstruction period. There are many important bills which have been before the committee for months and which should have been brought out upon this floor. They would have passed this body with very little opposition on either the Republican or Democratic side of the House. I have introduced a bill to give to all soldiers, sailors, and marines one year's additional pay. I have indisputable evidence that an overwhelming number of discharged soldiers, especially the men with families and other dependents to support, are in need of funds to reinstate them in civil life. Some can not even get to their homes. It is my intention to reintroduce the bill and urge its immediate passage at the coming extra session which is inevitable owing to the vast amount of necessary legislation which will immediately be required to meet the afterwar problems. It was my earnest hope that the bill would pass, so as to meet the present needs of the situation until legislation could be enacted that would adequately provide for the future welfare of the men who have served their country with great honor to themselves and credit to our Nation.

It is also to be regretted that the session comes to a close without passing the so-called Lane bill or some similar legislation to make it possible for our returning heroes to obtain homes and useful employment. I have also introduced a bill which supplements the recommendations of the Secretary of the Interior and multiplies opportunities for the discharged soldier. The measure provides that these men who so gallantly offered their lives to our Nation shall have an opportunity for education and training in the vocational lines which they desire to follow. I have talked to over 300,000 soldiers in the camps, and I believe I have had an unusual privilege to sense their needs. I know that many have been awakened to the great advantages they are able to obtain under our free institutions. We should open the door of opportunity to all men who desire to better their conditions. I believe that there will be much severe criticism of the present administration for not having a definite program of reconstruction and for delaying the legislation which is so important in order to meet the critical conditions which become increasingly more difficult to solve. It is true, many bills were brought in during the closing hours when there was not sufficient time to give them due consideration, but this does not remove the just criticism for their delay.

I have received hundreds of letters from soldiers who inquire about the proposed land for soldiers. There will now be a delay of months and perhaps a year because we have not been given a chance to consider problems which should have been taken up a year ago.

Other countries have a definite program which they are carrying out at the present time. They have not only legislated to take care of their domestic questions, but also are doing everything possible to increase their foreign commerce. In both our domestic and commercial matters our country has stood still for over a year.

Let us see what our neighbor Canada is doing. Canada has caused the expropriation of all parcels of lands over one section in area owned by speculators not working the same to be projected by the Federal Government in order to give the returned men a square deal on the land-settlement question. Under the new scheme a soldier may purchase land up to the value of $5,000, free from interest for two years, and the Government will finance the men if they prove that they are experienced farmers. They can raise a further loan of $1,000 for building. When a farm is bought by a returned soldier in this manner the Government will break 50 acres, if that amount is not already broken, and this, with the loans, will give the soldiers a great start toward becoming owners of land and successful farmers. There will be no restrictions on the locations of the farms desired by the soldiers. Inexperienced men will be given a course in agriculture in practical conditions in order to fit them for running a modern farm.

A soldier settlement board of three members was appointed in February, 1919, following upon the act of August 29, 1917, called "An act to assist returned soldiers in settling upon the land and to increase agricultural production." The essential features of this act are the bestowal of agricultural credit when needed by soldiers in any part of the Dominion and the gift of Dominion land in western Canada. The credit may be used for acquiring and improving land, for the payment of incumbrances, erection of buildings, purchase of stocks, and so forth.

The sum of $2,916,000 has been appropriated by parliament for the purposes of this act.

The Australian States have had a relatively long experience in the purchase, subdivision, and settlement of lands; they can, in general, do little more for the soldier than they have done for the settler since 1901, except to hasten the development of new areas of land and to increase the rate of purchase. Between 1901 and 1914 the six Australian States purchased and subdivided 3,056,957 acres, for which $55,243,125 was paid, or about $18 an acre. Settlers were also assisted to build homes and to make needed improvements. Between 1909 and 1914, $68,029,500 was loaned for improvements. The Commonwealth Government alone advanced £100,000 to settlers in 1917–18. It expects to advance £2,000,000 in 1918–19.

The Australian Dominion Government was the first to draft a fully adequate law to repatriate the soldier, be he maimed or whole bodied. The repatriation act of 1916 was intended to consolidate and stabilize the private patriotic funds which were being accumulated in the several States and were being adminstered locally. The Government added to the sums collected by the States, making a total fund of £359,355. This was used for relief and vocational service of all kinds, including small sums for the reestablishment of shops and small farms.

The next step was a beginning toward actual settlement. In consideration of the number of men in the army who have expressed a desire to take up land the Government contemplates an expenditure of £20,000,000—an equivalent for the population of the United States of about $2,000,000,000 to place soldiers upon the land.

New Zealand, a very progressive colony, has a splendid record of legislation for returned veterans. Lands for soldiers are of two classes, ordinary tenures being areas for general farming and sheep runs, and special tenure being small acreage near towns and cities, largely for disabled soldiers. Lands under ordinary tenures are purchased or set apart by proclamation. These may be obtained for cash, occupation with right of purchase, renewal lease, or small grazing run lease, as the case may be.

In the year 1917, 276,290 acres were set apart for the soldiers.

The Government has provided suburban land suitable for market gardening, poultry farms; small areas of rural land, adapted to beekeeping; small farms, suitable for dairying, fruit growing, and so forth; large holdings, suitable for mixed farming; and pastoral country, for grazing only.

Thus we see that the other English-speaking countries are far in advance of our country in solving the land problem. They have not only made arrangements for farm lands, but they are also establishing just marketing conditions. Their economic program of efficient distribution is similar in every way to the plan of the Nonpartisan League in North Dakota.

This work should not be postponed. This Congress has already appropriated $200,000 for an examination into the reclaimable land resources of the country. I supported that appropriation and shall gladly support a measure for additional funds to actually carry out the plans of the Secretary of the Interior. My only regret is that the Secretary, who is a member of the President's Cabinet, and whose party is in control of both branches of Congress, did not bring in a bill six months ago instead of in the few remaining hours of a strenuous session, in which we considered and passed more bills which included greater appropriations than any other legislature in the world's history.

I believe that both for securing homes for the soldiers and furnishing employment that the proposed legislation will be very beneficial to our country. Increased production is now needed more than ever to meet our gigantic costs in the war.

After the Civil War the homestead act proved to be a magic wand in settling the West. The public domain formed the safety valve of economic discontent. But now we face a new problem. Since the sixties there has sprung up in this country a monopolistic control of our markets. Profiteers, gamblers, and speculators have clogged the channels of trade. They must be removed or we shall find that the new farmers will not stay upon the proposed farms. Some of the defects in our old system have been described by Dr. Elwood Mead in these words:

Science (should) have gone hand in hand with the settlement of the arid and semiarid country, and all that science could give would have been utilized, first in the creation of the conditions of settlement and then in aiding the settler in difficult tasks. Because nothing was done these heroic but uniformed souls were bedeviled by the winds, cold, drought, and insect pests. They wasted their efforts, lost their hopes and ambitions, and a tragic percentage left impoverished and embittered. The tragic part of this history is that nearly all this suffering and loss could have been avoided under a carefully thought-out plan of development.

Those soldiers who are sons of farmers, and they are chiefly the ones who will take up the land, already know the injustice and iniquities in our present method of distribution. They know the farmer only received 36 cents out of a normal dollar and now only 18 cents out of a "50-cent" dollar.

With the great land movement must come a new economic freedom, or the whole comprehensive scheme of back to the land will fail. Other nations are now meeting this problem. It is time that we, right here in this Congress, take action. As I said, North Dakota is solving it. They are doing just what the people in the cities did when private corporations charged exorbitant rates for water supply, gas, electricity, and other utilities. They are going to have State ownership of the marketing facilities to handle the natural flow of their grain to eastern markets, just as the people in the cities obtained municipal ownership of utilities when they wanted cheap rates on gas, water, and electricity. One is no more radical than the other.

In just the degree that the private monopolies increase their greed and profits the people will increase their demand for publicly owned marketing facilities. On the other hand, the cry for Federal and State ownership will decrease in the same degree that the utility and marketing monopolies become less selfish and become the efficient servants and not exploiting robbers of the people.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

HON. PERL D. DECKER,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 2, 1919.

The House had under consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. WILLIAM J. STONE, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Missouri, and the Hon. JACOB E. MEEKER, late a Member of this House from the State of Missouri.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of their distinguished public careers, the House, at the conclusion of the exercises of this day, shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the families of the deceased."

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Speaker, I find it in my heart to say a word relative, first, to our colleague from Missouri, Mr. MEEKER. I did not know him well in life, and it would not be appropriate for me to speak with authority as to his personal character and from the standpoint of an intimate friend.

We differed radically, he and I. He was a Republican and I am a Democrat. I am a prohibitionist and he was not. But whatever he advocated he advocated with all his force and without fear. I have tried to do the same as to the things in which I believe. And for this reason my late colleague, Mr. MEEKER, of Missouri, commanded my respect. As to his ability, it was unquestioned, not only from the work which he did in this House but upon the platform throughout Missouri advocating the things for which he stood.

There is a characteristic relative to Mr. MEEKER with which I am familiar. I feel that only justice to him commands that I should speak. Mr. MEEKER was at one time a minister of the Gospel, but in spite of that he claimed the right and exercised the right to speak against prohibition. This brought down upon his head a storm of protest and a storm of opposition that was great. I for one wish to say that I acknowledged his right to do this, though prohibitionist I have been from my cradle and expect to be to my grave. Prohibition never was and never will be a religious question. I always acknowledged the right of Mr. MEEKER to speak as a minister of the Gospel, as a lawyer, and as a Congressman against the principles in which I believed as to prohibition.

I knew his viewpoint on this, because I had the pleasure of talking with him about it one afternoon coming from St. Louis to Washington, and I gathered from him the thing that consumed his mind and heart. It was not so much the question of drinking liquor; it was his opposition to the idea of substituting religious dogma for reason. He denied the right of any church to tell him how he should vote on any proposition. In this he was right. I have always believed that men have weakened the prohibition cause by trying to make it a tenet of Christianity. It is an economic and a political question. I did not agree with Mr. MEEKER as to his position on prohibition, but I always respected his ability, and I reserved to him the right to speak his sentiments, the same right that I claim for myself. I am glad of one thing, that shortly after the controversy which, as you remember, he and I had in the House, though neither of us recanted our views or withdrew anything we said as to the principles for which we stood, yet we spoke and parted as good friends. And it was with pain, it was with deep regret, that a few days later I received the news, at Joplin, that my colleague had passed on to "the undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns."

I am glad to stand here in this Hall and speak these words of appreciation which I had for him.

I desire to pay my tribute, with the rest of my colleagues, to that great Missourian whom we all honored and whom we all loved, Senator STONE. It would be almost impertinent for me to try to analyze his character and his history, because he was in public life as long or longer than I have been in this world. His career in public life began about the time that I was born. I did not know him when he was a Representative in Congress from the district which I have the honor now to represent. I did not know him when he was governor of Missouri. I am not familiar personally with all the storms and contests in Missouri through which he passed. My first acquaintance with him which could in truthfulness be called intimate began after my election to this high body.

To speak of his ability is unnecessary. It has never been disputed; it has never been questioned, either in Missouri or in the United States. But I do want to speak of the thing which to me stands out preeminently above every other characteristic which this great man possessed. CHAMP CLARK, the beloved Missourian, has said "That no man is fit to be a lawgiver for a mighty Nation who yields to the demands and solicitations of the few who may have access to his ear, but is unmindful of the vast multitude who may never hear his voice or look into his face."

When the things which CHAMP CLARK has said on history, when the things said about him as the beloved Speaker of this House and leader of democracy have been forgotten, that one utterance of his, in my humble opinion, will make him live in history. For it is as true to-day, as it has always been, that the pen is mightier than the sword. No man is fit to be a lawgiver of a mighty nation who yields to the demands and solicitations of the few who may have access to his ear, but is unmindful of the vast multitude who may never hear his voice or look into his face. In that brief sentence you find the guiding star of Missouri's great Senator, WILLIAM JOEL STONE.

And why avoid the question? We are all friends here to-day, are we not? You know to-day when you mention the name of Senator STONE you do not think of him as Representative, you do not think of him as prosecuting attorney of one of the great counties of my district, you do not think of him as governor, you do not think of him as Senator; you think of him and the part he played in the great struggle of all the world that has just been brought to a termination. This is not the time nor place to discuss whether Senator STONE was right or wrong. But to me it would be a mockery, to me it would be a sham, if I stood here in this great legislative Hall to-day and was silent as to the great part he played in that titanic struggle. The majority will say that he was wrong. Let him who can weigh the value of a human life and a human career, and then multiply it by 50,000—to say nothing of the courses which lie ahead of our great Nation—let him who can measure human life say, with dogmatic and arrogant authority, that our great Senator from Missouri was wrong. But whether or not you can say in your heart that he was wrong in what he did, you can not deny that he thought he was right; and in this solemn hour when his colleagues in public life pay tribute to his memory, I dare to stand and resent to all the world the slander, the villification, the abuse that was heaped upon him from the public press and from the rostrum and from the pulpit of my country for doing with courage the things that he thought were right.

I pay tribute to the men who followed the different course, which they thought right. It took courage for them to do different from what Senator STONE thought should be done. But in this solemn hour when we pay tribute to this great man, who sleeps the last long sleep in the peaceful country churchyard in the district which I have the honor to represent, I dare to proclaim anew the doctrine that any man who sits in the Senate of the United States from Missouri and does not on every question, especially the vital question of peace or war, do what he thinks is right is a traitor to Missouri and is unworthy of the senatorial toga of that great State.

And so it was that in the last hours of his eventful life, with the marks of age taking hold of him, when his feet were close to the river's brink, his heart became more mellow, his feelings for those who opposed him more gentle, his infinite patience and kindness to his fellow men, as it seemed to me, increased. But, thanks be to God, who giveth the victory, there was no diminution of his lionlike courage and of his ability to fight for what he thought was good for old Missouri and for the people, high or humble, of the United States. He went down as a true Senator from Missouri—went down not with feebleness, not with faltering, but with the courage of a man who realizes the dignity of his office and the solemnity of the responsibilities imposed upon him.

Sleep on, brave Senator from Missouri! You followed the even tenor of your way in the last hours of your life, when I knew you well. You followed it imperturbed by the tempests of prejudice and passion which raged about you, unshaken by the storm of villification and abuse that beat over your aged head. Your heart to the very last was kindly and loving and affectionate for the people of Missouri and the people of the world, and even for those who abused and misunderstood you.

History will be written some day. How high a place you will have on that page I do not know, brave Senator from Missouri. But this I do know: That when the storms of misrepresentation, when the blasts of prejudice and misunderstanding, have passed and gone, the people of Missouri and the people of this country will pay just appreciation to you as a great man who in the last hours of his life lived up to Missouri's traditions and did what he thought was right, not for the sake of political preferment but for the sake of those of whom the other great Missourian, CHAMP CLARK, spoke when he said: "No man is fit to be a lawgiver of a mighty nation who yields to the demands and solicitations of the few who may have access to his ear and is unmindful of the vast multitude who may never hear his voice or look into his face."

OF

HON. ROBERT CROSSER,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, people engage in business for the purpose of satisfying their desires, and the natural law which prompts one to serve his own interests primarily is invariably operative in the conduct of any business. This human tendency, if unrestrained, would cause those engaged in vending any sort of merchandise or service to demand all that the person desiring the merchandise or service would be willing or able to give for it. It so happens, however, that in all ordinary lines of business we have a great many persons who are able to supply the same kind of merchandise or render the same service, and as each is anxious to do the business, that is, make the sale or render the service for profit, this rivalry or competition reduces the price of the merchandise or service in question as far as possible and still yields a reasonable profit. Where, however, any service must necessarily and properly be performed by an agency enjoying the sole right to serve the public generally, the natural law involved in competition can, of course, play no part. Public utility service, so called, should be rendered by an agency enjoying a monopoly of the right to render such service, and this is generally the case. The question then arises whether this monopoly right should be exercised by private individuals or institutions or by public agencies.

Now, it is conceded that the prime, and really the only motive in private enterprise, is profit. The greater the profit the more successful is the business from the standpoint of the person or persons who own the business. The greatest profit is derived by exacting the highest price which the person desiring service or merchandise is willing to pay in order to get it, or by giving as little service or goods as possible for what the buyer can pay, which amounts to the same thing. That is the natural tendency of the private individual or individuals enjoying the sole right to supply any public service unless there is some check.

Of course, from the very beginning the private owners of public utilities have been subjected to certain restrictions as to the price to be charged the consumer, the manner in which the service should be extended, and so forth. It was self-evident that some such conditions should be imposed upon the private owners, since otherwise, as I have already stated, they would practice extortion, render inferior and inadequate service, and so forth. The natural desire to serve their own interest, however, by procuring the greatest profit possible, in the very beginning caused, and still causes, those desiring the exclusive privilege of operating a public utility to employ every means for the purpose of inducing the municipal authorities to grant the privilege in question upon terms as favorable as possible to parties desiring the right to operate the public utility. The municipal authorities, however, unless subjected to some particular influence which would induce them to do otherwise, naturally would be disposed to see that the public were fully protected. The persons desiring the particular privilege in question, therefore, begin to devise ways and means of influencing the municipal authorities to grant the privilege of supplying the service upon terms satisfactory to the persons seeking the exclusive privilege in question.

The most obvious method, and the one generally employed in the early history of the public utility, is to offer some sort of a reward to the officials having authority to grant the private person or company the privilege desired by them. Almost every important city in the United States has had its experience with this sort of corruption of its public officials.

In his book entitled "Facts and Opinions," ex-Mayor Hazen S. Pingree, of Detroit, says that the Citizens Railway Co. of that city "literally owns the council, body and soul." He states that it would pay $3,000 for a member of the city council, and actually offered to buy the mayor of the city for $75,000.

In New York City the Broadway surface franchise was secured by influencing the councilmen in the manner referred to, and those councilmen rejected the offer of the Cable Railway Co. to pay the city of New York a bonus of $1,000,000, but the aldermen, in order to enrich themselves, refused to grant the franchise to the cable company, although it would have meant a million dollars to the taxpayers of New York City. Upon investigation it was shown that the aldermen were given $20,000 apiece, and that the total expense of this nature to the railway company was $500,000. These we find to be the facts in the report of commissioners of railroads relative to the Broadway Surface Railroad Co., as set forth in New York senate document No. 79, in the year 1888.

We all remember the San Francisco scandal, which resulted in a number of prominent men being indicted and some convicted.

Sometimes, however, public officials are found who can not be tempted by the offer of any reward, and in such cases it is frequently found that the persons striving to procure the so-called franchise or similar privilege, undertake the intimidation of the official or officials who have manfully refused their bribes.

But it is unnecessary to discuss all of the different methods employed to accomplish the one purpose, viz, the procuring of the monopoly privilege on terms which are satisfactory to those seeking such privilege. Even after they have procured the right in question, the tendency is to operate their plant in such a manner as proves unsatisfactory to the public generally. In order to increase their profits, they naturally try to minimize the expense of operation as much as possible, and this means deterioration in service.

It is a common saying among street railway managers, for example, that "strap hangers make dividends." Schedules are reduced in order to reduce the expense. The wages of employees are kept down as much as possible so as to leave as great a profit in the hands of the company as possible. These are a few of the evils resulting from private ownership and operation of public utilities. There is, however, one other objection which I have not mentioned but which seems to me to be one of the most serious of all.

It will be conceded by all that most persons want men in public office who hold views similar to their own, and who will conduct themselves in their official capacity in such a manner as will promote their interests. This fact causes men who must procure special privileges in order to conduct their business, as is the case with every public utility, to exercise their influence and exert themselves toward the election or appointment to public office of men who will be favorably disposed to the interests of those who must have special privileges. Men of this type, elected or appointed to public office, will, of course, feel inclined to pay the obligation which they feel they owe to those who interested themselves in their election or appointment. Now, men who can be relied upon to do the bidding of any special interest, either because they owe their election or appointment to the influence of that interest, or because of some reward offered for compliance with the request of such interests, are certainly not men of strong moral fiber, but, on the contrary, are generally weak and inefficient. As a result we have not only maladministration by such officers as to the public utilities, the owners of which have befriended them, but also an inefficient administration in regard to all other matters, for men who are weak enough to be controlled by such special interests have not the force and sense of justice which would qualify them to administer the ordinary affairs of government impartially and efficiently. Men who are weak enough to bargain away the people's rights for political support received before election, or for material reward offered after election or appointment, are not the kind of men who have the clear vision and the high ideals necessary to enable them to perform the duties of public office in the proper manner.

While those persons having an interest in privately owned public utilities have no desire to have a bad police system, or inefficient school system, or a bad administration in any of the ordinary lines of municipal activities, and may, in fact, be trying hard to "clean up the city government," as they call it, in these respects, and to give us what they delight to call a "business administration," nevertheless, in so far as they may find it necessary for their own interests, to put weak and pliable men into public office, just so far have they been the cause of the inefficient government in all of the other respects mentioned.

But the evils of private ownership have, for several years now, been generally acknowledged, even by the more intelligent men directly interested in privately owned public utilities. They realize the force of the objections and the arguments made against the institutions with which they are identified, and, in order to postpone the day of reckoning as far as possible, they are now constantly urging regulation as the proper remedy for the evils which invariably accompany private ownership. It is somewhat amusing to note how eager and vociferous are the demands of those private owners for regulation. It seems to be assumed by them that regulation was never attempted by public authority during the early history of public utilities, whereas the fact is that from the very beginning they have been subject to certain legal restrictions. The terms of the franchise, the traffic regulations, etc., were all efforts at regulation. What is really desired and proposed by these private concerns is simply a little different form of regulation. They would have the regulating authority transferred from the city council, or similar authority, to some State board. In fact, Mr. Rosecrantz, general counsel for the public utilities companies of Milwaukee, frankly says that he objects to regulation by local authority.

We all know that city councils have now become much more sensitive to the people's will and that the people of the cities are beginning to understand very thoroughly their rights in regard to public utilities. It is, therefore, natural that those who are so loudly clamoring to be regulated want the regulating authority as far away from the seat of war as possible and desire a board whose authority is not derived from the people who must deal with the privately owned utility.

Practically every objection which has been shown to apply to private ownership and operation of street railways under the franchise plan of controlling the privately owned utility applies to the later method of regulation. It is just as natural for those who must use the public property to conduct their business to make every effort possible to prevent the new kind of regulation from diminishing their profits as it was under the old system of regulation. They are just as anxious to have members of public utility commissions appointed or elected who are satisfactory to them and to their interests as they were in the old days to have councilmen or aldermen who were satisfactory to them. They want men who can be relied upon to regulate them in the way they want to be regulated. In short, we can not change human nature by changing the name of the regulating authority.

This is not all theory, either. The history of regulation has been marked by constant resistance against every important order or measure made for the purpose of accomplishing anything substantial in the way of control. The Cullom Act, which was enacted in 1887 for the purpose of regulating interstate commerce, was followed by the Spokane case, which was decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission in favor of the city of Spokane. Immediately the case was taken into the courts, where it remained for a long time, the fourth section of the law being finally declared unconstitutional. The Dolliver-Hepburn Act was then passed, in 1906, to meet the objection which the court found in the Cullom Act. The city of Spokane filed another case similar to the one first mentioned, but the main question was not finally decided until after the lapse of seven or eight years.

It is claimed by the defenders of private ownership of public utilities that while the private companies have sinned in the past and have been guilty of the wrongs to which I have already referred, they now have reformed and are conducting themselves as good people should do; in short, that they have practically forgotten self-interest and are simply interesting themselves in the public weal. It is not necessary to look very far for glaring proof to the contrary. A little over a year ago the railroad commission of San Francisco, in passing upon the application of the United Railroads of San Francisco for permission to issue $2,350,000 five-year notes for the purpose of paying off certain of its bonds, found that the United Railroads had exchanged with its owners its own promises to pay and set them up as investments. Such conduct is the natural result which we might expect when the chief motive which actuates the sole agency supplying any public service is profit. Regulation may, and no doubt does, prevent the evils to which we have referred from going to the extremes that otherwise would be the case, but the theory of regulation is not sound. It is never a really effective method of procuring the desired results and is not at all permanent. It is an unsound philosophy, which insists upon the maintaining of conditions which naturally induce human nature to go wrong when it comes in contact with them. If we make it to the material advantage of men to veer from the path of justice, the likelihood is that they will commit injustices. A man may be willing to sit up all night for two or three nights to guard his home against a burglar whom he knows to be at large in the community, but after awhile he will get tired of doing this and will endeavor to have the burglar locked up instead, so that he can go to bed and have a good night's sleep. So it is with the public in regard to private individuals who are seeking a monopoly of the right to provide a certain public service. The public may, through utilities commissions, etc., watch them and regulate them for awhile, but ultimately it will be found a much better way to quit the task of watching lest some private individual should rob the community of its property, and, instead, arrange to serve itself and shut the door against those who may be tempted to secure unfair advantage over the public.

Even assuming that regulation should succeed pretty well in the beginning because of an aroused public interest, the tendency would be to lapse into the old habits. The tendency is for the mind to tire of constant watching and relax its vigilance, and so it is with the composite mind of the public. It becomes weary of the task at times and relaxes its attention, but the persons who are either seeking the private ownership of new public utilities or more favorable conditions in regard to those already established have a strong motive for urging their demands, and then conditions are established from which it may be impossible for the public to be freed for a long period of time.

I believe that municipal ownership and operation of public utilities is the real solution to the problem. Under this plan profit is not the prime incentive, as in the case of private ownership. The object of a municipality is to render the best possible service at the lowest price which will enable it to pay expenses. There are no privileges to be sought by a municipality, and hence no temptation to bribe or pay anyone for privileges. The public officials charged with the duty of operating any utility, as they reduce the cost and increase the quality of the service, will accordingly please their employer, namely, the people.

The motive of such official is to procure the approbation of the general public, and this is possible only by serving the best interests of the public. According to his success will be his reputation, the certainty of employment, and the increase of his compensation toward the maximum for the kind of employment in which he is engaged.

There is really but one argument of any consequence ever made against municipal ownership, and that is the fact that the persons employed to operate the utility would be selected with the object of building a political machine. It is true, of course, that under any popular government the public servant, as well as the private citizen, can exercise his influence to make the government reflect his will as much as possible. The only question, therefore, is whether the system of private ownership or public ownership gives the public-utility employee the greater advantage over the ordinary citizen. Certainly under the system of private ownership the employee of the public utility exerts his influence in favor of his employer in any dispute which it may have with the public. Of course, where the dispute concerns the terms of employment of the employee, he naturally opposes the company. This was the experience in the city of Cleveland during the street railway controversy between 1901 and 1908. Employees of the old street railway almost unanimously supported the contentions of the company at every election and opposed Mayor Johnson. But in addition to this fact we must remember that there were at least as many stockholders as employees, who were also straining every nerve to procure that for which the company was fighting. Now, under municipal ownership we would have about the same number of employees, and we may assume that they would also be politically active in behalf of those who had employed them, but we do not have the large number of stockolders working in conjunction with the employees. Every citizen is a stockholder in the municipally owned utility, and his interests are in common with every other citizen, so that the public advantage is his advantage. It is claimed, however, that because of the desire to build a machine and perpetuate themselves in office those having the authority to employ the operatives of public utilities would select men who are not qualified to perform the duties incident to the position given them, but, rather, would employ men because of their superior political influence and their ability to control this ward or that precinct. This argument ignores entirely the element of public sentiment. Since we have popular government, those intrusted with the management of publicly owned utilities would be under the necessity of pleasing their employer, the public, if they desired the success which most public officials do desire, viz, the satisfying of the public demand. If such public officials should appoint a lot of incompetents to operate the utility, the service would necessarily be very unsatisfactory and would meet with severe condemnation from the public. This would certainly be injurious to the official intrusted with the management of the utility, and probably would mean his removal from office. It would seem, therefore, that intelligent selfishness would cause him to select the best men obtainable to operate the utility for the success of which he would be responsible.

But, as a matter of fact, have we heard of anyone making a political machine of the police force or the fire department?

One fact has been entirely overlooked by those who are so much concerned about the political machine which would be formed from the utility employees, and that is that we would then have abolished the privilege-seeking horde. We would no longer have to sit up nights watching lest they might swindle the public out of its rights, and consequently the people having rid themselves of that task would be free to watch more closely the conduct of its public officials and see that they discharged their duties in an efficient manner. There being then no franchise scandals possible, the newspapers would devote themselves to criticism of public officials as to the discharge of their duties as managers of the publicly owned utility, as well as in other official capacities, all of which would make it very difficult, if not disastrous, for the managers of publicly owned utilities to employ men regardless of their ability and training.

I believe, therefore, that upon principle municipal ownership of public utlities is absolutely sound.

Many who agree with us, however, in our reasoning as applied to a particular public utility find considerable difficulty in making a general application of the principle of municipal ownership of public utilities. The opposition insists that the logical conclusion of our argument is that we must have municipal ownership of bakeshops, grocery stores, etc. That, of course, does not follow. The true test is this: If it is necessary that the agency rendering any service to the public must have a monopoly of the right to render such service, and the streets or other public property must be used in doing so, then that agency should be the governmental authority itself.

Before closing I wish to call attention to the fact that the experience in Great Britain substantiates the claims which I have made. In 1906 the National Civic Federation created a committee for the investigation of municipal ownership of public utilities. This committee selected five cities, consisting of Glasgow, Leeds, Liverpool, Sheffield, and Manchester, which originally had privately owned street railways, but which later municipalized the street railway systems. The committee determined the percentage of increase of extensions of the railway systems during the entire period of private ownership, and also the percentage of increase for a like number of years after the date of municipalization, and it was found that the annual average increase during the period of company operation was 1.2 per cent, while the average annual increase during the period of city operation was 15.8 per cent. The committee also calculated the percentage of increase of extensions of street railways in five cities where private ownership had continued to the date of collecting the data, using the dates of municipalization of the first five cities as a dividing date for the five cities where private ownership continued to the date of collecting the data. It was found that the average annual increase of extensions before the dividing date was 4 per cent, and that the average annual increase after the dividing date was 5.5 per cent, a difference of only 1.5 per cent. Compare this with the first five cities referred to, which showed an annual average increase of 15.8 per cent under municipal operation as against 1.2 per cent under private operation.

Data were collected in regard to the reduction of fares in both of these groups of cities for the same periods. During the private ownership and operation of the street railways in the first group, consisting of Glasgow, Leeds, Liverpool, Sheffield, and Manchester, the average annual reduction was 0.5 per cent, while during the period of municipal ownership and operation in the same five cities the annual reduction was 3.21 per cent, or more than six times the reduction made during private operation. In the group of six cities, consisting of Dublin, Edinburgh, Bristol, Belfast, London, and Norwich, which had private ownership until the date of procuring the data, we find very different results. The committee divided the period of private operation into two parts, using the dates of municipalization of the first five as the dates for division of the companies' experience in the latter six cities. During the first period the average annual reduction was 2.46 per cent, while during the second period the average annual reduction was only 0.61 per cent. It will thus be seen that the per cent of reduction decreased during the latter part of the company operation, whereas in the first five cities mentioned in the period of municipalization it increased more than six times.

The evidence produced before the committee also indicated that the condition of labor had very much improved during the period of municipal ownership and operation, and this is but natural. Since the public generally consists of persons who must earn their living, they are disposed to be fair with those employed by the city. During the period of rapid municipalization in Great Britain the reduction of the hours of street railway employees amounted to about 48 per cent, while the increase in wages at the same time amounted to about 42 per cent. Mr. W. L. Magdon, manager of the Brush Electrical Engineering Co., of Great Britain, who appeared before the National Civic Federation Committee in opposition to municipal ownership, said:

> It is beginning to be felt by those engaged in private enterprises that any industry in which the municipalities become established is a very good one for the private trader to be out of. It is a rather serious but sincere statement. We find in tramway work they establish labor conditions which sooner or later become imposed by pressure on private undertakings, and these are so onerous as to seriously handicap the private enterprise.

In testifying before the civic federation committee, Mr. T. M. Wood, of the London County Council, concluded by saying: "We regard it as a great advantage to work the men humanely—quite as great an advantage as 1 per cent more profit."

In conclusion, I wish to restate briefly the advantages which I think will result from municipal ownership and operation of public utilities: First, a reduction in the charges made for the service rendered; second, an improvement of the service; third, an improvement in the conditions of labor; fourth, and most important of all, in my opinion, the fact that, with the establishment of ownership and operation of all public utilities, the city governments would be free from the influence of those seeking the right, upon most favorable terms, to privately own and operate public utilities. This would give the cities of this country a chance to grow and to develop governments, the privilege of serving in which the most prominent and capable citizens would seek.

HON. JOHN M. BAER,

OF NORTH DAKOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 31, 1919.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15018) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, while under the discussion of the Bureau of Markets, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the farmers of the Northwest have the same complaint in regard to the Federal grain grades as do the farmers in the district represented by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] who just spoke. The grades are too complicated and discriminate against the spring wheat farmers more than any other section of the country. This is due to the fact that spring wheat does not get an early start and the weeds and foreign matter grow up with it. Winter wheat receives a good start in the spring and smothers out the wild grain, weeds, and foreign matter.

Another complaint is that the producers of grain do not have any say in the matter of grades. Actual farmers should have representation on the board. The producer should be protected as well as the miller. The United States Grain Corporation has on hand a surplus of $500,000, which it gained through the usual mixing process employed in handling of 700,000,000 bushels of wheat. The farmer should derive the benefit of this mixing if same can not be prohibited.

In North Dakota we have a State administration now which is protecting the farmers against these discriminatory practices. Remedial legislation correcting the evils of the present grain dockage system and compelling the elevators to pay grain growers the value of the dockage, less separation costs, are among the recommendations made to the legislature in the report of the commission of grades, weights, and measures, of which Dr. Ladd, president of the Agricultural College of North Dakota, is the head.

I know of one instance where a farmer obtained over $45 for the volunteer flax in two loads of wheat. If he had not received the protection of the State authorities this amount would have been an entire loss to him.

Farmers of North Dakota annually lose $1,500,000 in dockage. Very often the dockage has a greater value than the wheat itself, and it is not uncommon for a carload of wheat to contain several hundred dollars worth of flax or lesser amounts of wild oats, mustard seeds, rye, or barley. The legislature this year provided laws whereby grain buyers shall be compelled to pay the full market value of such grain cleaned from the wheat, less a reasonable charge for the separating. Dr. John Worst, former president of our agricultural college, stated that in the loss through grading, dockage, and loss of fertility the farmers of North Dakota were robbed of $55,000,000 annually.

THE MARKET PROBLEM.

A new and scientific method of marketing is a problem that surpasses every other economic movement in its importance. Every plan to obtain for the farmer a greater share of that which he produces and at the same time to reduce the cost of living for the consumer demands our immediate attention and earnest consideration. We have momentous problems which must be solved. The American people will not approve of leaders who merely complain and criticize existing conditions without suggesting a constructive remedy. About the time the political campaigns roll around the politician will be ready to solve the high-cost-of-living problem. Like a quack doctor he will stick an attractive label on a bottle, but he will not give us any remedial contents to cure our economic ills. The National Nonpartisan League, the farmers' great movement of the West, has a definite program which will give the people a remedy. The people of the country are sick and tired of party labels and empty bottles.

Mr. H. W. Collingwood, editor of the Rural New Yorker, who has made a life study of the subject of marketing, says that on a yearly average the farmer receives 35 cents for his products which costs the consumer $1. This authority is supported by another eminent expert, Mr. John Dillon, head of the Bureau of Foods and Markets of New York City, who declares that the ultimate consumer pays two-thirds of his dollar to the system of distribution. In other words, it costs a minimum of 65 cents to handle 35 cents worth of foodstuffs.

It is unnecessary to quote experts on the subject. Did not Mayor Shank, of Indianapolis, recently go to Grand Rapids and buy several carloads of potatoes at 50 cents per bushel from jobbers—the farmers received 40 cents; and did he not sell them in his city for 75 cents per bushel when they were costing the consumer $2 per bushel in that city? He handled potatoes for 35 cents which the profiteers got $1.50 for handling.

The report of the California Fruit Growers' Association shows that the grower received on an average for the past four years $1.60 per crate for oranges, while during the same period the consumer paid an average of $4.80. In New York City people paid 14 cents a quart for milk for which the farmer received 5½ cents. In South Bend, Ill., while the farmer, 135 miles away, received 60 cents per bushel for tomatoes, they were selling for $3 per bushel. A farmer gets 20 cents a pound for cotton. We must pay $2.56 for that pound of cotton when woven. For a pair of shoes selling at $8 the farmer gets 75 cents for the leather and labor gets 45 cents.

The farmer sells his wool for 60 cents a pound. We must pay $4.75 for that pound of wool when bought as yarn. In Fargo, N. Dak., when the farmer was getting 60 cents for his wool, yarn was selling at $2.50—yarn spun at very little cost. Later, when the War Industries Board fixed the price of wool at 57 cents, yarn sold at $4.75. The price of the raw material was fixed; the price of the finished product was not. Through these wasteful methods of handling it costs from two to five dollars to deliver $1 worth of food. Stated in terms of man power, it takes from two to five men to handle a one-man power product.

On May 17, 1917, when Mr. Hoover became head of the Food Administration, flour was selling in England for $8.20 a barrel. In Fargo it was selling at $17.60 a barrel. Both flours were made from the same wheat. It cost $9.40 more in Fargo than in England, 5,000 miles away.

Later on, when the farmer was getting twice as much for his wheat by Government guaranty, flour cost $10.60 a barrel, a saving of $7 to the consumer. At the same time barley, with price uncontrolled, could be bought for 63 cents at the elevator; and barley flour in North Dakota cost $14.60 a barrel. A bushel and a half of barley is equivalent to one bushel of wheat. The retailer paid $4 more for a barrel of barley flour than for a barrel of wheat flour; at the same time the market price of wheat was more than twice the price of an equivalent amount of barley.

This probably accounts for the excessive profits of the millers who increased their operating profits 175 per cent, and on the capital invested 100 per cent. These excess profits were not made on wheat flour alone, but also on the substitutes which the people so patriotically used to conserve wheat.

One does not have to speak in generalities about the profits of handling foods. One can pick out a specific case which is only a single factor of the present complex system of marketing. The packers, for instance, accumulated undue dividends. The Federal Trade Commission found that four packers increased their earnings $121,000,000 above their prewar profits. Morris & Co. made a profit of 263.7 per cent. These monopolists have complete control of the market facilities, absolutely controlling the price of live stock through pooling, dividing purchases, splitting shipments, and various other conspiracies.

The Steel Trust was permitted to increase its profits from $47,000,000 in 1914 to $478,000,000 in 1918, or about 1,000 per cent, much of this at the Government's expense. From the Steel Trust on down through the textiles, munitions, firearms, auto trucks, and all the war paraphernalia, the same exorbitant profits were made. Consequently, I believe that a new and efficient system of distribution should be devised to handle shoes, clothing, implements, and all other necessities of life, as well as farm products.

What does this show? It shows that there should be some limitation of profit, some regulation of price, not only for the raw material, but for the finished product. There should be a fair profit for handling the goods and manufacturing it, but waste and useless speculation should be eliminated. If the Government continues control of flour as well as of wheat the consumer will pay less for his flour, in spite of $2.26 wheat, than he would have paid if the Government ceased to maintain its restrictions. Many State and Federal authorities state that with $2.26 wheat flour should sell for $8 a barrel after making allowances for all by-products and for a liberal profit.

And $2.26 for wheat is not so high when one considers that Italy guaranteed $4.44 to its farmers for the 1919 crop; France guaranteed $3.84; Switzerland $3.18; and Norway $4.09. Some people seem to be persistently complaining about the $2.26 guaranty for American farmers, when it is only a little over half as much as guaranteed by other nations to their producers of wheat.

THE POSTAL MARKET.

Among the many proposals that have been made to develop an efficient system of exchange between the farm and table is the postal market or Federal food exchange. Here in the Capital, at Washington, D. C., the plan is being worked out. The Government is using some of the thousands of motor trucks which will soon be released from the National Army. Community centers are being established, and there is the closest cooperation between the farmer and buyer. All unnecessary distributing agencies are eliminated. Instead of costing from $2 to $5 to deliver $1 in products, it costs only 10 to 15 cents. It is a complete reversal of the inefficient methods of the past. This is one real remedy which rings true with definite results.

Legislation should be passed at once allowing the Post Office Department to extend the parcel post to enable it to establish the postal market or Federal food exchange throughout the country. This would eliminate useless profiteering in the products of industry and agriculture and give the actual producers a greater share in the fruits of their toil. Legislation is required at once to give the Government a rigid control of stockyards, grain elevators, warehouses, cold storage, and other terminal markets. Provision should be made in all Federal laws for the closest cooperation with the States which may in the near future build their own State-owned elevators and flour mills. Municipal governments should also establish receiving warehouses, depots, cold storage, and markets, and all legislation should be drawn so that there will be provisions for the closest coordination among the cities, States, and the Federal Government.

Can we not learn something from our methods during the war? The Army saved $6,000,000,000, a good-sized liberty loan, by its methods of buying. It effected tremendous savings in the purchase of food. Can we not take a hint? Can we not learn the lesson?

Out in North Dakota when our publicly owned elevator and flour mill are completed the consumer will get two barrels of flour and a dollar bill besides, where he received only one barrel in May, 1917, and the farmer will get more for his grain, too. That comes of eliminating the cost of speculation and excessive handling.

Somebody is making big profits. That is what one hears everywhere. Who is this somebody? "Not we," say the farmers. "Not we," say the packers. "Not we," say the manufacturers. "Surely not we," say the railroads. "We can scarcely live," justly declare the retailers. Yet somewhere in the process of distribution the price mysteriously quadruples. What is the answer?

The effective answer seems to be to take the marketing problem into our own hands, as Washington is doing in many ways; as Detroit is attempting to do; as Cleveland has tried to do. Seattle has invested $7,000,000 in wharves and storage. New Orleans has its own grain and cotton terminals, built at a tremendous cost. Australia, New Zealand, Norway, and even conservative England are doing it. Public ownership and control has passed the experimental stage.

A hundred years ago the man who advocated the public school was a "socialist," according to the wealthy Tories. Parcel post was called paternalistic. Twenty years ago the man who advocated municipal ownership was dubbed "an extremist," "a visionary," and "a socialist." The men who handle our marketing have failed to give us an economical system. It is extravagant and wasteful. We must eliminate the useless and unnecessary speculators. Just as the people did in the cities when private corporations monopolized the public utilities and charged exorbitant rates for light, gas, and water, the producers are eventually going to take complete control of the marketing facilities. Then, and only then, will we unclog the channels of trade and have economic freedom.

The saving accomplished by a new marketing system would be tremendous. It would provide attractive and profitable employment for the soldier boys on their return. The success of the plan of Secretary Lane's land projects for soldiers is contingent upon a marketing system that will make farming more profitable than it is now. The postal market would increase the farmers' income. Someone will say that he is getting rich. I answer that by asking, "Why are the farmers leaving their farms? Why can you not get people to go back to the land?" Good marketing conditions will open a field of splendid opportunities to our victory veterans.

All of these suggestions and many more are absolutely indispensable to make farming a respectable and profit-earning industry. With the saving and prosperity that would come through these changes in our economic life the people could give their children greater advantages of education. Community interests would spring up where there would be greater cooperation between the farm and city. The farmer, his wife, and family would enjoy greater opportunities along educational lines as well as social. Amusements, now exclusive to city life, could be extended to the country. A country theater is as important as the city movies. I am proud to say that my State is a vanguard in this special movement. Life would not be a drudgery on the farm but a pleasure. The returned soldier would stay on his farm. Agriculture is the fundamental industry—the basis of all credit and national prosperity—and should be made more profitable and attractive. [Applause.]

Our Naval Program.

SPEECH
HON. JAMES C. WILSON,
OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 6, 1919.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15539) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I want it distinctly understood that I am not undertaking to answer the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS]. [Mr. SAUNDER'S speech appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of date of the 6th day of February, 1919.] I would not assume that I could do that. I am speaking now simply because this is my time to speak on this program. The remarkable thing is that the gentleman in his discussion calls for all the facts that might have actuated the President in recommending this three-year naval construction program, and he demands to know all of those facts. In other words, he not only favors open treaties openly arrived at, but it seems he does not want us to take any steps or any action touching our relations with foreign nations without disclosing all of the reasons that we have for it to all the balance of the world. Here there is an irreconcilable difference between his view and mine. I can only speak for myself, but think, as a member of the committee, I have all of the information concerning Secretary Daniels's telegram to the President and the President's reply possessed by any other member, and the gentleman knows as much now about the reasons for the President's action in recommending at this time the proposed naval construction program as any member of the committee knows. Every Member of this House knows all there is to it, and that is merely that the President in a telegram reiterated his desire for this three-year program. That is all. The President, of course, did not wire all of the facts or arguments. I believe I know what caused him to urge it at this time, but will enter into no discussion of that.

The first words of the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Daniels, to our committee on this subject were:

No step backward, but a long step forward should be taken by this Congress in strengthening the American Navy. The additional three-year program recommended in my annual report is a conservative one, intended to continue the policy of the steady upbuilding of the Navy established in 1916.

No nation who witnesses what we are doing has a right to wonder at it or to question our motives or friendship, or to become alarmed, since we are merely carrying out a policy with reference to building a navy that we, after a bitter fight and long consideration, decided upon in 1916, and which at that time attracted world attention.

Prior to the time the Secretary of the Navy appeared before us the President recently had expressed himself in favor of this program. For my part, I knew that both the Secretary of the Navy and the President were at heart truly pacifists in the highest sense, entitled to and commanding the respect of the whole world. In other words, that they were both men who, in order to get peace, would appeal to every sense of justice, right, fairness, humanity, and reason; but I knew also that if they could not get it by such peaceful negotiations they were both men who would fight you in order to get it, and I was glad to know that. I had confidence in them. This very characteristic made the President a great leader for us when struggling to keep out of the war, and later, when forced to enter it, to lead us into war, and during the time we waged war. It brought to him at once the support and confidence of all true Americans of every type.

I knew that the President especially and the Secretary on this subject were in touch with our foreign affairs; that they possessed knowledge that should not be given to the public, and to give all the facts to this Congress would be giving them to the entire public. Our people are entitled to trust all right, but the trouble is if everybody over here knew everything about our foreign relations it would follow that everybody in all the balance of the world would know the same thing. So, as far as I am concerned, as soon as this was proposed to our committee I offered a resolution declaring that it was the sense of our committee that we approve generally of the building program submitted by the Secretary. The balance of the committee decided that my suggestion was premature, and I am not saying that at this time it was not; but I was very glad later to see all of the committee come unanimously to the same view and for the same reason that I was for it in the beginning, or mainly for the same reason, and that is that the President is urging it. That is the truth of the business. We might as well be frank about it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Not for the present, please.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Of course, in addition, I had the reasons so ably assigned by the distinguished gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] the other day in his address to the House, and those so forcibly and eloquently presented by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY]. And in addition to that, I am naturally inclined to a pretty good-sized Navy. I do not care much about the Army, as to the size of it, and never did. Though we are a peaceful people and love peace above everything else, we have demonstrated several times that we can get warlike and shape up for war as fast, if not faster, than any other nation on this earth. I do not take any stock in all this talk, more current now than I have ever known it, that we are going to have to fight the laboring people. In other words, I am not so much afraid of home folks as I am of outsiders. I suppose I succeeded in the House about the least Navy man that ever sat in it, and since I have been here I have been voting every chance I got to provide us with a pretty big Navy. But the chief reason with me is that the Secretary of the Navy and the President want this thing. I was opposed to telegraphing the President.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield right there just for a question?

Mr. WILSON of Texas. All right.

Mr. SNYDER. There has been considerable said about this telegram received from the President. I have understood that it was brought out by a telegram sent to the President by the Secretary of the Navy. The gentleman being a member of the committee, I should like to ask him if he or any member of the committee is familiar with the telegram that the Secretary of the Navy sent to the President.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. I did not hear the statement made by the chairman of the committee [Mr. PADGETT] the other day, and if there is any dodging to be done, I am going to let him do it.

Mr. PADGETT. I have already stated fully to the House what the Secretary's telegram to the President was; not the words, but the substance, and it is in the RECORD.

Mr. SNYDER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. I am glad to know that. For my part I was opposed to sending that telegram, because, as I said, the President was over there on the ground in touch with them. He knows what we are doing; he it watching us daily; and if he did not want it he would say so without any telegram.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Now, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. On the day the President's telegram was made public in the United States he made a speech in the French Chamber of Deputies, in Paris, in which he congratulated the deputies there assembled and the world that there would now be a diminution of armaments throughout the world, relieving the people of that great burden. Now, as a Member of this House, I want to know his impelling reason—why, at the same time he is congratulating the rest of the world that they could disarm, he should be urging us to arm? Can the gentleman give us the reason for that?

Mr. WILSON of Texas. In order that the speech of the President be not misconstrued, I am going to ask permission now to print it in full in to-day's RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks leave to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there any objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Our President needs no defense from anyone, but since this question is raised it is proper that his speech should go into the RECORD while we are considering this bill in order that it may be reconciled with his recommendation by gentlemen who want to, and in order that excerpts from it may not be taken and used by anyone to create confusion and misunderstanding and the impression that the President is not consistent. The speech was made in the Chamber of Deputies, at Paris, the 3d day of this month, with official France present.

[The President's speech appeared in the RECORD of date February 6, 1919.]

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Yes; but the gentleman is taking up my time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman made a request to insert something in the RECORD. Will he not insert in connection with it the President's cablegram?

Mr. WILSON of Texas. I should not feel authorized to do that unless the chairman of the committee or the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Brother BUTLER, will consent to it.

Mr. BUTLER. You tell it.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. There is nothing to it more than the request. It repeats the request. Some points are emphasized. There are no facts given, and we know no more than the rest of you. I do not doubt for one moment but what Mr. Lloyd George himself and the foreign minister, Mr. Balfour, are in perfect accord with the President's recommendation. The relation between the President and Mr. Balfour and Mr. George is an intimate one—of the very closest friendship.

It was my great privilege when recently in England to meet and talk to Mr. George, and with what I knew of him along with what I saw I was able pretty well to size him up. He and the President are of a type; above everything else they want justice and right. In the peace conference they are natural friends. It was my great privilege also in the House of Parliament on the occasion of a banquet given to us by members of the House of Commons to talk to Mr. Balfour about an hour. He is as great an admirer and is as devoted to the President as any of us in America. He and the President were intimate and devoted friends before the President went to Europe. At the peace conference at Paris any relation between these three men other than an open, perfectly frank, and fraternal one is unthinkable to me. We can not judge by what the newspapers in England are saying about this proposed building program of ours. I do not doubt for one minute but what England favors disarmament just like we do, nor that she would hesitate to favor any possible step on her part, or any step of ours, that might be looking to disarmament. It is inconceivable to me that the President could be in the midst of these things happening at the peace conference, in constant touch and association with these gentlemen, and not talking some to them about it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is it not probable that the great American naval program is likely to bring about disarmament?

Mr. WILSON of Texas. I think so.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Would the gentleman be willing to state that there is any agreement between England and the United States that they shall provide a great police force on the seas that shall safeguard the world?

Mr. WILSON of Texas. No; I do not claim to know the actual facts. I do not ask to know, nor want to know. I merely reason about it. That it is like a bunch of us gentlemen together; talking and elbowing with each other every day; good friends, believing in each other, as I know they do; having confidence in each other; working in harmony with the same ultimate purpose of doing the right and the best thing—that it would be inconceivable that they are not in touch on this very subject. Otherwise, it strikes me that these gentlemen would really, as some London papers seem to, look upon the President with more or less distrust. They really should not do so for the reason that the President has said emphatically that we should not shape our affairs at home to fit an international policy that has not yet been decided upon. But some over here who do not know any better—and many over there, it seems—think that this naval building program of ours is aimed at Great Britain; and with all that is being said in the papers, if the President is advising disarmament over there and advising arming to a greater extent along naval lines over here than ever, and was at the same time standing aloof from the British representatives on this subject, it would naturally cause them to question the President's motives and sincerity and would breed more or less distrust in the hearts of Britishers for us. I am sure no such feelings have been aroused, and I am sure we will have no serious disagreement with Great Britain at the peace conference. I would not be surprised at all if our President is not more intimate with the British than any other delegate at that conference. For my part I believe they are in agreement on this very subject.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Texas. I can not yield further.

Mr. SNYDER. Just one question.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Very well.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman says that it is inconceivable that the President would be with Lloyd George and Minister Balfour without their knowing something about this proposition. I was wondering if it was inconceivable that the President should be there and not be advised as to the embargo which England has put on certain articles of commerce.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. That shows that I was unwise in yielding to the gentleman, because he wants to get me off the subject. [Laughter.]

The other subject touched upon by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia was the scarecrow about Great Britain—that we are fixing to fight Great Britain. In the same way the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON]—and I do not question his sincerity nor the honesty of his purpose—almost scared us to death the other day about that, and said that Great Britain would never submit to our building a larger Navy than hers unless we did it over the carcass of the British fleet. He also styled this proposition a bluff, and said that Great Britain would not let us get away with it. It is amusing that some people even over here will still accuse this Congress of bluffing. When we declared war pacifists and pro-Germans over here styled it a bluff. When the President pledged the resources of this country to the last man and to the last dollar, it was a bluff.

When we offered legislation providing for loans into the billions to our allies, that was a bluff; but we let our allies have about $8,000,000,000 during the war. When we passed conscription in order to get an army, this was denounced by these same pacifists and pro-Germans as a bluff, and also by our enemies over there, and the conclusive proof cited was that we knew that we could never land a soldier in France. When we proposed to build sufficient ships to carry our soldiers over there, this was a bluff. When we appropriated $650,000,000 for aircraft, this was scoffed at as the bluff of bluffs on the part of America. We declared war April 6, 1917. It was not until the latter part of August, 1918, when we had loaned to our allies nearly $7,000,000,000, and had nearly 2,000,000 soldiers in France, and American-made airplanes were coming into every port in England and France by the hundreds daily, and we proposed the second conscription act calling up for registration an additional 13,000,000 men, that these fellows quit making the claims that America was bluffing. They knew then over here and over there that America had never been bluffing about anything. In America we do things on such a big scale compared to the European countries that it is not unreasonable for those people to think sincerely that some of our propositions had the appearance of a bluff, but there is no excuse for any intelligent man in the world, and particularly any man in this Congress, now making any such ridiculous claims. If there is no provision for disarmament at the peace conference, how could Great Britain help herself if we wanted a larger navy than hers? Considering our comparative resources and ability for shipbuilding, in a contest of this kind with America, Great Britain would be like a child in a contest with a man, and she knows this much better than we do.

But I said I was not afraid of the laboring people, and I am not afraid of Great Britain for the same reason. I think she is the best friend we have in the world, France not excepted. [Applause.] I have more faith in her as a friend, and God knows I love France. I told my constituents in a tour of my district last fall, after returning from Europe, that if we had to have just one ally, and it was left to me to select it, I would select Great Britain. Not one handclap did I get on that. If I had said France, they would have torn down the house. I had a purpose in saying that, and everywhere I went repeated it, but at no time did I get a sign of approval. We should break down the prejudice that exists in the hearts of many of our people against Great Britain. In fact, it is a little hard to account for this. We do not teach our children to hate Great Britain. I think it is merely because of the wars they read of that we have had with Great Britain. But after this it will be different. They will read about the history of the Revolution and of the War of 1812, but they will come on down and at last read of this war, where Great Britain and America stood by each other and died together on the battle fields, and standing together saved each other and saved civilization. Too, they will read such things as the President said about Great Britain in his speech before the French Chamber of Deputies the other day. He said:

> Now look what has happened. In that far-off day when France came to the assistance of America, America was fighting Great Britain, and now she is linked as closely to Great Britain as she is to France. We see now how these apparently diverging lines of history are coming together. The nations which once stood in battle array against one another are now shoulder to shoulder fighting a common enemy. It was a long time before we saw that, and in the last four years something has happened that is unprecedented in the history of mankind. It is nothing less than this, that bodies of men on both sides of the sea, and in all parts of the world, have come to realize that comradeship in freedom.

There will not be so much prejudice against Great Britain hereafter, and in my judgment she will forever be our best friend. I am an optimist on the subject of our ever having any serious trouble with Great Britain.

In fact, I am an optimist on the subject of our ever having any war with any nation. I have no sympathy with all this talk that human nature is the same; that it never has changed; that it never will change; and that nations will go on occasionally cutting each other's throats over matters where the application of reason and fair treatment and justice would settle the dispute out of war. And yet I am for this big Navy. I do not see any indication that I am going to die within the next 20 years, and yet if you knew my private affairs, and that is true of all of us, you would think each day that I expected to die to-morrow. There are certain things about which we can not afford to run great risks or take great chances, and certainly for the present we should take no chances as to our country being prepared to take care of herself in the event war should come.

I think the peace conference at Paris is going to be a success, and particularly on the subject of eliminating future wars between nations. We will continue to have internal wars and troubles, of course, but I do not believe after the work of that conference has been completed that an issue will rise between any two nations leading to an argument, next to a dispute, and to a quarrel, to bitterness, and then on into war. Of course, my belief in such a future as this is based on the prayerful hope of a league of nations; that some sort of a binding covenant will be entered into by the civilized nations of the world looking to the prevention of war. I have never believed in anything quite so strongly, it seems to me, as I believe in this. It is a great task, of course, but there is no sane reason why nations could not come together in some adequate agreement to prevent duelling among themselves over questions of honor and end it forever, the same as it has been ended in this country between individuals. I believe this league of nations when formed should provide for force and for the use of it in the extreme emergencies, and would not have too much respect for any league of nations that might be entered into unless it did make such provisions.

The Farewell Address of Washington is cited with great assurance by many as an authority against all of this. I have been wondering if Washington had lived during the last hundred years and during this last war, and had seen this country grow from practically an agricultural community to the position of the greatest world power, if they would say that he had learned nothing during those hundred years; if, facing present world conditions, do they think he would be willing to stand upon every word of that address; that he would have undergone no change of views, not in a single particular? Reading that address in the light of the times in which it was delivered and facing the conditions as he faced them, it seems that every word was full of wisdom. It is not improbable if he were with us that he would say, "At the time I delivered that address to the American people I was facing altogether different conditions, and the different conditions of this day have brought about as great a change in my views." Touching upon our foreign relations, there is one thing he said in that address that was wise then, is wise to-day, and there will doubtless never be a time in the history of America when it will not be wise, and that is that America should have as little to do with the politics of Europe as she possibly can. I am sure our President has this in mind, and that this is one of his purposes. Following the advice of Washington, the question is, How little is it possible for us to have to do now and from here on with the political affairs of Europe? The policy of no entangling alliances, followed for over a hundred years, brought us into this most awful war of all history, and there was no honorable escape for us. It was an evil influence that had grown up in Europe that forced us into it. Now it seems plain, if we can with a reasonable outlay of effort and money forever prevent the existence of any such influence that might lead us again into such a war, that it is our plain duty to do it—at least, to try—to make a real genuine effort. If it should fail, it will do no more than the policy of no entangling alliances.

I have no sympathy with the selfish American policy now being preached by many, and preached more in this Congress, it seems to me, than anywhere else in all the world—this terrapin foreign policy—that we should draw back our head, clamp down our hull, hump ourselves up in our selfishness and exclusion, and remain so until some one comes along and prods and prods us until we are compelled to move out again. Of course, we should be more selfish for America than for any other country; but from a selfish standpoint we can not afford to refuse to enter into some sort of an agreement with the other nations of the world looking to the prevention of our ever being drawn into another world war like this one. Being more selfish for America than for any other country does not relieve us of the duty of discharging the great responsibilities that the end of this war has left upon us. The American people are going to be with our President in his masterful fight in this direction. They are not going to be left without hope; they are going to demand that something be done upon which they may base the hope that this thing can not occur again. The 7,000,000 dead on the battle fields of Europe would vote for this league. Their mothers and widows would vote for it. They would say, "Give us something, that posterity may be saved from our fate."

I can not understand the motives of men who oppose the views of all those at the peace conference at Paris. I can not understand what they hope for. I was on the western front from Lorraine practically around to Belgium during last summer and while the allied great offensive was on. I saw the awful horrors of that war. I saw our dead mangled in every conceivable form. I saw hundreds and hundreds of destroyed cities in France and Belgium. I witnessed some of the great battles that were raging on that front. I passed by acres and acres of dead. It was enough to strike horror to the heart of any sane man. In sight of all this blood, of all these millions of dead, of all the devastation, of all of the waste of the world's wealth, it is inconceivable to me how any man could oppose the President when his only and sole purpose is, in the matter of the league, to prevent that thing ever occurring again. I have had the lesson impressed so often in my own experience and observation that a man is never utterly without hope of accomplishing a thing until he himself quits, refuses to make any effort or attempt. Those who oppose the league idea can only have in mind a continuation of the old system of the competitive building of armaments, which always has meant war and will always mean war and more war. The continuation of this system should strike horror to the heart of every man for the reason that it only means war in the end.

One might think it strange or inconsistent that I should have these views and at the same time stand here advocating the building of this great Navy. My position is simply this: If the nations in conference at Paris do not enter into the league for the prevention of war and refuse to make provision for disarmament, and we are to continue under the old system of having wars occasionally, then I am strictly in favor of America being prepared, fully prepared, to whip any nation that she gets into trouble with. In the event they do enter into such an agreement, then, and not until then, the happiest provision of this bill is the following section:

If at any time before the construction authorized by this act shall have been contracted for there shall have been established, with the cooperation of the United States of America, any tribunal or tribunals competent to secure peaceful determination of international disputes, and which shall render unnecessary the maintenance of competitive armaments, then and in that case such naval expenditure as may be inconsistent with the engagements made by the establishment of said tribunal or tribunals may be suspended when so ordered by the President of the United States, and no contracts for the construction of vessels herein authorized shall be entered into prior to February 1, 1920.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

The Present Administration.

OF

HON. JAMES C. WILSON,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of the visit of the Federal Farm Loan Commission to my home, Fort Worth, Tex., November 15, 1916, the chamber of commerce tendered a luncheon to Mr. McAdoo and the other members at the Fort Worth Club. I was toastmaster, and as such made two short talks, as follows:

"Ladies and gentlemen, we have in the United States a man, just a plain man, whom history will write down not only as America's but as the world's greatest son; not because, in heart qualities, he is comparable with the Father of his Country; not because his powers of constructive statesmanship are equal to those of Jefferson; not because, when he knows he is in the right, he possesses the courage and the indomitable spirit of Jackson; not because in the democratic simplicity of his life and statesmanship and devotion to ideals he is the peer of the universally loved Lincoln; but for that higher and nobler reason, through his interpretation of the spirit of our people and institutions, he is impressing mankind, as never before dreamed of, with his, and our, undying devotion to and with his elevation to the serious and favorable consideration of the world's best thought, the sacredness of the simple proposition of a human right everywhere, the world over.

"In the name of Fort Worth and of Texas, I propose a toast to this matchless man, our President, Woodrow Wilson."

Here the audience stood in silence, with glasses lifted, a few seconds, after which I continued as follows:

"When one deals with the finances and the financial system of America he deals with the heart, the arteries, the veins, the very blood of the Nation, the gold and silver constituting the red and white corpuscles of that blood. It takes a great national specialist, a great surgeon, to operate upon a body politic such as this United States of America, changing that system, without administering chloroform, without shock to the nervous system, without a backset, while that body is moving on in its throbbing, mighty purposes at home, and to the accomplishment of its God-planned mission among the nations of the world. Just such an operation—as new and startling as the processes of grafting or transfusion—was recently performed upon America in the establishment of the Federal reserve banking system. The chief surgeon who attended America in that operation is with us to-day. I have the pleasure of presenting to you, judged from the standpoint of service to the Nation, and rightfully they can be judged from no other standpoint, the greatest Secretary of the Treasury in the history of America, William G. McAdoo."

We did not enter the war until about six months subsequent to that occasion. During the war the greatest burdens borne by any Americans were borne by these two officials of our administration. The achievements of this Congress and the achievements of this administration, the ending of the war, leaving upon us such great responsibilities, and the occurrences now at the peace conference at Paris, have only served to put a world spotlight at this time upon these very truths concerning these two great Americans, and so much so that I almost feel that the things I said about them in 1916 were prophesies that we have more than fully realized.

Since I am soon to resign from Congress to take up the work of the Federal bench in my State, it was my desire to extend my remarks upon the effect that the course of our President has had, and will have, upon world affairs, and the effect Mr. McAdoo's services as Secretary of the Treasury has had upon the financial system of America and as to the position in which we now find ourselves as a financial world power, but instead concluded to insert in the RECORD the views I entertained toward them prior to the beginning of their tasks in connection with winning the war.

The Late Representative Meeker, of Missouri.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. WILLIAM L. IGOE,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 2, 1919.

The House had under consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. WILLIAM J. STONE, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Missouri, and the Hon. JACOB E. MEEKER, late a Member of this House from the State of Missouri.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of their distinguished public careers, the House, at the conclusion of the exercises of this day, shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the families of the deceased."

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, we meet to-day to pay tribute to another deceased colleague of ours, Mr. MEEKER, who served in this House from the tenth district of Missouri. I knew Mr. MEEKER for many years, and became quite intimately acquainted with him during our service together in this House. He had taken a prominent part in the discussion of public affairs in St. Louis prior to his election to Congress, and after he arrived here he became one of the hardest working Members of this House. The district that he represented contains almost 500,000 people. Those of us who represent districts containing 200,000 and 250,000 people know how much work devolves upon us, and I know from my visits to him that he was engaged day and night attending to the work of the constituency that he represented. He was a man of ability, and he stood by his convictions, and, whether it was in his own party or with another party, he made a fight for what he believed to be right. I recall very well the time the declaration of war was being voted upon. Mr. MEEKER was at that time very ill and unable to be here, and he sent word that if his vote was needed he wanted to be sent for and brought here to vote for the declaration of war. He might well have allowed the matter to go, because everyone knew that he was desperately ill, but he wished that record made. And just a day or two before his death I received a telegram from him stating that he wanted to be recorded as supporting the last war measure which was voted upon before his death, the great appropriation for carrying on the war. Mr. MEEKER was a hard-working, conscientious Representative. He differed radically and greatly with many Members of the House and with many people in St. Louis, and yet he was returned here by his people by a tremendous majority, and, as stated by the Speaker, I believe, he could have continued to represent them in this House for many years. There were, as in the case of the distinguished Senator of whom we spoke, many who differed radically with him, but I think that all will concede that Mr. MEEKER was a man of ability, forcefulness, energy, and, above all things, anxious to render genuine public service to his people.

Embargo on Cotton and Cottonseed and Peanut Oils.

OF

HON. HENRY B. STEAGALL,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 24, 1919.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, it is true, as suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], that if we strike out the provisions of this bill making appropriation for the War Trade Board the board would be without funds to operate after the end of the fiscal year—June 30, 1919. It would seem, at first glance, that this would accomplish all that is contemplated by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND], providing that no funds shall be available for the support of the War Trade Board until the embargo on cotton shall be lifted, which by the terms of the amendment offered by myself has been made to embrace cottonseed and peanut oils. I agree with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] that striking out the whole fund for the support of the War Trade Board would accomplish the same result so far as the appropriation of money is concerned as would be the case under the limitations fixed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND] and myself. But the adoption of this amendment would be a specific declaration of the Representatives of the American people in Congress in favor of the removal of the embargo, and I, for one, believe the President would give instructions to the War Trade Board to respect their wishes and remove the restrictions and limitations now imposed upon American products.

The farmers of the South suffered a reduction in the price of cotton in 1914 that resulted in widespread bankruptcy. It all came about as the result of the cotton producers being denied access to the markets of the world. England established a blockade on cotton against foreign markets that were purchasers to the extent of three to four million bales annually. In the terror and suffering of the moment appeals were made to Congress to take steps to enable the holders of cotton to carry it through that trying period and to save them from being forced to sell when the price had sunk to a basis vastly below the cost of production. But this appeal was answered with the statement that it was not a matter with which the Government had or should have anything to do.

I do not say that the citizen should rely upon the Government in ordinary times to find a market for his products or to become purchaser. I believe in the old Democratic doctrine that the Government should govern as little as possible in everything and allow the citizen a free and fair chance, protecting him in the right to produce to the fullest of his ability, and sell his products in an unrestricted market under the law of supply and demand. The citizen has a right to expect that much. That is all the farmers of the South ask to-day. That is all that is sought to be accomplished by the removal of the embargo on farm products. They ask no special favor of the Government. They only insist upon the right to toil and produce and ship their products to the markets of the world that they may support their families, pay their taxes, and sustain the credit of their Government.
